COBB, J. 1. By the ancient common law the only persons punishable for waste were guardians in chivalry, tenants in dower and by the curtesy. Lessees for life and for years were not liable. This distinction was made for the reason that tenancies of the character first named were created by law, and the law must therefore furnish a remedy for a violation of the rights of the owner of the inheritance; and lessees for life or for years acquired their interest by contract with the owner of the fee, who could have protected himself against loss in this respect. The punishment for waste by the common law was single damages. 2 Scribner on Dower (2d Ed.) 795. This was also the punishment under the statute of Marlbridge. 3 Wash. Real Prop. (6th Ed.) p. 534. By the statute of Gloucester all tenants for life or years were made liable for waste, and it was provided that the tenant should forfeit "the thing that he hath wasted," and also pay treble damages. Id. It was determined that under the words above quoted the place was also forfeited, and that, if the waste be here and there over a wood, the whole wood should be forfeited, or, if in several rooms of a house, the whole house; but if it should be done in only one end of the wood or in one room of the house, if these places could be conveniently separated from the rest, the thing wasted and subject to forfeiture would be such places only, and not the whole estate. 2 Bl. Com. 283. There are statements that at common law a dowress was liable for permissive as well as voluntary waste; but Mr. Park, in his work on Dower, says that the researches of Mr. Hargrave, as well as his own, failed to find any authority to that effect. See Park on Dower, p. 357. In 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) p. 894, we find the statement that the better opinion seems to be that the tenant in dower is not liable for mere permissive waste, and that this is especially true if she deals with the estate as a prudent person would deal with it if he owned it absolutely. See, in this connection, 14 Cyc. 1014 et seq. In Parker v. Chambliss, 12 Ga. 235, it was held that the dowress was liable for waste committed on the estate, but that she did not thereby forfeit her estate and treble damages, as provided by the statute of Gloucester; the remedy against her being an action on the case in the nature of waste to recover the actual damage done to the estate, or injunction to restrain her from committing waste. It appears from the original record that that case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, which set forth merely that the dowress had "committed" waste. It does not appear whether the waste was permissive or voluntary, but the use of the word "committed" would lead to the inference that the waste was of the latter character. The ruling in that case was to the effect that the statute of Gloucester was of force, so far as it made a tenant in dower liable in damages for waste, but that the harsh and stringent remedy of forfeiture and treble damages, which was doubtless intended for the benefit of the feudal heir, was not adapted to our conditions, and therefore never became a part of our law. The question as to what would be waste by a dowress was distinctly left open. The Code which went into effect in 1863 embraced within it the provisions now contained in the Civil Code of 1895, § 3090, which is as follows: "The tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property, so that in such use he exercises the ordinary care of a prudent man for its preservation and protection, and commits no acts tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion. For the want of such care, and the willful commission of such acts, he forfeits his interest to the remainderman, if he elects to claim immediate possession." The dowress being a tenant for life, she holds her estate with all the privileges of such a tenant, and, unless otherwise provided, subject to all the liabilities of tenants of that character. See, in this connection, Rusk v. Hill, 121 Ga. —, 49 S. E. 261. This section does not distinctly declare that a tenant for life is liable for actual waste, or will be enjoined from committing threatened waste, but it has been held since the Code that such is the law. Dickinson v. Jones, 36 Ga. 97; Smith v. Smith, 105 Ga. 106, 31 S. E. 135 (2); Kollock v. Webb, 113 Ga. 762, 39 S. E. 339. In Woodward v. Gates, 38 Ga. 213, it was said that the effect of the Code was to restore that part of the statute of Gloucester in reference to forfeiture for waste, but that the rule as to treble damages was not re-enacted. While the section of the Code does not use the terms "permissive waste" or "voluntary waste," or the term "waste" at all, still an analysis of that section will indicate that its author had in mind the distinction between the two classes of waste. It imposes upon the life tenant the duty of exercising the ordinary care of a prudent man for the preservation and protection of the estate, and the failure to do this is permissive waste; and it also prohibits the commission of any act tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion, and the commission of such acts is voluntary waste. A liability both for permissive and voluntary waste is therefore imposed upon the tenant for life, and all such tenants are liable to the reversioner or remainderman for actual damages resulting from waste of either character.

It is now to be determined when waste will work a forfeiture. The Code does not use the language of the statute of Gloucester, and limit the forfeiture to the thing wasted, but when a forfeiture results it is the "interest" of the tenant, which would seem to be his entire interest in the premises, without reference to what portion of the estate was the particular subject of the waste. After declaring the degree of care that the tenant shall exercise, and the acts which he is prohibited from doing, the Code provides that a forfeiture results "for the want of such care and the willful commission of such acts," if the remainderman elects to claim immediate possession. It is said that "and" should be here construed "or," and that the section should read that "a forfeiture results from the want of such care or the willful commission of such acts," or should read, "for the want of such care, as well as for the commission of such acts"; thus making a forfeiture result either from permissive or from voluntary waste. It is also contended that the word "willful" should be construed to mean simply intentional, and not to convey the idea of malice, evil intent, or wantonness. Forfeitures are not favored by the law. Statutes providing forfeitures, and thereby imposing upon individuals penalties greater than the payment of the actual damages which their wrongful acts have caused others to suffer, are penal in their nature, and must be construed strictly against the persons claiming the forfeitures; practically the same rule of construction being adopted as is usually followed in the interpretation of criminal laws. See 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 654. In a penal statute the word "willful" generally means with a bad purpose; an evil purpose; without ground for believing the act to be lawful. Hateley v. State, 118 Ga. 81, 44 S. E. 852, and cit. While in interpreting statutes it is sometimes permissible to read "and" "or," we do not think that in a statute which imposes a forfeiture or a penalty this change in wording should be made by construction when by the terms of the statute as framed it requires the concurrence of two things to work a forfeiture or impose the penalty, and the result of a change in the verbiage would have the effect to bring about a forfeiture or penalty by an existence of only one of the two things. The statute, in effect, says that a forfeiture shall result whenever the tenant is guilty of both permissive and voluntary waste, and voluntary waste of that character which is committed wantonly and in such a way as to evidence an utter disregard for the rights of those who are thereafter to take. There was nothing in either the statute of Marlbridge or of Gloucester which required that acts of waste should be willful in the sense just referred to, and it may be that neither of these statutes was intended to apply to permissive waste; there being some language in each, and especially in the former, from which it might be inferred that the remedies provided in those acts were to be resorted to in case of voluntary waste only. But whether this be so or not it is unnecessary for us to determine, as we feel satisfied that our Code makes the forfeiture dependent not only on the concurrence of permissive and voluntary waste, but voluntary waste of that character which is above indicated. See, in this connection, Austell v. Swann, 74 Ga. 281. The tenant is liable in damages for waste of any character, but he is not liable to forfeiture unless he commits that character of waste which a court of equity would enjoin as equitable waste in a case where the tenant holds without impeachment of waste; and the rule is clear in such cases that the waste must be wanton, and committed in such a manner as to indicate an utter disregard of the rights of those who are thereafter to take. See Belt v. Simkins, 118 Ga. 894, 39 S. E. 430.

2. While a forfeiture of an estate for life will not result from waste unless there is both permissive and voluntary waste, and the latter is of the character above indicated, still the one who is to take after the termination of the life estate is entitled to damages for waste which is either permissive or voluntary. The permissive waste which, according to our Code, would authorize a recovery of damages, is that resulting from a failure to use the ordinary care of a prudent man for the preservation and protection of the property; and the voluntary waste is the commission of acts which tend to the permanent injury of him who is to take in the future. The tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property; the only restriction upon this use being that the estate of those who are to follow him in possession shall not be permanently diminished in value by neglecting to do that which an ordinarily prudent person would do in the preservation of his own property, or by doing those things which are not necessary to the full enjoyment of the particular estate, and which have the effect to permanently diminish the value of the future estate. Many things were held to be acts of waste at common law which would not be such in this state. The clearing of land was waste in England, but such is not waste in Georgia, provided the land cleared still leaves the proportion of cleared land to uncleared land such as an ordinarily prudent person would maintain upon his own property. Chapman v. Schroeder, 10 Ga. 325; Woodward v. Gates, 38 Ga. 205 (5); Small v. Slocumb, 112 Ga. 281, 37 S. E. 481, 53 L. R. A. 130, 81 Am. St. Rep. 50. The feudal system, which furnished the reasons for the common-law rule that a dowress was liable in damages for waste, and which brought about the statutes above referred to applying the same rule to other tenants for life, and imposing harsh penalties not known to the common law, never having been of force in this state, the harsh and stringent rules applied in some English cases in determining what was waste are not, and never were, suited to the conditions of our people, and therefore never became a part of our law. Therefore our law determines the question as to what is waste by looking alone at the rights of two individuals, one in possession of the estate for a limited time, and the other who is to take after the lapse of that time, without regard to any system of tenures of which the estates in question formed a component part. In England the courts were bound to look, not only to the rights of the individuals who were owners of the estate, but also to the rights of the lord paramount under the system which public policy demanded should be maintained. Therefore under our law the tenant for life must not be harassed and disturbed by the interference of the reversioner or remainderman, unless it be clearly shown that the rights of the latter as the ultimate owner of the property are imperiled by the conduct of the tenant. Dower is favored by the law, and a tenant in dower, of all other tenants, is entitled to the enjoyment of her estate free from the undue espionage and intermeddling of the heirs of her husband, or those who claim under them. When waste of a character which will work a forfeiture has been committed, the reversioner may elect either to claim damages or to claim immediate possession. Can he claim immediate possession, and also pray that, in the event his evidence does not authorize such claim, damages to the estate in reversion may be assessed? That is, can a suit be brought in which the petition contains two counts, one alleging facts upon which a forfeiture is claimed and immediate possession prayed for, and another allege facts upon which damages are claimed? It may be that under our liberal system this would be allowed, but certainly a petition which, although not separated into two counts in accordance with the rules of good pleading, has prayers in the alternative praying for a forfeiture if forfeiture is established, and, if not, for damages, would be maintainable unless there is a special demurrer filed at the first term complaining of the misjoinder and of the informal way in which the two claims are pleaded together. The petition in the present case being of the character just referred to, and there being no special demurrer to the same, the plaintiffs were entitled to have both issues submitted to the jury, and it was the duty of the judge to submit the same, even though no written request was made to that effect.

3. The evidence did not authorize a finding that the estate had been forfeited. But there was some evidence from which a jury might find that there was permissive waste proved in some instances, as well as acts of voluntary waste, which would result in a depreciation of the value of the inheritance, and thereby entitle the plaintiffs to damages. As the judge failed to submit the question of damages to the jury, a new trial should have been granted on this ground.

There was no error in allowing the doweress to testify as to the motive with which she committed the alleged acts of waste. See Acme Brewing Co. v. Railroad Co., 115 Ga. 495, 42 S. E. 8 (9); Baxley v. Baxley, 117 Ga. 62, 43 S. E. 436 (4). There was no error in failing to charge on the subject of a permanent injunction against waste, as the evidence did not show any threatened waste which rendered an injunction necessary. While the judge, in an equity case, may, in his discretion, submit the issues of fact to the jury by appropriate questions, the statute declares that he shall do this when either party makes a request to that effect after the case is called for trial, and before the beginning of the introduction of evidence. Civ. Code 1895, § 4849. The record does not show that the request that the case be submitted to the jury in the form of questions was made before the introduction of evidence, and this may have been the reason why the judge refused to submit the issues in this manner.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

LAMAR, J. (concurring specially). As clearly shown in the foregoing opinion by Judge COBB, the law applicable to the forfeiture of estates as contained in the Civil Code of 1895, § 8090, is peculiar to this state. It differs from that at common law and from the ancient English statutes. On this branch of the case, therefore, the decision cannot be controlled by a consideration of general authorities. The principle announced is far-reaching. It covers any life estate created by deed or will, and is not limited in its application to dower, the favorite of the law. While I concur in the judgment and in the ruling as to the effect of the evidence, I am unable to agree to the proposition announced in the first headnote that there must be a concurrence of permissive and voluntary waste before a forfeiture can result. The practical effect of that construction will be that in hardly any instance could a forfeiture result, no matter how great the waste or how serious the consequences to the remainderman. For rare, indeed, will be the case where the damage results from the operation both of action and inaction at the same time. Taking, for example, the case of a city lot with a house thereon, I understand the ruling to involve the proposition that, if the life tenant should permit the building to rot to the ground, no forfeiture could be declared, because, while the waste was permissive, it was not at the same time voluntary. On the other hand, if the life tenant should willfully tear down the house, a forfeiture could not result, because, though the waste was voluntary, it was not also permissive. But the result to the remainderman is the same, and the purpose of the statute is to protect him against both classes of misconduct. This is sought to be accomplished in each case in the same way, and by imposing a forfeiture as a penalty whether the waste be by acts of omission or commission. This view is sustained by the recognition in the Civil Code of 1895, § 3090, of the existence of the two classes of waste; by the separation of the two classes in the first sentence, although they are united by the word "and." The word "and" there is clearly separative, and operates as a disjunctive. It has the same effect in the last sentence, which deals with the two classes of acts out of which the forfeiture may grow. This is made specially apparent by an examination of the punctuation. "For the want of such care, and the willful commission of such acts, he forfeits his interest to the remainder." The use of the comma before the word "and" makes the last clause parenthetical, and fully justifies a reading that for the want of such care he forfeits his interest, and likewise for the willful commission of acts tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder he forfeits his interest to the remainder. The first sentence prohibits waste by permissive acts and also by voluntary acts. The penalty is adjusted to this double prohibition. It makes a forfeiture result from the want of such care, and also result from the willful commission of voluntary acts amounting to waste. Of course, forfeiture will never result from slight acts of waste. This is clearly involved in the language of the section. The penalty is imposed for such serious acts as tend to the permanent injury of the person in remainder, or to that class of negligence which fails to preserve and protect the corpus. But when by action or inaction the character, quality, or value of the property is being destroyed, the wrongdoer must suffer the penalty of a forfeiture. Nor can he complain, for it is brought about by his own disregard of the rights of the one who is to come after. Nor will it do to say that the remainderman has a remedy by injunction to stay waste, or for damages for waste already committed. The remainderman is frequently so far removed as not to know what is being done with the property. Injunction could not restore what had been destroyed. Damages might not be recoverable out of an insolvent life tenant. The adequate means by which the law secures the rights of one and the performance of duty by the other is the declaration in advance that a forfeiture shall result from these serious transgressions. And while forfeitures are not favored, they are not so far disfavored as to be unenforceable in a case expressly provided for by law.

In these views I am authorized to state that Justice FISH concurs.

DORSEY v. COLUMBUS R. CO.

ACTION FOR WRONGFUL DEATH—PETITION.

1. The amendments allowed when the case was returned to the court below did not cure the defect apparent in the petition when it was before this court on a former occasion (46 S. E. 635, 119 Ga. 363), to wit, that it was necessarily inferable from the plaintiff's allegations that her son, for whose homicide she sued, could, by the exercise of reasonable care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence; and it was therefore not error to sustain the demurrer to the petition as amended.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Columbus; J. L. Willis, Judge.

Action by Louis Dorsey against the Columbus Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. R. Hammond and John D. Little, for plaintiff in error. L. F. Garrard, F. U. Garrard, J. H. Martin, and Cecil Neill, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This case has once before been before this court on exceptions to the overruling of a demurrer to the plaintiff's original petition, and the judgment of the lower court was reversed on the ground that the petition showed that the plaintiff's decedent could, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence which it was alleged caused his death. See Columbus R. Co. v. Dorsey, 119 Ga. 363, 46 S. E. 635, for a full statement of the allegations of the original petition. When the case was again called in the court below, and before the remittitur from this court had been made the judgment of that court, the plaintiff, by leave of court, amended her petition. To the petition as amended the defendant again demurred, and its demurrer was sustained. Error is now assigned on the judgment sustaining the demurrer to the amended petition.

In the original petition it was alleged that the plaintiff's son, for whose homicide she sued, while in the exercise of his duty as a lineman of a telephone company on whose poles the wires of the defendant were strung, came in contact with a wire of the defendant from which the insulation had been negligently allowed to wear off, and that "by reason of said contact he received a heavy and dangerous charge of electricity through his body, by means of which he was instantly killed." From the opinion of Mr. Justice Turner delivered when the case was here before it appears that in the argument at that time "it was conceded by counsel for the defendant in error [now the plaintiff in error] that it was to be presumed that this unfortunate lineman did know that the wire of the plaintiff in error was strung upon the pole of the telephone company, and that he also knew that at or near the pole, and for several feet on each side of it, the wire was naked, or without necessary insulation." The amendment offered and allowed when the case went back to the lower court is not altogether consistent with the original petition. It is now alleged that "there would have been no danger in the said Claude Dorsey's coming in contact with said uninsulated wire unless he had likewise at the same time come in contact with some conductor connected with the earth, thereby completing an electrical circuit; that he passed the dangerous wire in safety going up the pole; and that by an accident the wood of the pole in which one of the spurs attached to his foot was fastened gave way, the spur slipped, and he fell in such a way that his foot came in contact with the defendant's uninsulated wire and his head with one of the wires of the telephone company, thus completing an electrical circuit, and causing his body to receive the current of electricity which brought about his death. It is also alleged that "said Claude Dorsey was not an experienced lineman, but was new in the business, * * * and because of his inexperience he did not know and fully understand the danger of coming in contact with said wire, unless at the same time he was handling the telephone wires above, and therefore was not guilty of negligence in coming in contact with the same, he not being engaged at the time in handling the telephone wires above, but only in fastening braces to the cross-arms which supported said telephone wires." Here, we think, is the key to the whole case. By necessary inference from the amendment Dorsey knew that an electrical circuit formed by the contact of his body with the uninsulated wire on the one hand and the grounded telephone wire on the other would be dangerous to life. He knew that the defendant's wire was defectively insulated, for he passed it on his way going up the pole. While not "handling" the telephone wires, he was in close proximity to them—fastening braces to the cross-arm that supported them. He must have known (there is no allegation to the contrary) that the position of a lineman at the top of a telephone pole is not secure, and that there is ever present the hazard of a slipping spur or a rotten piece of wood. With full knowledge of the defective insulation of the defendant's wire, and of the certainty of receiving the death-dealing current should he come in contact with that wire and another grounded wire at the same time, he placed himself in a position where that combination of circumstances was likely to be brought about, and was brought about. The amendment made no better case than did the original petition, and it was not error to sustain the demurrer.

DE FLORIN v. STATE.

LOTTERY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

1. A "suit club," whose members pay to a tailor $1 per week, and which holds weekly drawings, as a result of which the member holding the lucky number receives from the tailor a suit of clothes, and then ceases to be a member of the club, is a scheme in the nature of a lottery. This is so although an unlucky member, who continues to pay his $1 weekly for 30 weeks is entitled to a $30-dollar suit of clothes regardless of the result of the drawings.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Richard De Florin was convicted of carrying on a lottery, and brings error. Affirmed.

Chas. P. Pressley and Bryson Crane, for plaintiff in error. D. G. Fogarty, for the State.

CANDLER, J. The sole question presented for our decision is whether, under the facts stated below, the accused was guilty of the offense of carrying on a lottery. De Florin operated what was known as a "suit club." The plan of the club was as follows: Thirty men paid $1 each to De Florin, who was a tailor, and received cards bearing numbers from 1 to 30. Once a week slips of paper bearing numbers corresponding to those on the cards of the members were placed in a box, and some disinterested person drew therefrom one slip. The member who held the lucky number was then entitled to a suit of clothes made by De Florin, worth $30. This member then dropped out of the club, and his place was supplied by some one else. If a member paid $1 a week for 30 weeks he was entitled to a suit whether he drew the lucky number or not. We do not hesitate to hold that this scheme constituted a lottery. We do not deem it necessary to go into a full discussion of the law on this subject, for in the case of Meyer v. State, 112 Ga. 20, 37 S. E. 96, 51 L. R. A. 496, 81 Am. St. Rep. 17, Mr. Justice Cobb has given such an exhaustive review of the decisions of this and other courts in regard to lottery devices that nothing can be added thereto. We will merely quote from the opinion of Robertson, J., in Shumate's Case, 15 Grat. 653, which is quoted with approval in the Meyer Case, as covering the only point in the case at bar about which there can be the slightest doubt: "It is true that a bet does imply risk, but it does not necessarily imply risk in both parties. There must be between them a chance of gain and a chance of loss; but it does not follow that each of the parties to the bet must have both these chances. If, from the terms of the engagement, one of the parties may gain, but cannot lose, and the other may lose but cannot gain, and there must be either a gain by the one or a loss by the other, according to the happening of the contingency, it is as much a bet or wager as if the parties had shared equally the chances of gain and of loss." So, in the present case, the fact that a member who was unlucky in the drawing of prizes might, by continuing to pay $1 a week for 80 weeks, receive a suit of clothes regardless of the result of the drawings, does not make the transaction any the less a lottery, for the lucky members of the club won prizes varying in value from $1 to $29. We are clear that the rulings of the trial judge on the agreed statement of facts and on the demurrer to the accusation were correct.

GRINER v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFESSIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

1. It was not error to refuse to instruct the jury, as requested, that "evidence of confessions is the weakest and least to be relied on of any evidence known to be competent in law" (Calvin v. State, 44 S. E. 848, 118 Ga. 78), especially when the court charged the jury that confessions of guilt should be received with great caution, and that a confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction.

2. "The law of circumstantial evidence is not, without qualification, applicable in a case where the state proves a positive confession of guilt." Perry v. State, 36 S. E. 781, 110 Ga. 234. Therefore in such a case it was not error to fail "to charge the jury on the law of circumstantial evidence," or that, "to warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence, the proven facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused."

3. "When, after a proper preliminary examination as to their free and voluntary nature, confessions * * * are adjudged competent and received in evidence, there is no room for any question touching the propriety of having conducted the preliminary examination in the presence of the jury." Fletcher v. State, 17 S. E. 100, 90 Ga. 468.

4. The alleged confessions were properly held admissible.

5. The instructions given to the jury fully covered the requests to charge that "proof of the corpus delicti may be, but is not necessarily, sufficient corroboration of a confession of guilt," and that "the law does not fix the amount of corroboration—the jury are the judges."

6. Before a confession can be considered as evidence, it must appear to have been made voluntarily, without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury. Pen. Code 1895, § 1006.

(a) If induced by another, by hope of benefit or fear of injury, it is involuntary, although such inducement be held out by one person, and the confession be subsequently made to another, who has no knowledge of such inducement, and who offers none himself. Where there is evidence of a confession before the jury, it is for them to determine from all the evidence whether the confession was voluntary.

(b) Accordingly, where the principle is applicable to the case, either under the evidence or the statement of the accused, it is error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury, in compliance with a written request so to do, that if the accused made a confession under inducement of hope or fear previously held out by persons other than those to whom it was made, though not in the presence of those holding out the inducement, it should not be considered as evidence.

(c) In the present case the principle above announced was applicable, both under the evidence and the statement of the accused, and the refusal of the court to give in charge a written request properly setting forth such principle was cause for a new trial, even though the court otherwise properly instructed the jury upon the law of confessions.

GEORGIA & A. RY. et al. v. SHIVER.

DEED—DESCRIPTION—PAROL EVIDENCE—IDENTIFICATION—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. Where a deed conveys a warehouse and lot in a certain city and county and on the south side of a named street, "being the warehouse and lot formerly occupied by the A. P. & L. Warehouse and Compress Co., and now occupied by the Americus Grocery Co.," and there is a controversy as to the extent of the land conveyed, there is no error in admitting parol evidence to show what land had been occupied by the companies named. Nor is there any error in charging the jury that such evidence can be considered not to contradict, vary, or enlarge the terms of the deed, but to identify the land conveyed by the deed, and to ascertain what land is covered by the description in the deed.

2. The evidence was conflicting as to the extent of the possession of the companies above indicated, but was sufficient to support the verdict of the jury. That verdict having been approved by the trial judge, this court will not interfere with his discretion in refusing a new trial.

2. Because of its value, the ease with which it is taken from the field, and the difficulty of detecting the thief, the state may regulate the sale of seed cotton, and fix a punishment upon the person who buys in violation of the terms of the statute.

3. The question as to the constitutionality of the local act for Muscogee county is controlled in principle by the decision in Jenkins v. State, 46 S. E. 628, 119 Ga. 430.

4. The indictment followed the terms of the statute, and was not subject to demurrer because of the failure to describe the land on which the seed cotton was grown. The evidence supported the verdict, and it was not error to refuse to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Charles Bazemore was convicted of purchasing seed cotton in violation of law, and brings error. Affirmed.

Bazemore was charged with the offense of a misdemeanor, for that, without the written consent of the owner of the land whereon the same was produced, and without the written consent of the agent of such owner, he did, between the 1st of August and the 20th of December, to wit, on the 10th of November, unlawfully purchase 98 pounds of cotton in the seed from one Leonard Huling. The defendant demurred on the ground that the local act creating such an offense (Acts 1889, p. 1391) was void under the Constitutions of Georgia and of the United States, in that it deprived a person of the use of his property without due process of law, and deprived a citizen of the rights, privileges, and immunities created by the Constitution of Georgia and of the United States, and was not a valid exercise of the police power of the state. He specially demurred for the further reason that the indictment did not set forth or describe the premises whereon the cotton was grown, or the name of the owner thereof, so that the defendant could be informed of what he was expected to defend. The demurrer was overruled. The evidence showed that Huling got the seed cotton from Bryant; that he carried it to Bazemore, who asked to let him have the cotton; whereupon Huling said he understood that everybody could not buy cotton without a license; to which Bazemore replied that there was no such law, and that anybody could buy cotton who wanted to. Thereupon Huling sold the cotton to Bazemore for $3. He carried no written order of any kind allowing him to sell the cotton; did not know on whose land the cotton was raised. The defendant was convicted, and assigns error on overruling the demurrer and refusing to grant a new trial.

T. T. Miller, for plaintiff in error. S. P. Gilbert, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). The right to be at large without the right to act would be but to live in a prison of extended bounds. The liberty which is guaranteed by the Constitution means far more than freedom from servitude. An integral and essential element is the right to use all one's powers of mind and body, to engage in any lawful occupation upon such terms as he may choose, and to make contracts with other citizens who are as free as himself. Presumptively every one may agree upon the terms on which he will sell his own property or buy that of another. This right can only be limited and made penal by necessity of preserving the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, included in which would be the necessity of protecting the property of the public. Instances may be found in liquor laws; in statutes requiring the written consent of parents or friends before liquor or opium can be sold to certain persons; the requirement as to inspection of fertilizers, turpentine, flour, and similar statutes too numerous to mention. The act in question is in pursuance of the police power (Civ. Code 1895, § 5734), which includes the right on the part of the state "to enact rules for the conduct of the most necessary and common occupations, when, from their nature, they offer peculiar opportunities for imposition and fraud." Cooley's Con. Lim. (7th Ed.) 887; Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 41 et seq., 2 Sup. Ct. 44, 27 L. Ed. 370. Seed cotton, while an article of value, is not ordinarily an article of commerce. Usually it is ginned and packed before being offered for sale. Even small quantities, however, are so much more valuable than similar weight of corn, wheat, oats, or other farm products, as to afford special temptation for petty larceny. When stolen from the field of the owner, it is almost impossible to be identified. It is therefore especially difficult to make laws relating to larceny or receiving stolen goods effective in preventing the crime by punishing the thief. The evil is sought to be met by prohibiting the sale at night, or, as in the act now under consideration, by requiring the written consent of the owner of the land on which it was grown, so as thereby to afford a means by which the property may be traced, and the thief punished if it was in fact unlawfully taken. The present case does not involve any question as to what language must be used in such consent, or whether a bill of sale from the planter would be sufficient. The validity of a similar statute was recognized in Jenkins v. State, 119 Ga. 430, 46 S. E. 629. To require the state to prove the ownership or to describe the land on which the cotton had been grown would nullify the statute as completely as to declare it unconstitutional. There is no rule of pleading which requires a decision which would bring about such a result. The indictment follows the statute, and was not subject to the demurrer. Compare Pen. Code 1895, § 929; Hill v. Dalton, 72 Ga. 314 (1); Williams v. State, 89 Ga. 483, 15 S. E. 552.

SHROUDER v. STATE.

INDICTMENT—SURPLUSAGE—WITNESS—USE OF MEMORANDA—CRIMINAL TRESPASS—EVIDENCE.

1. Allegations in an indictment, wholly foreign to any element in the offense charged, may be disregarded as surplusage, and need not be proved. The rule is otherwise as to averments which are descriptive of some element in the offense, though more precise and detailed than was absolutely necessary.

2. A witness may use any written instrument for the purpose of refreshing his recollection, provided he ultimately testifies from his recollection as thus refreshed, even though he did not himself write the instrument.

3. While it is not necessary to allege, in an indictment under Pen. Code 1895, § 219, par. 3, that the act of trespass was done "willfully," a conviction cannot be had where the act was done without any criminal intent; and where the act alleged to be a trespass was committed in good faith under a claim of ownership, there can be no lawful conviction.

4. The evidence did not authorize the verdict, and the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from City Court of Vienna; D. L. Henderson, Judge.

S. C. Shrouder was convicted of removing the fence of another without his consent, and brings error. Reversed.

Pearson Ellis and Crum & Jones, for plaintiff in error. E. F. Strozler and Whipple & McKenzie, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. 1. The indictment was under Pen. Code 1895, § 219, par. 3, and, in addition to charging the accused with pulling down and removing the fence of the prosecutor without his consent, alleged that this was done after the accused had been personally forbidden to do so by the prosecutor. The allegation that the accused had been forbidden by the prosecutor to pull down the fence was entirely unnecessary. It related to no element which was a necessary ingredient of the offense charged, and therefore could be properly treated as surplusage, and not necessary to be proved. See 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 478; Tigner v. State, 119 Ga. 114, 45 S. E. 1001.

2. A witness who was being examined as to the existence of certain mortgages was allowed to refresh his recollection by referring to the record of mortgages, and after so doing testified positively that his recollection was refreshed, and that, when so refreshed, he could recall distinctly the facts referred to in the papers. This evidence was objected to on the ground that a witness could not refresh his recollection by referring to a paper which he did not himself prepare. The Code declares: "A witness may refresh and assist his memory by the use of any written instrument or memorandum, provided he finally speaks from his recollection thus refreshed, or is willing to swear positively from the paper." Civ. Code 1895, § 5284. In Printup v. James, 73 Ga. 583, Mr. Chief Justice Jackson doubted whether it was possible for the recollection of a witness to be refreshed by an instrument which he did not prepare. In Lenney v. Finley, 118 Ga. 427, 45 S. E. 817, there is, however, a distinct ruling that the recollection of a witness may be refreshed by such an instrument, provided he ultimately swears from his recollection as thus refreshed; but that, in order to testify positively from the paper itself he must either have made the paper himself, or at some time when the facts were fresh in his memory knew the facts stated in the paper to be correct.

3. 4. In Wilcher v. State, 118 Ga. 196, 44 S. E. 995, it was held that an indictment under the paragraph of the section under which the present indictment was framed need not allege that the act of trespass was done "willfully"; but it was not ruled that one could be convicted under that paragraph where the act was done in good faith under a claim of ownership. While the act need not be willful, the element of criminal intent must be present; and while this intent might be presumed from the act, where nothing more appeared, yet where it is affirmatively shown that the trespass was committed in good faith under the belief that the accused was the owner of the land, the presumption of criminal intent is rebutted, and there can be no conviction. An honest mistake might result in civil liability for the wrong, but the party committing the trespass would not, by reason of such mistake, be subject to a criminal prosecution. The prosecutor claimed to own the land and the fence. The accused claimed to own the land, and therefore asserted what she believed was her right to remove the fence, which she did because it interfered with the cultivation of the land. The question of ownership of the land is, under the evidence, close and doubtful. The husband of the accused was at one time owner of the land. He conveyed it to Mrs. Clements. After this conveyance a homestead was set apart to the husband as the head of a family. The conveyance to Mrs. Clements was for the purpose of securing a debt due to her. After the death of the husband, Mrs. Clements was proceeding to eject the accused, and Raines, at the request of the accused, seems to have paid up an amount which satisfied Mrs. Clements' claim upon the land, and a deed was made to Raines. There was an agreement between the accused and Raines that he should hold title to the property, not only until the amount paid Mrs. Clements was repaid, but also an additional sum which the accused owed to him. The accused claims that she has paid Raines the entire sum that she owed him. It is claimed by Raines that he and the accused agreed to divide the land—the accused to take the south half and he the north half; that a deed was made and delivered to the accused by virtue of this agreement; and that thereafter Raines sold the north half to the prosecutor. The accused admits the existence and payment of the Clements claim by Raines, but she denies the agreement as to the division of the land, and denies that she ever accepted the deed to the south half, though she admits that the paper was delivered to her son, who was living with her, and attending to her business, and that it was found among his papers after his death. The rights of Raines, and therefore of the prosecutor, depend largely upon the question as to what interest in the land the homestead attached to. If it attached to the equity of redemption after the payment of the Clements claim, the accused had no right, after the death of her husband, to sell or incur this homestead interest; and a deed from her to any interest in the property to which the homestead had attached would be absolutely void. See Whittle v. Samuels, 54 Ga. 548. From what has been stated it is apparent that this controversy between the accused and the prosecutor is not one which the law contemplates as proper for solution upon the criminal side of the court. What might be the legal rights of the accused claiming under her husband or the equities of the prosecutor claiming under Raines are questions too intricate and delicate to be settled by a jury in the trial of a misdemeanor case. A new trial should have been granted on the ground that there was no evidence to authorize the verdict.

It has been more than once said by this court that the indictable trespass act of 1866 was not intended to be used as a substitute for the action of ejectment, and we avail ourselves of this opportunity to announce that neither was it intended that it should take in our jurisprudence the office or dignity of a bill in equity.

CARRIERS—DELIVERY OF BAGGAGE—DELAY—DAMAGES.

1. Where a traveling salesman, whose compensation is based on commissions on such orders secured by him as his employer approves, shipped his trunks of samples over the line of a common carrier, and they were unreasonably delayed, he cannot, in a suit for breach of the contract to convey, recover as damages for such delay the profits from orders which, tested by past experience, he would have secured during the period he was without his trunks. Such damages are too remote and speculative, grow out of an enterprise collateral to the contract to ship the trunks, and are not such as the parties contemplated when the contract was made as the natural result of its breach. HARRELL v. STATE.

ARSON—OWNERSHIP — EVIDENCE—WITNESS — IMPEACHMENT—CONSPIRACY — ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATING TESTIMONY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The offense of arson is not so much against the property interest in the house as it is against the security of the house, and an allegation of ownership in an indictment is sustained by proof of occupancy by the alleged owner under a claim of right. There was no error in admitting the evidence complained of, to establish the ownership of the burned building.

2. While it is competent to show any relevant fact indicating that a witness is testifying as he does because of inducements influencing him to favor one of the parties to a case, it is not competent to establish that fact by proof of an appeal for clemency made by the prosecuting attorney in his argument to the jury in another case, in which the witness whose credit is sought to be attacked was the defendant.

3. The evidence established a conspiracy between the accomplice and the accused, and the acts of the accomplice pending the criminal enterprise were admissible against the defendant.

4. In a case of felony, where the evidence relied on for a conviction is that of an accomplice and circumstances corroborating his testimony, it is not error to charge that the corroborating circumstances, independently of the accomplice's testimony, should be such as lead to the inference of the defendant's guilt, and that grave suspicions raised by the circumstances would not be a sufficient corroboration of the accomplice's testimony to authorize a conviction.

5. A defendant is entitled to a concrete application of the law to the particular facts of a case, if he presents a timely written request to charge, but he is not entitled to an elaboration of the abstract law upon a single phase of the case to such an extent as will give to it undue prominence.

6. There was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Webster County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

A. S. Harrell was convicted of arson, and brings error. Affirmed.

Blalock & Cobb, J. W. Walters, and Geo. Y. Harrell, for plaintiff in error. F. A. Hooper, Sol. Gen., J. B. Hudson, S. R. Stevens, J. F. Souther, and S. P. Gilbert, for the State.

EVANS, J. H. B. Morgan and A. S. Harrell were jointly indicted for the offense of arson at the April term, 1904, of Webster superior court. The defendant Morgan was tried at that term and convicted, and on review of the case by this court his conviction was upheld. See 120 Ga. 499, 48 S. E. 238. At the next term of the court, Harrell was put on trial, and was convicted under the first count in the indictment, charging him with being a joint principal. On this trial Morgan was offered as a witness for the state, and his testimony was to the effect that Harrell was the actual perpetrator of the crime. There was other testimony tending to connect him therewith. To the overruling of his motion for a new trial he expects.

1. The first ground of the amended motion was abandoned. The second, third, fourth, and fifth grounds relate to the admission of evidence touching the ownership of the building described in the indictment, which was therein alleged to be the "frame storehouse of J. R. Stapleton, who then and there owned and occupied [the same] as trustee in bankruptcy of the corporation of Stapleton & Nicholson Company." The court allowed J. R. Stapleton to testify that he was at the time of the fire in possession of this storehouse as trustee in bankruptcy of the Stapleton & Nicholson Company, which was a chartered company. The court then admitted a certificate of the referee in bankruptcy that Stapleton had been appointed trustee of the bankrupt corporation, and also the judgment adjudicating that company a bankrupt, signed by the referee.

In cases of arson the offense is not so much against the property interest in the house as it is against the security of the house, and an allegation of ownership in an indictment is sustained by proof of the occupancy of the alleged owner under a claim of right. Even if it was error to allow the witness to testify that his possession was that of a trustee in bankruptcy, the error was cured by the subsequent admission of the certificate of his appointment as trustee by the referee in bankruptcy. This certificate was admissible to prove that fact. Morgan v. State, 120 Ga. 502, 48 S. E. 238. The adjudication of bankruptcy was not necessary to establish the appointment of the trustee by the referee; the regularity of such appointment not being in issue, and the presumption being that there had previously been a proper adjudication of bankruptcy.

2. It appears that one Bill Ellis Sheppard had been tried at the same term of court for the crime of murder, that the same counsel who was conducting the state's case against Harrell was employed in the prosecution of Sheppard, and that this attorney, in his argument to the jury in the Sheppard case, appealed to the jury to recommend a sentence of life imprisonment in the event they should find him guilty. The accused offered to prove these facts for the purpose of showing that Sheppard, who testified as a witness for the state in the present case, was induced by the appeal for leniency made by the prosecuting attorney in his case to give testimony favorable to the state in its prosecution of Harrell. The court very properly rejected this proffered evidence. While it is competent to show any relevant fact indicating that a witness is testifying as he does because of inducements influencing him to favor one of the parties to a case, it is certainly not competent to establish that fact by the declarations of a prosecuting attorney, made during the trial of another case, in which the witness was interested. What counsel said to the jury in the Sheppard case did not amount to an inducement held out to him to swear falsely in the present case. It was res inter alios acta. The testimony rejected was not such as would have justified the jury in discrediting the testimony of Sheppard, on the theory that, in testifying as he did, he was undertaking to pay a debt of gratitude which he thought he owed to the prosecuting attorney for the manner in which he had conducted the prosecution against him (the witness). He had been convicted, and was paying the penalty of his crime; and, for aught that appears, he had nothing to gain or to lose by swearing to what he knew concerning the commission of the crime then under investigation.

3. Exception is taken to the refusal of the court to rule out the testimony of one Jim Jordan as to what Morgan did with reference to procuring a bottle of oil from one Ollie Jordan. The motion to rule out this testimony was put upon the ground that proof of the acts of Morgan was inadmissible until after the alleged conspiracy between him and the accused was shown. When this testimony was first brought out, no objection to it was made, and the motion to rule it out was presented after the state had introduced all of its direct evidence. At the time the motion was made, there was evidence tending to establish the alleged conspiracy, and therefore the court rightly declined to sustain the motion.

4. Complaint is made of the following charge of the court: "Now, in that respect, gentlemen, I charge you that the corroborating circumstances must be such as to satisfy the jury, and it should be such as, independent of the accomplice's testimony, to lead to the inference, that the defendant is guilty. It must be such as, independently of the accomplice's testimony, to lead to the inference that the defendant is guilty. And grave suspicions raised by the circumstances would not, under the law, be a sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice to authorize a conviction." The contention is that this charge was misleading and calculated to confuse the minds of the jury, and was an incorrect statement of the law. There cannot lawfully be a conviction of a felony where the only witness is an accomplice unless his testimony is aided by proof of corroborating circumstances. Pen. Code 1895, § 991. But "it is not essential that the corroborating testimony shall in and of itself be sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty, or that the testimony of the accomplice shall be corroborated in every material particular." Dixon v. State, 116 Ga. 186, 42 S. E. 357 (7). The charge of the court to which exception is taken was a correct statement of the law with reference to the sufficiency of the corroboration of an accomplice. If the aliunde evidence be such as to lead to the inference that the accused is guilty, it will be sufficient. The judge expressly cautioned the jury that grave suspicion raised by the circumstances would not be sufficient to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice, but the corroborating circumstances should and must be of a character which, independently of his testimony, lead to the inference of the defendant's guilt. This was a clear statement of the law on the subject, and the charge is not open to the objections urged against it.

5. Twelve written requests were presented to the judge, invoking instructions on the subject of reasonable doubt and the probative force of circumstantial evidence. None of these requests contained a concrete application of the law to the particular facts of the case on trial, but set forth a mere abstract statement as to what would or would not raise a reasonable doubt in cases where the state relied for a conviction on circumstantial evidence. The charge of the court is set forth in full in the record, and an examination of the same discloses that the judge gave an exhaustive instruction to the jury as to the law bearing on reasonable doubt, and as to the degree and strength of the circumstantial evidence required to authorize a conviction. It has been held that "in a close and doubtful case it is error for the judge to refuse to give to the jury, upon an appropriate written request submitted in due time, a charge applying to the facts, as shown by the evidence for the party making the request, the law applicable thereto," and that in such a case the error is one which requires the grant of a new trial, "although the judge, in his charge, states the abstract principle of law applicable to those facts." Roberts v. State, 114 Ga. 450, 40 S. E. 297. But even conceding that each of the written requests embodied a correct statement of the abstract law as heretofore announced by this court, the trial judge properly declined to give them in charge, for to have done so would have been to unduly stress this feature or phase of the case. A defendant is entitled to a concrete application of the law to the peculiar facts of the case if he presents a timely written request to charge, but he is not entitled to an elaboration of the abstract law upon a single phase of the case to such an extent as will give to it undue prominence. The court having fully charged the law upon the subjects covered by the requests to charge, it was not error to refuse to give them in charge.

6. There was abundant evidence to establish the fact that the crime charged in the indictment had been committed by some one, the fire evidently having been of incendiary origin. It is contended, however, that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, in that there were no corroborating circumstances shown connecting the accused with the perpetration of that offense. The record discloses that Morgan, the alleged accomplice, was a relative and boon companion of Harrell; that for many months prior to the commission of the crime they had been on unusually intimate terms, had led a more or less intemperate and dissipated life, and were frequently seen together. One entire side of the town of Preston was burned. One of the storehouses was owned by a corporation in which a relative of Harrell had an interest, but, whatever this interest was, it had been lost because of the insolvency of the corporation. The mercantile firm of Cobb & Montgomery occupied a store in the burned district. This firm, a short time before the fire, had caused a levy to be made on property belonging to the defendant's father, and the defendant had expressed resentment towards the members of that firm for causing the levy to be made. A few days before the fire the accused procured a warrant to be issued against a nephew of Mr. Nicholson, a stockholder of the Stapleton & Nicholson Company. The defendant said to a witness who was discussing the proposed prosecution of Nicholson's nephew that, if the witness had come to intercede for the young man at the instance of Nicholson, he would not entertain the idea of abandoning the prosecution, because "Nicholson hadn't treated him right." "Harrell seemed to be fretted with" Nicholson, and "used some rough language in connection with" this statement; expressing at the same time his suspicion that Nicholson had sent the witness to him in order to persuade him to withdraw the warrant. The defendant "seemed to be mad" because of Nicholson's attempt to thus shield his nephew, as he supposed, and told the witness about "some trouble that his father and Nicholson had about some property . . . that Nicholson had sold them," saying "he wouldn't show him any favors unless he would whack up with them about a piece of property that had been sold to them" in the town of Preston. Defendant went so far as to say that, were it not for the witness, "he would be glad to see the town burned or sunk, or something of that kind." Just before dark on the night of the fire, the defendant and Morgan left the town of Pre-ton in the former's buggy, and drove to his house, where they took supper. Morgan was drunk. Defendant left his house with Morgan immediately after supper, but returned about 11 o'clock that night, and was not again seen at home until the next morning about daylight. There was then clearly visible on his forehead a red mark, such as might have been made by the band of a hat pulled tightly down upon his head, and worn so for some time, from which fact one of the witnesses who swore he was at the house said he had inferred that the defendant had but recently returned home. The morning of the fire, defendant was seen about 8 o'clock in Preston, in the near vicinity of the burned district, sitting in his buggy; yet, two hours later, when told by an acquaintance whom he met on the road some distance from Preston that there had been a fire in the town, the defendant affected surprise at this information, and expressed his regret that the town had been burned. It also appeared that Morgan was arrested the day after the fire, and that after his arrest the defendant said to Morgan's wife: "I am expecting them after me every minute." He further told her that, if she "knew anything to keep it to [herself]. It was always best." The state introduced further testimony tending to establish its contention that the accused, in company with Morgan, went to the plantation of the defendant's father about 11 o'clock on the morning of the day before the fire occurred, and that they sought to procure a negro living on the plantation to burn the town, but he refused to do so, whereupon Morgan said, "If you are afraid to burn up Preston, by God! I ain't," and "Harrell laughed at that," and went off with Morgan in his buggy, driving towards Preston. The accused admitted having been away from his home during the night of the fire, and not returning with his horse and buggy until daylight, but attempted to establish an alibi by showing he had not driven to Preston, but in another direction, to the house of a relative, where he had stayed until early in the morning. According to the defendant's statement, and the testimony of the witnesses he offered to establish this alibi, all of whom were relatives, he left home after supper with Morgan, but returned alone about 11 o'clock; then, remembering that a relative who owed him some money for cotton seed contemplated moving to another county, he drove to the house of this relative, some six miles distant, where he sat up the remainder of the night talking with his kinsman in a room wherein his relative's wife, recently confined, was lying in bed. Notwithstanding his express purpose was, he said, to collect a debt, one of the witnesses testifying in his behalf swore that he made no demand on his relative for the money. After sitting up the remainder of the night, as stated, the defendant declined to take breakfast at his relative's house, and, according to his statement, left in his buggy shortly before daylight, arriving at his home about sunup. The account given by the defendant as to his movements and whereabouts after leaving his home at 11 o'clock at night, on the errand stated, was a most improbable story, viewed in the light of the circumstances brought to light by the evidence introduced by the state, viz., his expression of a wish to see the town of Preston burned or sunk, were it not for a single person, towards whom he felt friendly, and who he did not desire to injure; his attempt to procure a negro on the plantation of his father to burn the town by setting fire to the building in which the fire originated; his close association with Morgan, who had been jointly indicted with him for the crime, and who had been found guilty, and who testified that the defendant was the actual perpetrator of the offense with which they had been charged; the defendant's feigned ignorance of the occurrence after he had driven to town early in the morning and had viewed the burned district; his ill feelings towards at least three of the property owners who had suffered by the fire, and his indifference for others for whom he felt no friendship; and, lastly, his cherishing of a grievance against the town because of a general dislike for its inhabitants, who, he asserted, had shown him no consideration or regard. These and other circumstances, such as the remarks he made to Mrs. Morgan indicating that he had reason to apprehend his arrest, were sufficient to connect him with the commission of the crime, irrespective of Morgan's testimony. It was not necessary that the testimony of Morgan, his alleged accomplice, should be corroborated in every material particular. The corroboration which the law requires is that the circumstances shall, independently of the testimony of an accomplice, connect the accused with the perpetration of the offense charged. The testimony relied on by the state met this requirement of the law. The verdict of the jury has the approval of the presiding judge, and no reason is shown why it should be set aside.

OGLESBY v. STATE.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—TITLE OF ACT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—INDICTMENT—PROHIBITION—ELECTION—JUDICIAL NOTICE—GRAND JURY—SPECIAL PRESENTMENT—CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—NEW TRIAL—EVIDENCE.

1. The title of an act being "An act to prohibit the sale of" liquors of a given character, in a named county, "and for other purposes therein mentioned," legislation in the body of the act was authorized, providing that the prohibition against the sale of the liquors should not become effective in such county until an election was had, and the result was in favor of such prohibition. See Mayor of Macon v. Hughes, 36 S. E. 247, 110 Ga. 795; Mayor of Americus v. Perry, 40 S. E. 1004, 114 Ga. 871, 57 L. R. A. 230.

2. When an act makes penal the sale of intoxicating liquors, and in a subsequent section provides that the prohibition shall not prevent practicing physicians from furnishing such liquors to their patients, it is not necessary, in an indictment for a violation of the act, to allege that the sale was not by a practicing physician. Kitchens v. State, 43 S. E. 258, 116 Ga. 847; Rumph v. State, 45 S. E. 1002, 119 Ga. 121.

3. The courts will take judicial notice of the result of a prohibition election, whether the same was held under the general local option liquor law, or a local act providing for such election. Woodard v. State, 30 S. E. 522, 103 Ga. 498, and citations.

4. When in the progress of an investigation of a case by the grand jury it develops from the testimony of a witness that an offense has been committed altogether disconnected from the case under consideration, it is entirely proper for the grand jury to cause a special presentment to be preferred for such offense, and require the witness to appear and be sworn on the consideration of the presentment thus preferred. It is not only the privilege, but the duty, of the grand jury to present all offenders where the offense comes to their knowledge during the time of their service, and it is immaterial in what way the information is received.

5. Where a motion is made to continue a criminal case upon the ground that the accused is physically unable to go to trial, and upon such question the testimony of medical experts introduced as witnesses is conflicting, the discretion of the trial judge in overruling the motion will not be controlled. McDaniel v. State, 30 S. E. 29, 103 Ga. 269.

6. That a person accused of crime was improperly brought into court under an order of the judge cannot properly be made a ground of a motion for new trial. McDaniel v. State, supra.

7. When a criminal case is called for trial, and a motion for a continuance is made, the judge has a discretion to either continue the case, or postpone the same until a later day in the term; and this is true whether the term lasts longer than 30 days or not. The act of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 56) now embraced in Pen. Code 1895, § 961, does not interfere with the exercise of this discretion by the judge; that act merely providing that, where the court lasts more than 30 days, a continuance shall not be had if the ground upon which it is sought can be removed before the end of the term.

8. It is not an abuse of discretion to refuse to postpone a case to a later hour in the day, in order to allow counsel time to prepare a demurrer and plea, when no reason appears why such demurrer and plea were not prepared before the case was called for trial; and when it appears that the matters upon which the plea was based could have been ascertained before the case was called, and that the court suspended the trial in order to allow counsel time to prepare the demurrer and plea, such refusal will not be held erroneous.

9. Even if a motion to continue a criminal case can be properly entertained in the absence of the accused, the judge is not required to do so. If the absence is due to providential cause, this will be a sufficient answer to a rule nisi on a forfeiture of the bond.

10. The evidence authorized the verdict, and no sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

Error from City Court of Elberton; P. P. Proffitt, Judge.

N. B. Oglesby was convicted for violation of the liquor law, and brings error. Affirmed.

Sam L. Olive, for plaintiff in error. Thos. J. Brown, Sol., for the State.

COBB, J. The accused was arraigned in the city court of Elberton upon a presentment charging him with a violation of a local act prohibiting the sale of liquor in Elbert county. Acts 1884-85, p. 520. He filed a general and special demurrer and plea in abatement to the presentment, each of which being overruled, he filed a plea of not guilty. After conviction he made a motion for a new trial, and assigns error upon the overruling of this motion, and on the overruling of the demurrer and plea in abatement.

The principles stated in the headnotes are controlling upon the various questions involved. While the record does disclose some irregularity in the manner in which the accused was brought into court for trial, this irregularity did not afford any reason for granting a new trial. If the accused, after having been brought into court, had moved for a discharge upon the ground that he was in the custody of his bail, who had not surrendered him, and that the court could not proceed to bring him into court by force until his bond had been forfeited, he might have been entitled to a release. But if the judge committed any error in this respect, it cannot be taken advantage of by a motion for a new trial. A ruling of the court in reference to the matter should have been invoked, and exceptions pendente lite filed if the ruling was adverse to the accused. The case of McDaniel v. State, cited in the headnotes, seems to be controlling, in principle, upon this point. We see no reason for reversing the judgment in this case.

COOPER v. STATE.

WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SERVICE.

1. Under the decision in Bush v. Keaton, 65 Ga. 296, where it does not affirmatively appear that service of a bill of exceptions was made or waived after the certificate of the presiding judge was attached, the writ of error must be dismissed upon motion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Douglas; Levi O'Steen, Judge.

Jim Cooper was convicted of cheating, and brings error. Dismissed.

R. A. Hendricks, for plaintiff in error. M. D. Dickerson, Sol., and W. C. Lankford, for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. After conviction of cheating and swindling, Cooper sued out a bill of exceptions complaining of the overruling of a demurrer to the indictment, and of the refusal of the lower court to grant a new trial. From the bill of exceptions it appears that the motion for new trial was overruled on October 22, 1904. When the bill of exceptions was certified, does not appear; the certificate being undated. Under date of November 2, 1904, counsel for the state acknowledged "due and legal service of the within bill of exceptions," and waived "copy and all other and further notice and service." In this court a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that "it does not appear that the bill of exceptions was certified before the acknowledgment of service by the solicitor of the city court of Douglas." In support of this motion several cases were cited—among them, that of Bush v. Keaton, 65 Ga. 296. There was no request to review and overrule that case, and it is controlling here. Its facts were almost identical with those of the present case, and the writ of error was dismissed because the acknowledgment did not affirmatively appear to have been made after the judge had certified the bill of exceptions. It is true that the case as reported appears to have been put upon two grounds, and that both headnotes were made by the reporter; but an examination of the minutes of this court shows that the judgment of the court was put upon one ground, which was that just stated. That case is therefore controlling here, and must be followed. Civ. Code 1895, § 5586, is not applicable here. Under that section an undated certificate will be presumed to have been in time, but the section does not otherwise afford any presumption as to the date of a certificate. It is no authority for presuming that a dated acknowledgment was made after the undated certificate, when the contrary might have been true, and the certificate still have been made in time. Vickers v. Sanders, 106 Ga. 266, 32 S. E. 102.

McDUFFIE v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 26, 1905.)

ARREST—DE FACTO MARSHAL—MURDER—MANSLAUGHTER—EXCESSIVE FORCE—THREATS—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—FLIGHT—REMARKS OF COURT—INSTRUCTIONS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. A de facto marshal of a municipal corporation is authorized to make an arrest. Robinson v. State, 9 S. E. 523, 82 Ga. 535.

2. In view of the evidence, there was no error in refusing to charge that the deceased had no right to arrest the defendant. Burns v. State, 7 S. E. 88, 80 Ga. 547.

3. Had the arrest been lawful, and conducted in a lawful manner, the admitted killing would have been murder.

4. The verdict of manslaughter necessarily implies that the jury found that the arrest was either originally unlawful or that the officer put himself beyond the cover and protection of his authority by the use of undue violence, but that such violence was not sufficient to arouse the fears of a reasonable man, so as to make the killing justifiable.

5. An officer may lawfully arrest his bitterest enemy, or he may unlawfully arrest his best friend. The legality of the arrest, the right of the defendant to resist the use of excessive force in making it effectual, and the extent of his right to resist if it was originally unlawful, were entirely independent of the motive actuating the marshal.

6. The evidence as to the threats by the deceased to make an arrest and of threats by the defendant to kill in resisting arrest warranted the charge of the court, and fully sustained his statement as to the contentions of the parties.

7. While the defendant could show that the state's witness had unkindly feelings toward him, it was not competent to go into details of the difficulty between the witness and the defendant.

8. The fact that a witness may have been in a lewd house was irrelevant to any issue on trial, and it was not error for the court to refuse to compel him to answer the inquiry as to why he was there.

9. The refusal to permit a witness to testify that five days after the homicide he saw bruises and contusions on the defendant's head was not harmful, other undisputed evidence as to the bruises upon the head of defendant immediately after the killing having been submitted by other witnesses.

10. The marshal's stick was before the jury, who could determine as well as a nonexpert whether it was a weapon likely to produce death. Moran v. State, 48 S. E. 324, 120 Ga. 848.

11. There was not enough to connect the absence of the knobs on the stick with the violent use thereof at the time of the killing to warrant a reversal because of a failure to allow evidence that the knobs were on the stick a considerable time before the homicide and absent therefrom some time after the killing.

12. The only evidence as to flight was offered by the defendant, with his explanation thereof. It was not, under the circumstances detailed in the record, error to exclude evidence of a voluntary surrender, offered by a witness for the defendant before the conclusion of the state's case in rebuttal of a theory not then advanced.

13. The introductory remark of the court as to the importance of the case because involving a matter of death or imprisonment could not have harmed the defendant. The contention that it excluded the idea of acquittal is not sustained by the record, it appearing that in immediate connection therewith the judge impressed upon the jury the fact that they were as much under obligation to acquit an innocent man as to convict one who was guilty.

14. The assignments relating to the instructions of the judge on the subject of murder are immaterial, the jury not having found the defendant guilty of murder, but of manslaughter.

15. The charge as to manslaughter was correct, and, if the defendant desired more specific instructions on that subject, appropriate requests therefor should have been submitted in writing.

16. So far as the requests to charge were proper, they were included in the general instructions given by the court.

17. The newly discovered evidence was either cumulative or impeaching in its nature. The evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain the verdict. No error of law requiring the grant of a new trial appears.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Ashley McDuffie was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

Ashley McDuffie was charged with the murder of John Blue and found guilty of voluntary manslaughter. He made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. While the killing was admitted, the evidence was sharply conflicting as to the circumstances attending the homicide. For the state there was evidence tending to show that Blue was marshal of Pineview; that, hearing firing of pistols in the corporate limits, he went towards the place where the shots were fired, and met McDuffie returning from that locality. A witness for the state testified that McDuffie fired the shot. This was denied by defendant and another witness. When the marshal met McDuffie, a conversation took place between them as to whether McDuffie had fired the weapon, during which time it is claimed that McDuffie became boisterous, and cursed, and when threatened with arrest stated that he would not submit; that Blue put his hand upon him, telling him to consider himself under arrest. Immediately thereafter blows passed, though who struck first did not appear from the evidence for the state. That for the defense was to the effect that Blue struck the first blow with his club. There was some evidence as to a blow on Blue's head and of blows and contusions on the head of McDuffie. In the altercation McDuffie fired, killing Blue. There was also evidence that in talking to a party who had been arrested by Blue, McDuffie said the latter could not arrest him, and that he had procured a pistol on the day of the homicide, stating that he was going to kill a man with it if he tried to arrest him that night; and that on another occasion he stated if Blue ever attempted to arrest him he was going to kill him. For the defense this was denied. There was testimony of statements by Blue that he wanted an opportunity to arrest McDuffie, and that he would lock him up, or do as Barfield had done Miller. This was supplemented by testimony as to a difficulty between Barfield and Miller. The defense attempted to go into the particulars of this trouble, showing the bad feeling between a state's witness and McDuffie. The witness admitted that his feelings had been bitter, but that they were not so at the time of the examination. The court refused to allow the particulars of the trouble to be inquired into. The defendant excepts to this ruling, and also to the refusal of the court to allow counsel to ask a witness for the state why he was in a certain house, the witness objecting to make answer, and it appearing from the brief here that it was intended to be shown that it was a lewd house.

M. E. Laud, D. B. Nicholson, W. L. & Warren Grice, Fort & Grice, and Arnold & Arnold, for plaintiff in error. Hal Lawson and J. F. De Lacy, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1. Pen. Code 1895, §§ 885, 832, recognizes marshals as peace officers. Under the principle embodied in Pol. Code 1895, § 223, and Civ. Code 1895, § 5168, it was held in Robinson v. State, 82 Ga. 535, 9 S. E. 528, and in Garrett v. State, 89 Ga. 446, 15 S. E. 583, that a de facto marshal stands upon the same footing as to the right to make an arrest as one regularly appointed. In the present case, while his commission was not produced, it appeared from all the evidence that Blue was marshal, was accustomed to make arrests, and that such fact was well known to McDuffie.

2. The defendant strenuously insists that as there was no proof of the existence or terms of any ordinance prohibiting disorderly conduct, the court should have charged that there was no evidence that Blue had a right to make the arrest. There was evidence of disorderly conduct. Without proof of an ordinance it was said in Burns v. State, 80 Ga. 546, 7 S. E. 88, that a policeman had a right to arrest one in Savannah who was disorderly, and was justified in using such force as was necessary to compel submission. But, irrespective of the question of disorderly conduct, there was no error in refusing to instruct the jury as requested. There was at least some evidence that McDuffie was carrying a concealed weapon. Watts, one of the witnesses for the defendant, testified that Blue told McDuffie there had been some shooting, and he believed McDuffie had done it, and he would have to arrest him. He took out his pistol and showed him five cankered cartridges in it. The defendant, in his statement, also claimed to have "pulled out his pistol and showed it to Blue." There was evidence from other bystanders that they had not seen a pistol. While the issue was not distinctly presented, there was enough evidence of carrying a concealed weapon to warrant a refusal to charge that there was no proof to show that Blue had the right to arrest.

3. If the arrest had been lawful, and conducted in a lawful manner, the resistance culminating in homicide would have amounted to murder.

4. Had the jury found McDuffie guilty of murder, any error of omission or commission on the subject of the law of arrest would have been more important than it can possibly be under the present record. Here he was found guilty of manslaughter. This necessarily implies that the jury found either that the arrest was originally unlawful, or that it was being made in an unlawful manner, so as to put Blue beyond the cover and protection which the law affords a peace officer when properly in the discharge of his duty. An examination of the entire charge, however, shows that the judge fully and fairly presented all the issues raised by the evidence. He instructed the jury as to the rights of an officer making a lawful arrest and the extent of a citizen's right to resist an unlawful arrest, and also fully and fairly instructed them as to the right of McDuffie to resist force with force in case he was being unlawfully arrested, or lawfully arrested and unlawfully beaten.

5. There was evidence of bad blood between the two men, but that did not in any way affect the rights of either. A marshal may lawfully arrest his worst enemy, or may unlawfully arrest his best friend. The motive would not determine the legality of the act. Whether it was originally a lawful arrest properly conducted, or lawful with improper force, justifying resistance by commensurate force, or assault and battery, would be determined without regard to the motive with which the arrest was begun or attempted to be made effectual. There was no error, therefore, in refusing to charge, as requested, on the subject of the motive with which Blue made the arrest. If the arrest was lawful, it did not become the less so because of any ill will towards McDuffie.

7. It was competent to show that a witness for the state entertained feelings of ill will towards the defendant. Civ. Code 1895, § 5289. But that did not warrant an investigation of the particulars of the difficulty or the cause of the hostility. To admit such testimony would multiply issues and tend to confuse the jury. Andrews v. State, 118 Ga. 4, 43 S. E. 852; Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. 121 (1). Had the witness replied that he had no ill will, it would have been proper on further cross-examination to ask if he and the defendant had not had a fight. Had he denied that, the accused would have been entitled to prove the contrary. Daniel v. State, 103 Ga. 206, 29 S. E. 767. But this would not justify an investigation of a mere collateral issue or the particulars of the difficulty.

11. Before the evidence for the state was concluded, the defendant was allowed to introduce a witness out of the regular order. The court refused to allow him to testify as to a voluntary surrender by the defendant. There are cases which hold that such evidence is inadmissible because in the nature of self-serving declarations. People v. Cleveland, 107 Mich. 367, 65 N. W. 216. That question is not presented, the assignment being that the evidence was in rebuttal and explanation of the flight already proved by the state. The only evidence on the subject of flight which we find is that subsequently offered by the defendant himself, and at the time there was nothing to warrant its admission in rebuttal or for the purpose for which it was offered.

The other grounds of the motion for a new trial are sufficiently dealt with in the headnotes. We find no error requiring the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WALEA v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 26, 1905.)

CERTIORARI—ISSUANCE—TIME—DISMISSAL.

1. If the clerk fails to issue the writ of certiorari before the term to which it is returnable, the plaintiff may, if there has been no laches on his part, move the court for an order directing the clerk to issue the writ.

2. Without such order, the clerk has no authority to issue the writ of certiorari subsequently to the term to which it was originally returnable.

3. Where the writ of certiorari was issued subsequently to the term to which it was properly returnable, without any order of court, and served upon the judge whose judgment was sought to be reviewed, who answered the same, the court rightfully sustained a motion to dismiss the certiorari proceedings on the ground that the writ had not been issued and served as provided by the statute.

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; A. F. Daley, Judge.

Jack Walea was convicted of a misdemeanor, and brought certiorari. From an order dismissing the certiorari, he brings error. Affirmed.

Williams & Moring and Daniel & Kirkland, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Larsen, Sol., and B. T. Rawlings, Sol. Gen., for the State.

EVANS, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of a misdemeanor in the city court of Swainsboro. Within 30 days after his conviction, he submitted to the judge of the superior court his petition for certiorari, which petition was duly sanctioned and filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court on December 29, 1903. The writ should have been issued and made returnable to the April term, 1904, of Emanuel superior court, but the writ was not issued by the clerk until August of that year. On the same day the writ was issued, the petition and writ were served on the city court judge, who filed his answer to the October term, 1904, of the superior court. When the case came on to be heard in that court, the certiorari was dismissed on the ground that the judge of the city court had not been served with the writ within the time prescribed by law, and had not answered the certiorari within the time fixed by law, and proper diligence had not been shown by the plaintiff in certiorari to have the service duly perfected.

1. When a petition for certiorari has been sanctioned and filed in the office of the clerk, it is his duty to promptly issue the writ, returnable to the next term of the court which convenes 20 days after the filing of the petition. Civ. Code 1895, § 4637. The clerk's authority to issue the writ ceases after the term to which it should be made returnable has passed. If the clerk fails to issue the writ as provided by statute, and the plaintiff in certiorari has been diligent, he may move for the issuance of the writ at a subsequent term. Hopkins v. Suddeth, 18 Ga. 518; Mitchell v. Simmons, 58 Ga. 166; Zachery v. State, 106 Ga. 124, 32 S. E. 22.

2. Without an order of court, the clerk cannot issue the writ after the term to which it should have been made returnable has gone by. Being wholly without authority to do so, in the absence of an order of court so directing, his issuance of the writ after that term has expired is a mere nullity.

3. The plaintiff in certiorari will not be injuriously affected by the carelessness or misprision of the clerk, if it be shown to the court that his failure to issue the writ was not due to any laches on the part of the plaintiff in certiorari. On motion by the plaintiff, the court will, in such a case, grant an order authorizing the issuance of the writ, and making it returnable to a subsequent term. Proper diligence, however, requires that the plaintiff in certiorari shall make a timely motion for the granting of such an order. If he fails to do so, the clerk cannot cure his negligent omission to issue the writ within the time prescribed by law. In the present case no diligence on the part of the plaintiff in certiorari was shown, and it was not error for the court to sustain the motion to dismiss.

ATLANTA & W. P. R. CO. v. WEST.

MASTER AND SERVANT—RELATIONSHIP—VOLUNTEER—LIABILITY OF MASTER—INFANCY OF PLAINTIFF.

1. To create the relation of master and servant there must be some contract or some act on the part of one person which expressly or impliedly recognizes another as his servant.

2. One into whose service another volunteers without his assent, express or implied, is not under the duties of a master toward a servant, or required to anticipate or discover the peril of such volunteer, but is only bound, relatively to such volunteer, to use care not to injure him after notice of his peril.

3. Where a defendant has been guilty of no breach of any duty owing to the plaintiff, there can be no legal liability.

4. Where a volunteer engages in work undertaken in compliance with an unauthorized request of an employé of the defendant, the latter owes him none of the obligations of a master toward a servant, but is only bound to use care not to injure him after notice of his peril. The fact that the volunteer is of tender years, and without sufficient mental capacity to appreciate the danger, while it might be an element of notice to the defendant of the peril of the volunteer, cannot change the relations of the parties, or impose upon the defendant any duty not ordinarily imposed by law relatively to volunteers. Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co., 10 S. E. 922, 84 Ga. 320, 20 Am. St. Rep. 362, in part disapproved.

5. If the defendant had been negligent, and relied upon the concurrent negligence of the plaintiff to defeat or diminish the recovery, then the infancy of the plaintiff would be material to the determination of his diligence; but plaintiff's infancy cannot change the relations of the parties, or supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant.

Error from City Court of Newnan; A. D. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Wilks West, administrator, against the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, W. G. Post, and H. A. Hall, for plaintiff in error. W. C. Wright and J. B. S. Davis, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. An action for damages for personal injuries was brought by Simmie L. West, a minor, by his next friend, against the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company. Pending this action Simmie L. West died, and his duly appointed and qualified administrator was made a party in his stead. To the petition as originally filed the defendant had demurred. Subsequently the petition was amended in several particulars. The defendant renewed its grounds of demurrer, and also filed other demurrers to the petition as amended. The court overruled the demurrers, and the defendant excepted. The petition, after amendment, set up the following facts: On the morning of June 14, 1901, a freight train of the defendant became uncoupled because of a defective or broken coupling. For the purpose of repairing such coupling, and while the repairs were being made, a portion of the train stood upon and obstructed the crossing. One of the tools used by the train hands in repairing the coupling was an iron crowbar weighing about 50 pounds. While the repairs were in progress, young West, who came thither on his way to perform an errand for his father, after waiting for some time for the crossing to be cleared, went to the caboose or cab of the train to inquire when the crossing would be clear. When he approached the caboose, one of the brakemen on the train came up with a lot of tools which had been used to repair the coupling, among them the above-mentioned iron crowbar, and requested West to ascend the platform of the caboose and open the door so that the tools could be laid in the caboose. West, seeing no danger to himself in complying with this request, ascended the platform, and was proceeding to unbolt and open the door, when the brakeman handed him the crowbar, standing it up endwise, and letting one end rest on the platform, and requested West to take hold of it. West took hold of the crowbar, and was supporting it with one hand, the other being upon the door knob, and West being in the act of opening the door, when "suddenly and violently, and without warning signal, and without warning to" West, the train was coupled together, the section attached to the engine coming in contact with the other section, of which the caboose formed a part, "with great force, and said train was then suddenly and quickly jerked and put in motion and with a sudden jerk, by reason and on account of which sudden coupling and contact and sudden starting and jerking of said train" West was thrown back and down, the door slammed upon his right hand, and the crowbar fell upon and broke his right leg. West suffered great pain in his hand and leg. The injury to the leg resulted in necrosis, and the leg had finally to be amputated. When West was requested by the brakeman to ascend the platform and open the door of the caboose and take hold of the crowbar, both sections of the train were perfectly still, and he had no reason to suppose or presume that they would be suddenly coupled together with great force and jar, and the train put in motion with a jerk, without notice to him. The brakeman was a man of long experience, and apparently about 50 years of age, while West was only 15 years and 2 months of age, and "without mental capacity, knowledge, and experience to know or comprehend that there was any danger" in complying with the request of the brakeman, "and without sufficient knowledge, mental capacity, and experience to avoid any danger" to which so doing might subject him. On account and by reason of West's tender years and inexperience he did not know, while he was on the platform, that the train might be coupled together suddenly and violently, and without warning, and put in motion with a sudden jerk. At the time of the injury "West did not have the mental capacity, knowledge, and experience of an ordinary boy fourteen years old." West was without fault, and in the exercise of due care, diligence, and circumspection, and his injuries were due wholly to the carelessness and gross negligence of defendant, its officers, agents, and employes. The petition charged that "defendant was negligent on account of its said employé requesting [West] to ascend the platform of said cab and open said door, and in handing said iron crowbar up to [West] with the request that [West] take hold of same; and especially was defendant, its agents, officers, and employes, grossly negligent in suddenly, violently, and with great force and jar coupling said sections of said train, and causing them to come in contact as aforesaid, and then suddenly putting said train in motion with a jerk while petitioner occupied the position hereinbefore described, and in so coupling and starting said train without signal, and without any notice or warning to [West]." Damages were laid in the sum of $15,000.

The defendant's demurrers were based upon several grounds. It demurred generally, and on the ground that the petition failed to show that on the occasion when West was injured defendant owed him any duty, or that the acts and doings of the defendant were any breach of any duty owing by the defendant to West. The other grounds of demurrer it is unnecessary here to mention.

1. It is virtually conceded that West was a volunteer, and not a servant of the defendant. There was no contract of employment, nor any act on the part of any authorized agent of the defendant which expressly or impliedly recognized West as the servant of the company. Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co., 84 Ga. 320, 10 S. E. 922, 20 Am. St. Rep. 362. "A person cannot be subjected, without his own consent or that of his agent, to the obligations which the law has attached to the contract of hiring." 2 Labatt, Mast. & Serv. § 630.

2. One who, without any employment whatever, or at the request of a servant who has no authority to employ other servants, voluntarily undertakes to perform service for the master, is a mere volunteer, and not entitled to that degree of diligence on the part of the master which the latter is bound to exercise with reference to his servants. There are a great many cases which state that such a volunteer stands in the place of a servant, but in each such case which we have examined this position was taken in order to defeat the claim of the volunteer. In other words, the court held that the volunteer certainly stood in no better position than that of a servant, and that, conceding he stood in the position of a servant, he could not recover. Such cases not infrequently arise where, if the volunteer had been a servant, he could not recover because injured by the negligence of a fellow servant in the course of their common employment. A number of such cases will be found in the note to section 631 of Labatt on Master and Servant, vol. 2. In Georgia the rule as to the liability of the master for the negligence of fellow servants had been abrogated in railroad cases, and the claim of a volunteer cannot be defeated by treating him as though he were a servant. It is necessary to assign him to his true position. He is not a servant, and cannot charge the defendant with the obligations of a master. The defendant does not, as master, owe the volunteer any duty whatever. The obligations of master and servant do not arise between them. The defendant is only bound not to injure the volunteer willfully, and to use care not to injure him after notice of his peril. See Church v. Railroad Co., 50 Minn. 218, 52 N. W. 647, 16 L. R. A. 861; Everhart v. Railroad Co., 78 Ind. 292, 41 Am. Rep. 567.

3. The petition clearly does not make out a case of injuries inflicted willfully, or because of a want of care after notice of West's peril. There is no allegation that the defendant's agents or employes who coupled and moved the train knew anything of West's danger or of his position. Even the brakeman who requested West to get upon the platform does not appear to have had any notice that West's mental capacity was less than that usually possessed by boys of his age. The train was at a public crossing, but it does not appear that West could not get by it, or that this had anything to do with his compliance with the brakeman's request to assist him. The brakeman does not appear to have had any authority to make West or any one else the servant of the defendant. There is no allegation that the brakeman had any authority, and his request cannot be imputed to the defendant. The brakeman had no authority to invite West to get upon the platform, and the defendant was under no duty to anticipate that he would do so, or to see that no injury resulted. Leaving out of consideration the minority of West, the case is simply that of a volunteer who places himself in a position of danger, and who is injured by acts of the defendant, which, relatively to a volunteer, do not constitute negligence. So far as appears from the petition, the defendant was guilty of no breach of any duty which it owed West, and therefore cannot be liable. Legal liability arises only upon the breach of some legal duty.

4. We think enough has been said to show that, had West been an adult, the defendant would not have been liable. West voluntarily engaged in work undertaken in compliance with the unauthorized request of the brakeman, and the defendant owed West none of the obligations which grow out of the relation of master and servant. The defendant was bound, through its agents and employes, to use care not to injure West after notice of his peril, and was bound not to injure him willfully; but no breach of this duty appears. Defendant in error, however, contended that the demurrers were properly overruled because of the allegations as to the minority and mental deficiency of West, relying upon the case of Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co., 84 Ga. 320, 10 S. E. 922, 20 Am. St. Rep. 362. After examining that case, and also many decisions by other courts, we think this contention unsound. Infancy or want of mental capacity on the part of the plaintiff is often very material where the defense calls in question the plaintiff's own diligence. In other words, where the defendant has been negligent, and claims that the plaintiff could, by the exercise of due care, have avoided the injury, or that the plaintiff did not use due diligence to lessen the damages, or that plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury, then the plaintiff's infancy or mental capacity is material. Whenever the plaintiff's diligence is under investigation, his mental capacity is relevant, as will be seen in many decisions in this and other states. In investigating the diligence of the defendant, the plaintiff's infancy or evident lack of mental capacity may sometimes become relevant as an element of notice to defendant of the plaintiff's peril. But in determining the relations of the parties the infancy of the plaintiff is not material, nor can it supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant. West was a mere volunteer. His age and mental capacity could not change this. If young and mentally deficient, he was no less a volunteer, relatively to the defendant, than if old and experienced. The defendant did not, as master, owe him any duty. The defendant was not guilty of a breach of any duty which it did owe him. The infancy of West could not supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant, and there can be no recovery. The Rhodes Case, supra, seems to conflict with this view, though the headnote recognized that there could be no recovery unless the defendant had been negligent. The decision in that case is by but two judges, and not binding, and, in so far as it conflicts with what is here ruled, will not be followed. It has more than once been criticized by able law writers (3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1305; 2 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 636), and is, we think, unsound. We are clear in the present case that West's lack of mental capacity did not change his relations toward the defendant, or impose upon it any of the obligations which ordinarily arise from the relation of master and servant; that the petition showed no breach of duty toward West as a volunteer; that West's infancy cannot supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant; and that the court below erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer. See, in relation to the relevancy of the volunteer's infancy, Flower v. R. Co., 69 Pa. 210, 8 Am. Rep. 251, and the numerous cases cited in the notes in the two textbooks last above cited.

Under the above view of the case it will not be necessary to notice all of defendant's special demurrers.

SCOVILLE BROS. v. VARNER et al.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION—OBSTRUCTION IN STREETS.

1. The act of December 24, 1832 (Acts 1832, p. 207), conferring jurisdiction upon the justices of the peace of the Indian Spring district of Butts county to remove obstructions from the streets of the Indian Spring (or McIntosh) Reserve, is not applicable to the walks and promenades on the 10-acre lot embracing the mineral spring. The streets referred to in this act were those laid out in the plan of subdivision of the original McIntosh Reserve in conformity with the act of 1827 (Acts 1827, p. 119).

Error from Superior Court, Butts County: L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by Joe and Amanda Varner against Levi and George Scoville. Judgment for plaintiffs before a justice was affirmed on certiorari, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

M. W. Beck and Mills & Wall, for plaintiffs in error. O. M. Duke, Dessau, Harris & Harris, and Pope S. Hill, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. Misses Joe and Amanda Varner caused a summons to be issued by the justice of the peace of the Indian Spring district of Butts county, directed to Levi and George Scoville, requiring them to appear at the next justice's court to answer the complaint of the Misses Varner for the removal of an obstruction from a street of the Indian Spring Reserve. Attached to the summons was the complaint of the plaintiffs, which alleged, in substance, that the defendants were conducting a hotel business, and were residents of said district; that they had obstructed a street extending from the hotel of the Misses Varner to the spring, the obstruction being immediately in front of the Wigwam Hotel, conducted by the defendants; that this street had been used by plaintiffs and the guests at their hotel for more than 20 years, had been in existence as far back as the year 1817, and had been constantly and uninterruptedly used as an approach to the spring by plaintiffs and their ancestors during all that period of time; and that the obstruction was of such a character as to render it impossible for invalid guests of plaintiffs to reach the spring, and such as to render it impossible for any person to reach the spring by means of this street without climbing over the obstruction. It was alleged that demand had been made on the defendants to remove the obstruction, which they failed and refused to do. Plaintiffs asked for an order requiring the removal of the obstruction, and for a judgment in behalf of themselves and the county school commissioner of Butts county for $2 for each day since the erection of the obstruction. The summons was served on the defendants, who appeared and filed a plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that they were residents of Fulton county, and not of the Indian Spring district, which plea was held insufficient and was stricken by the court. The defendants then interposed a demurrer to the complaint on the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the superior court of Butts county alone having jurisdiction thereof, under the act of 1889 (Acts 1889, pp. 171, 172), and that the state of Georgia was a necessary party, and there was a nonjoinder of parties. The magistrate overruled this demurrer. The defendants thereupon filed their answer, in which they denied obstructing any street, and in which they alleged that they were lessees from the state of Georgia of the Indian Spring Reserve, and only amenable to the state under their lease contract for any act done by them with reference to the improvement and control of the Indian Spring Reserve. After hearing evidence, the magistrate adjudged that the structure complained of amounted to an obstruction, and ordered its removal. The defendants sued out a writ of certiorari, assigning error on the judgment of the magistrate overruling their demurrer, on the admission of certain testimony, and on the final judgment rendered on the merits. When the certiorari came on to be heard in the superior court, it was overruled, and the defendants bring the case here for review.

What is known as the Indian Spring (or McIntosh) Reserve was acquired by the state of Georgia from the Creek Indians by the treaty of 1825. A subdivision of the reserve into lots and streets, and the sale of all the lots except one containing the spring, was authorized by the act of December 22, 1827 (Acts 1827, p. 119). The plan of subdivision was that the mineral spring should be included, as nearly as possible, in the center of a square lot of 10 acres, and around this lot there were to be laid off two successive ranges of lots, containing 2 acres, intersected by streets of not less than 33 feet in width, running east and west, north and south, at right angles; next to the range of 2-acre lots, there were to be laid off around them a range of 4-acre lots; and next to the range of 4-acre lots, still another range of lots was to be laid off, each lot to contain not less than 20 nor more than 30 acres; and the balance of the reserve was to be surveyed into lots of not less than 30 nor more than 50 acres. All the lots were to be separated from each other by streets. To prevent encroachment upon and obstruction of the streets laid out in conformity with this act, the justices of the peace of the Indian Spring district of Butts county were given jurisdiction to remove any house, fence, or other obstruction placed in such streets, at the expense of the individual placing the same in said streets, or using and occupying the same. Acts 1832, p. 207. The justices of the peace of this district were not only empowered to remove obstructions from the streets, but the penalties imposed by the act were collectible in the justice's court of that district by suit at the instance of an informer. Subsequently the Legislature authorized the commissioners of the Indian Spring Reserve to sell such of the streets as they might deem not of public use for streets. Acts 1838, p. 142. The legislative scheme was to dedicate to public use the 10-acre lot containing the mineral spring. This lot was set apart as a park or place of rendezvous for members of the general public attracted to the spring. The approach to the 10-acre lot was by means of the streets intersecting the surrounding lots, and the summary proceeding by the justice of the peace to remove obstructions from the streets of the reserve related to the streets laid out under the act of 1827. It was never contemplated in any of the statutes or resolutions of the General Assembly relating to the Indian Spring (or McIntosh) Reserve that permanent streets should be established within the lot embracing the spring. Thus in the lease acts of 1847 and 1869 (Acts 1847, p. 193; Acts 1869, p. 174) the lessees were empowered to make roads, promenades, and walks, and to plant flower gardens, on such portions of the grounds as they might select as best adapted and calculated to render the grounds more pleasant and useful, with the proviso that roads or paths of ample width, admitting an easy approach to and from the spring, should be at all times kept open for public use. The present lease act (Acts 1889, p. 171) imposes on the lessees the duty to "lay out and maintain walks upon the said reserve, and build and keep in repair all bridges and approaches to the spring," and declares that "the public shall be permitted to use said water at the spring and to carry it to hotels, boarding houses and private residences for use." The "walks" which the lessees in the various lease acts were empowered to lay out were not "streets," but promenades or approaches to the spring. The lease act of 1889 requires of the lessees that roads of ample width, admitting an easy approach to and from the spring, shall at all times be kept open for public use. The fifth section of that act makes the violation of any of its provisions a cause of forfeiture of the lease contract, but there can be no ouster of the lessee until after final judgment of forfeiture in the superior court of Butts county. Whether the remedy provided by the act of 1889 for the obstruction of an approach to the spring be confined to an action to forfeit the lease, it is certain that, as to obstruction of ways within the 10-acre reservation itself, the remedy provided in the act of 1832 is not applicable. This latter act relates solely to an obstruction of the permanent streets established in the plan of subdivision of the original reservation, and not to roads, walks, and promenades on the 10-acre lot.

The act of 1838 did not authorize the sale of all the streets previously laid out by virtue of the act of 1827, but only those which were unused at the time, or which the commissioners of the Indian Spring Reserve did not deem of public advantage. As to these unsold streets, the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace of the Indian Spring district, given by the act of 1832, may still obtain, but as to the particular subject-matter involved in the case under review the magistrate was without jurisdiction. If, then, as affirmatively appears on the face of the pleadings, the court wherein the case originated had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the entire proceeding before the justice of the peace should, by a court of review, be treated as an absolute nullity. Blocker v. Boswell, 109 Ga. 239, 84 S. E. 289. Direction is accordingly given that the judgment excepted to be set aside, and that the superior court remand the case to the justice's court, with instructions to dismiss the action.

Judgment reversed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

CITY COURTS—WRITS OF ERROR—TOWNS.

1. The General Assembly has no power to create a city court and provide for a direct writ of error therefrom to the Supreme Court in any municipality other than an incorporated city. Lampkin v. Pike, 42 S. E. 213, 115 Ga. 827, 90 Am. St. Rep. 153, and cit.

2. A recital in an act establishing a city court that the court is established in a named "city," when the municipality referred to is in fact not a city, is not binding upon the courts. Savannah Ry. Co. v. Jordan, 39 S. E. 511, 113 Ga. 687; Lampkin v. Pike, 42 S. E. 213, 115 Ga. 827, 831, 90 Am. St. Rep. 153; Mitchell v. Lasseter, 40 S. E. 287, 114 Ga. 275, 281.

3. The municipality of Sylvester being a town at the date of the establishment of a city court therein, no writ of error lies to the Supreme Court from that court.

Error from City Court of Sylvester; Frank Park, Judge.

Wade White was convicted of misdemeanor, and brings error. Dismissed.

Claude Payton, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Tipton, for the State

COBB, J. The act creating the city court of Sylvester was approved August 11, 1904. It provided that it should take effect immediately upon the passage of an act abolishing the county court of Worth county. Acts 1904, p. 207. The act abolishing the county court was approved August 13, 1904. Acts 1904, p. 240. By an act approved on the date last referred to the city of Sylvester was incorporated, and this act provided that it should take effect immediately upon the passage and approval of an act abolishing the charter of the town of Sylvester, which latter act was approved August 15, 1904. Acts 1904, pp. 644, 645. If the dates of the approval of the acts incorporating the city and establishing the city court are to control, the city court was established two days before the municipality was incorporated as a city, and, under the decisions cited in the headnotes no writ of error would lie to this court from such a court. If the dates when the respective acts went into effect are to control, a like result is reached, for the act incorporating the city did not go into effect until August 15th, whereas the act establishing the city court went into operation on August 13th. The recital in the city court act that the court was established in the "city of Sylvester" does not bind the courts. It follows that the city court of Sylvester is not a constitutional city court, and that no writ of error lies from that court to the Supreme Court.

Writ of error dismissed. All the Justices concur.

EQUITABLE MORTG. CO. v. MONTFORT.

EXECUTION—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—STAY—TRIAL OF ISSUE—PART PAYMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. Where the ground of an affidavit of illegality interposed to the levy of a common-law execution is that it has been partially paid, the amount admitted to be due must be paid, in order to stay the execution. Civ. Code 1895, § 5661; White v. Mandeville, 72 Ga. 705; Starford v. Connery, 11 S. E. 507, 84 Ga. 731-745; Brinson v. Birge, 30 S. E. 261, 102 Ga. 802.

But where the ground of the illegality is that the execution has been fully paid, then the sheriff is bound to accept it, and await the result of the trial of the issue so made. If, upon the trial of such issue, it should be proved that the execution has been only partially paid, the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict that the execution proceed for the balance shown to be really due thereon, and not for the amount apparently due from the execution itself. Stanford v. Connery, supra.

2. There was evidence before the jury from which they could have found that, prior to making the affidavit of illegality, defendant had made a payment on the execution to the attorney of record for the plaintiff, for which he had received no credit. The court erred in excluding evidence tending to show that, prior to making the affidavit of illegality, defendant had made another payment on the execution to plaintiff's attorney, in pursuance of a parol agreement, though varying a former written contract, which payment had not been entered as a credit on the execution. The direction of a verdict that the execution proceed for the full amount apparently due from the execution itself was error. A new trial was properly granted.

COLEMAN v. STATE.

Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

SAIL — RECAPTURE OF PRINCIPAL — POWER OF THIRD PERSON — ARREST BY PRIVATE CITIZEN.

1. A bail, in person or by duly authorized agent, may lawfully recapture his principal.

2. Without proof of authority so to do, the son of the bail cannot empower a third person to make such arrest.

3. Unless properly deputized, a private citizen cannot justify an arrest merely because he has in his possession a warrant for the arrest of the person sought to be taken.

4. Treating the arrest as having been made without warrant of law or authority of the bail, the case is to be governed by the law of assault, culminating in a homicide by the original wrongdoer.

5. So treating it, if the defendant began the unlawful arrest with an intent to kill if necessary to make it effective, and by a show of a deadly weapon put the deceased in the fear of his life, and the latter thereupon drew and fired, the defendant, having provoked and created a necessity, could not meet the same, but would be guilty of murder if under such circumstances he took the life of the party legally resisting the illegal arrest.

6. A citizen, being unlawfully arrested, has a right to resist force with force proportioned to that being used in detaining him.

7. If the force used in repelling the unlawful arrest was excessive and disproportioned to that needed to avoid detention, such force is not to be treated as lawful resistance, but as an unlawful attack.

8. If an unauthorized person seeks to make an arrest, but does nothing to put the other in real or apparent danger of life, and if the mere assault is met by drawing and firing a deadly weapon upon the person making the arrest, the latter, not having forfeited his right to live, and not having created a legal necessity for such deadly resistance, may defend himself against the excessive and unjustifiable counter assault.

9. Under the evidence, there was no question of killing in hot blood. The real issue was whether the defendant was guilty of murder, or justified on principles of self-defense. It was error to give the law of manslaughter in charge.

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; A. F. Daley, Judge.

Elzie Coleman was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

At the April term, 1902, of Bulloch superior court, John Griffin was indicted for aiding Oglesby to escape from jail. Griffin gave bail, with Collins as surety. Griffin having failed to answer, the bond was forfeited. R. E. Collins, the son of the surety on the bond, called on the officers to have Griffin arrested; it appearing that at the time he was in the county. According to the testimony for the defendant, the officer stated that he could not attempt to make the arrest just at that time, but advised that an offer of a reward be made. In compliance with this suggestion, R. E. Collins, the son, offered a reward to Remer Coleman and Elzie Coleman if they would arrest Griffin. At the same time he put in their hands a warrant issued by I. W. Martin, and addressed to any sheriff, deputy sheriff, coroner, constable, or marshal of this state, commanding them to arrest the body of Griffin, who was charged, on the affidavit of R. E. Collins, with the offense of "resisting legal process." Elzie and Remer Coleman, having this warrant, proceeded to the place where Griffin lived, and found him in the cotton field. They invited him to go hunting. Griffin consented. He had a pistol in his pocket, and carried a Winchester rifle. The party drove off; Griffin being seated in the foot of the buggy, and the two Colemans on the seat. There were no eyewitnesses to the transaction. The state offered as a witness Lawson Mercer, who testified that Elzie Coleman "said they had started hunting, and he said he didn't even think he would have to kill this man. He said he thought the man would give up. He didn't think he would have to kill him. He said they were going to try to arrest him; and he said, when they got down there a piece, it seemed like he went to draw his pistol, and told Griffin to consider himself under arrest, and the other gentleman, Mr. Griffin, he drew his—just commenced to pull his, I think, as he took his out and told him to consider himself under arrest. When he told him that, Mr. Griffin made up in here [left breast pocket] for his, and it seemed that Mr. Griffin fired at him, and he slapped the pistol down, and that time he said he had to fire himself to save his life. And he said then Mr. Griffin jumped out of the buggy, and went to make around the buggy, and dashed off, and went a piece, and fell." On cross-examination the witness testified: Coleman said "he had a warrant in his pocket, and told Mr. Griffin to consider himself under arrest, and at the same time he told him that he then and there prepared himself for any resistance that might be made by Griffin by going for his gun. He took out his revolver, and before he got his revolver Griffin out with his and shot. That Griffin got the pistol from under his coat or vest and shot at Coleman, and Mr. Coleman told me that, after he had been fired upon, that he then shot Griffin. I won't say whether he was in the buggy when he shot him or when he turned around the buggy. But it was after Coleman had been shot. He said that, as Griffin shot at him, he slapped the pistol down as he fired. Griffin was known as a lawbreaking man, and had the reputation of being a bad man in the community." Another witness testified that Griffin was shot in the left side, the ball ranging down. For the defendant there was testimony that Griffin had been out of the county for some time, and that as to one warrant he had said that he "was not going to submit, but would die before he would be arrested." His reputation for violence was bad. Remer Coleman, who was in the buggy at the time of the occurrence, testified that he heard Elzie Coleman, the defendant, tell Griffin to consider himself under arrest, and the firing commenced at once; "that Griffin drew his pistol and fired at Elzie; that about that time Elzie shot him." The defendant, in his statement to the jury, said that after driving "about a quarter of a mile I told Griffin to consider himself under arrest, and when I did so he drew his pistol from a pocket in his overalls, and when he drew his pistol I drew mine, and just as he threw it in my face, I knocked it down time enough to save it from shooting me in my face, and, when he fired, I fired." Coleman exhibited to the jury a place on his left leg where Griffin's shot took effect.

The judge charged on the law of murder, manslaughter, and justifiable homicide; and, after the jury had been out some time, they returned and asked to be charged on the subject of involuntary manslaughter, to which the court replied, "The law of involuntary manslaughter is not applicable in this case," and then gave instructions as to murder and voluntary manslaughter where the homicide was in a heat of passion. Error is assigned on this charge, on the ground that there was no evidence tending to show the deed was done in the heat of passion, but the contention being that it was done on a sudden impulse, when dealing with a notorious character for violence, to protect one's own life.

Herrington & Lee, L. J. Cowart, and Saf-fold & Larsen, for plaintiff in error. B. T. Rawlings, Sol. Gen., and G. H. Howard, Sol. pro tem., for the State.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1, 2. Where one accused of crime is released on bond, he is transferred from the custody of the sheriff to the legal, but friendly, custody of the bail, whose "dominion is a continuance of the original imprisonment," but they may at will surrender him again to the custody of the law. If the accused refuses to surrender, the bail can seize and hold him in order to make delivery in discharge of the bond. But the surety may be a woman, or a man physically too weak to cope with the accused, or the person charged with the crime may be at a distant point and out of the reach of his bondsman. For these and other reasons, the bail may lawfully deputize an agent to seize the body and deliver him to the custody of the sheriff. Clark v. Gordon, 82 Ga. 613, 9 S. E. 333; Pen. Code 1895, § 935; Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. 371, 21 L. Ed. 287. While this is true, a new trial cannot be granted here because of the court's refusal to give the charge requested as to the right to make such arrest by an agent. There was no evidence in the present case to show that the bail had appointed Coleman to recapture Griffin, and nothing to show that he authorized his son, R. E. Collins, to make such arrest, or delegated to him any power to appoint agents for that purpose.

3. The warrant which R. E. Collins delivered to Coleman was in usual form, and directed as required by the Penal Code. The defendant, Coleman, was not himself a peace officer, not a member of a posse, and had not been deputized to execute the warrant. The fact that he had it in his possession conferred upon him no authority whatever. The arrest, therefore, is to be treated as one made by a private citizen. Its legality would then depend upon showing that it was made under the circumstances set out in Pen. Code 1895, § 900.

4. There does not appear to have been any conversation between Coleman and Griffin—no demand for a show of the warrant, or statement of the authority under which the arrest was made. There was no reply to indicate whether it was at the instance of the bail, under the warrant for resisting legal process, because of a felony known to have been committed, or to prevent an escape therefor. We must assume, from the verdict, that the jury found that Coleman did not have authority to make the arrest. If so, the remaining questions must be treated on the idea that the law of arrest is out of the case, and that Coleman was guilty of an assault.

5. At an early day it was held that, if the supposed officer purposely kills the other party for not submitting himself to an illegal arrest, it will, generally speaking, be murder. East's P. C. 312; Foster's Crown Law, 271. This principle, however, must be subject to many exceptions. If the circumstances are such as to show that there was no malice—if the person attempting such unauthorized arrest in good faith believes that he has the right to take the person sought to be detained, and, in the course of the struggle and in the heat engendered by the altercation, he takes the life of the person sought to be arrested—the modern cases seem to hold that he would only be guilty of manslaughter. But if the arrest was not only unauthorized, but was begun with the intent to kill, there would be malice. The killing at the end of a struggle which commenced with a felonious intent to take life would be murder. In the present case there was some evidence that Coleman may have intended to do what he did, and began the arrest, in the first instance, by drawing and presenting a deadly weapon; thereby putting Griffin, as a reasonable man, in fear of his life. If the jury found from the evidence that such was the fact, and that the shooting was but a continuation of an original murderous assault with a deadly weapon, and that this created on the part of Griffin the necessity to shoot in self-defense, Coleman could not justify himself in meeting the same with a like shot, since he brought the necessity upon himself. Roach v. State, 34 Ga. 85. Had the jury found such to be the fact, the verdict would necessarily have been that Coleman was guilty of murder. But the verdict in the present case was not for murder, but manslaughter; and there was evidence from which the jury could have found that Coleman did not begin the arrest by a show of any force which warranted Griffin in fearing that his life was in danger, but was only guilty of the offense of an assault, in telling Griffin to consider himself under arrest, while carrying him in the buggy.

6-9. On that theory, therefore, the transaction from inception to termination is to be governed by the law applicable to assault culminating in a homicide by the person who was the original assailant. Thus treating it, the unlawful arrest—the assault—would have justified Griffin in breaking away, resisting, and repelling force with force. But the force which Griffin could thus rightfully use could only be proportionate to that exerted by Coleman, and sufficient to avoid the detention. If Coleman said, "Consider yourself under arrest," and laid hold of Griffin with a view of making the arrest effective, it was a wrong, but not one for which he forfeited his life, either at the hand of the law or at the hand of Griffin. Such conduct did not put Griffin in bodily danger. It provoked an assault, but not a felony. It did not create a legal necessity to kill. In the eye of the law, liberty is very sacred, but so, also, is human life. If Griffin met an unlawful assault with force proportioned to the attack, he was in the right. As long as he remained in the right, Coleman could not justly shoot. But if Griffin resisted with disproportionate, and therefore unlawful, violence—if, without being put in real or apparent danger of life or serious bodily harm, he fired upon Coleman for a mere assault—he became a wrongdoer, and Coleman became at once clothed with the right of self-defense against that which was not then lawful resistance, but an unlawful attack. For Coleman, under such circumstances, to fire and kill Griffin, would not be murder or manslaughter, but justifiable homicide. The decision in State v. Campbell, 107 N. C. 949, 12 S. E. 441 (5), is opposed to this view. We find, also, a number of cases in other jurisdictions which rule that one who provokes a difficulty without felonious purpose, and during its progress is compelled to take the life of the person whom he attacks, in order to save his own, cannot be entirely justified upon the grounds of self-defense, but will be guilty of manslaughter. State v. Parker, 106 Mo. 213, 17 S. W. 180. See other authorities to the same effect cited in Clark's Criminal Law, 183, 184. These decisions are based upon the wise and salutary principle, which is also recognized in this state, that the slayer must be faultless. Haynes v. State, 17 Ga. 465 (5). But while the direct question here involved has not been before this court in case of an unauthorized arrest, it has announced a principle which covers the point now under consideration. That principle is that being faultless is to be understood as meaning, not that the slayer did nothing to provoke the difficulty, but that "the provocation must not have been such as would, in law, be sufficient to justify the attack against which he was defending himself when the homicide was committed. Anything short of such provocation as this would not put the slayer in any degree in the wrong if it became necessary to kill in his own defense." Butler v. State, 92 Ga. 606, 19 S. E. 51; Boatwright v. State, 89 Ga. 140, 15 S. E. 21; Fussell v. State, 94 Ga. 78, 19 S. E. 891; Nixon v. State, 101 Ga. 575, 28 S. E. 971. Those were cases in which opprobrious words might have justified a blow. They did not justify a deadly assault. The assailant was not faultless in that he provoked an attack. But he was faultless in that he did not provoke felony. The same principle applies here. The unlawful arrest justified a certain amount of resistance. But it did not justify shooting. Coleman had a right to defend himself against such wrongful counter attack. Compare Creighton v. Commonwealth, 84 Ky. 103, 4 Am. St. Rep. 193. It is also to be noted, on this branch of the case, that the deadly weapon was instantly fired; that there was no opportunity afforded Coleman to discontinue the arrest, to withdraw, or to decline combat. Under the evidence, if Coleman began by a felonious assault, he was guilty of murder. If he resisted an unjustifiable deadly attack, he was not guilty of any offense. There was no proof of any middle ground; nothing to show a killing in hot blood or passion, or because of a mere assault; and nothing in the record on which to base a charge of manslaughter.

We recognize the dilemma which frequently confronts the trial judge in this class of cases. If he improperly omits to charge on the subject of manslaughter, a new trial must be granted. Conversely, if he improperly includes that charge, a new trial will be granted. But such is the law. Considering the gravity of the issue, the error is one which has been repeatedly held to entitle the defendant to another hearing.

SHEDDEN v. STILES.

ACTION ON NOTE—BURDEN OF PROOF—INSTRUCTIONS—ANSWERS TO INTERROGATORIES—DELIVERY TO JURY.

1. Where the issue tried was whether the note sued on was executed for the plaintiff's accommodation, and there was direct and positive testimony submitted by both parties in support of their respective contentions, and the court instructed the jury that, as the defendant admitted the execution of the note, the burden rested upon him to prove his defense to the satisfaction of the jury, the mere failure to charge that the holder of a negotiable promissory note is presumed to be such bona fide and for value was not cause for a new trial.

2. Refusal to give an oral request to charge was not cause for a new trial, though made in response to an inquiry by the judge to the counsel, "If there was anything else, they desired charged."

3. There was no material error in admitting evidence.

4. Interrogatories, though read in evidence, should not be delivered to the jury. Where the court, over the objection of the party against whom the verdict was rendered, sent to the jury, after they had retired to deliberate as to their verdict, interrogatories which had been read in evidence, and which were calculated to influence the jury in favor of the prevailing party, a new trial should have been granted.

Error from City Court of Cartersville; A. M. Foute, Judge.

Action by R. F. Shedden against W. H. Stiles. Verdict for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Lumpkin, Boykin & Etheridge and J. M. Moon, for plaintiff in error. Thoa. W. Milner & Son, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. R. F. Shedden sued W. H. Stiles on a promissory note signed by Stiles as maker, payable to his own order, and indorsed in blank by himself and George T. Hodgson. There was a verdict for defendant, and plaintiff's motion for a new trial having been overruled, he excepted.

1. The only defense filed to the action was that the note sued on was executed for the accommodation of the plaintiff. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in failing to charge—though not requested in writing so to do—that the holder of a negotiable promissory note is presumed to be such bona fide and for value. This was a correct principle of law, and applicable to the case, but we think the point was sufficiently covered by what the judge did charge. He instructed the jury that, as the defendant admitted the execution of the note, the burden rested upon him to prove his defense to their satisfaction. As above stated, the only defense was that the note was executed for plaintiff's accommodation. The evidence was undisputed that Stiles received no consideration for making and indorsing it, and that, as to him, it was an accommodation paper. When he indorsed and delivered it to Hodgson, however, it was a negotiable paper, payable to bearer; and, if Hodgson indorsed and delivered it to Shedden for a consideration, then Shedden could hold Stiles liable on it, even though Shedden knew at the time he took it that Stiles had received no consideration. Whether Stiles executed it for a consideration was immaterial. The vital issue in the case was whether Shedden paid Hodgson a consideration for the instrument. This point was hotly contested, both parties submitting direct and positive testimony in support of their respective contentions on the question. For defendant to prevail, it was absolutely necessary for him to show by a preponderance of the evidence that Shedden did not pay Hodgson a consideration for the paper. When the court instructed the jury that the burden rested on the defendant to prove his case to their satisfaction, it was equivalent, we think, to charging them that defendant must overcome, to their satisfaction, whatever case plaintiff sought to make, whether by way of presumption or by direct and positive evidence. The charge actually given was broader and more favorable to the plaintiff than that which he contends should have been given.

2. At the close of the judge's charge he asked counsel "if there was anything else they desired charged," and counsel for plaintiff, in reply, orally requested the court to charge that when the note was put in evidence the presumption was that it was a valid note, and that plaintiff was a bona fide holder of the same. The judge refused this request. Requests to charge should be in writing (Civ. Code 1895, § 5479), and there is no exception to the rule that a refusal to give an oral request to charge is not ground for a new trial.

3. Hodgson was permitted to testify that he requested Stiles to sign the note, and Stiles that he signed the note at Hodgson's request. This testimony was allowed over the objection of plaintiff that he was not present when the request was made, and did not know of the same. The objection was without merit, as Hodgson also testified that he asked Stiles to execute the note at the instance and request of the plaintiff. The following question and answer in the interrogatories of Hodgson were read to the jury by defendant, over plaintiff's objection: "Q. When Mr. Shedden acquired possession of said note, did he or did he not know of the circumstances, [under which] the note was signed by Mr. Stiles, and did he have full knowledge of all the facts relating to the signing of said note before it came into his possession? A. I think so." The objection was that the witness merely gave his opinion, and not facts. The witness testified positively that the note was executed for plaintiff's accommodation; that witness, at the instance of plaintiff, requested Stiles to sign the instrument; that neither witness nor Stiles received any consideration for the same; and that witness delivered it to plaintiff for use in his business. We are unable to understand what other circumstances and facts relating to the signing of the note, either by Stiles or the witness, the question referred to; and, as the testimony of the witness was positive as to these matters, allowing his opinion as to the same subjects, though it ought not to have been admitted, is not cause for a new trial. An extended answer of Hodgson to another interrogatory was read to the jury by defendant, over an objection by plaintiff that the answer was merely the witness' supposition. The objection was to the whole of the answer, some parts of which purported to state facts, and hence were clearly admissible over the objection made. The objection to the whole was therefore not well taken. Bass Co. v. Granite City Co., 116 Ga. 176, 42 S. E. 415 (5).

4. Upon the trial the plaintiff testified orally in his own behalf. The defendant put in evidence the answers of the plaintiff to interrogatories which had been sued out for him, for the purpose of impeaching him. After the jury had retired to deliberate as to their verdict, the court, upon motion of the defendant and over the objection of the plaintiff, sent to the jury "the answers" to such interrogatories. This action of the court was assigned as error in the motion for a new trial. The practice as to whether interrogatories or depositions read upon the trial should be delivered to the jury when they retire to consider as to their verdict is not the same in the different states. In some jurisdictions it is held to be a matter largely within the discretion of the trial judge, in others it is held that they should go to the jury, and in still others that they should not, but it is generally the rule that depositions read in evidence should not go to the jury; and if they are calculated to influence the jury, and go to their room without the knowledge of the losing party, it has been held that the verdict should be set aside. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 1241, 1242. The reason given for not allowing them to be delivered to the jury is that the testimony which they contain, if read and re-read by the jury, would have an unfair advantage over oral testimony of the other side, by speaking to the jury more than once. Thomp. & M. Juris, § 385 (1, 2); Abbott's Trial Brief (Civil Jury Trials), 477, 478; Thompson on Trials, § 2578. Where all the evidence is in writing, it has been held that depositions read in evidence may be taken out by the jury on retiring to deliberate. Id. In so far as our information goes, it has ever been the practice in this state not to permit interrogatories to be delivered to the jury. In Andrews v. Tinsley, 19 Ga. 303, the jury, after having retired to consult as to their verdict, sent their bailiff to the clerk for the interrogatories of the plaintiff, which had been read in evidence before them. They desired to examine the interrogatories merely to refresh their memories as to certain dates, about which there was no controversy between the parties. This was held not to be cause for a new trial. In Falvey v. Richmond, 87 Ga. 99, 13 S. E. 261, interrogatories of the plaintiff were handed to the jury by plaintiff's counsel, and taken by them to their room. Plaintiff's counsel made an affidavit that he inadvertently gave the interrogatories to the jury, and that there was no attempt on his part to gain an unfair advantage thereby. It appeared from the affidavit of the foreman of the jury that the interrogatories were neither read nor examined by any of the jury, and that they did not even know that they had the interrogatories until after returning to the court room. It was held that "under these affidavits there was no error in the refusal of the court to grant a new trial on this ground." We think there is a clear intimation in these two decisions of this court that interrogatories should not be delivered to the jury. If a paper calculated to influence a jury in favor of the prevailing party goes to and is considered by them while deliberating as to their verdict, it is cause for a new trial. Georgia Pacific Ry. Co. v. Dooley, 86 Ga. 300, 12 S. E. 923, 12 L. R. A. 342, and cases cited. The answers to the interrogatories of the plaintiff sent to the jury by the court in the present case were calculated to influence them in favor of the defendant, in whose favor the verdict was rendered. We therefore think that a new trial should be granted on this ground.

O'DONNELL v. WING & SON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

BAILMENT — WHAT CONSTITUTES — TITLE OF GOODS — DESTRUCTION — ABSOLUTE SALE — ACTION FOR PRICE — DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. Where goods are shipped "on trial order," with a right to test the same for 20 days, and if, at the expiration of that time, they are unsatisfactory, the goods shipped shall be returned to the railroad, to be held at the shipper's disposal, or, if satisfactory, $230 shall be paid therefor, of which $65 is to be cash and the balance in monthly payments, the same is a contract of bailment. The title remains in the bailor, and if, before notification of satisfaction, the property is destroyed during the 20 days, the loss will fall on the bailor as owner.

2. But if the bailee retains the property after the 20 days his retention will be equivalent to an expression of satisfaction. The sale becomes absolute, and the holder liable to an action for the purchase money.

3. Such satisfaction and completion of the sale may likewise result where a person in possession under a "trial order" treats the property as his own, as by a sale to a third person.

4. Where, therefore, it appears that in April, 1901, goods were shipped on such "a trial order," and, after being received, were sold in June, 1901, the purchaser acquired a title good as against the original owner.

5. There was no evidence as to the condition of the instrument at the time it was received by the defendant, and nothing to show what was then or subsequently a fair value for its use; and it was error to direct a verdict against the defendant for $68 hire.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; B. B. Bower, Judge.

Action by Wing & Son against Fannie O'Donnell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Laura L. Wing (doing business under the name of Wing & Son) brought an action against Mrs. O'Donnell for the recovery of a piano and $4 a month rent. It appeared that the plaintiff sent to W. P. Jones at Bellwood, Fla., on April 1, 1901, a circular containing instructions: "How to order a piano on trial. Sign and return trial order. No advance payment is required. We pay all freight, and you will be under no more obligations to keep the piano than if you were examining it in our store or factory." On the same sheet Jones filled out blank order as follows: "Please ship one Wing Piano as described above, in your own name, with stool and scarf, to Grand Ridge, Fla., with freight prepaid, and send me an order to get it from the Railroad Agent for trial only. There is no agreement by me to purchase this piano; but I will allow it to remain in my home on trial for twenty days, and if it proves satisfactory I will pay you $230.00, in the following manner: $65.00 cash, and $15.00 per month. If the piano does not prove satisfactory, I will have it boxed as received and return to the depot for your disposal. I am under no more obligations to keep this piano than if I were examining it in your warehouse. I am to be under no expense for freights coming or going. W. P. Jones. Instruct me when to ship you old instrument." The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that there was no other contract than that indicated above, and no agreement to accept any old instrument from Jones until after he had tested the piano, and it had proved satisfactory to him, and he had complied with the terms of the order by paying the cash payment. No old instrument was received from him. The piano was shipped in accordance with the contract. There was some exception to the testimony of the witness on the ground that as to a part his information was derived from the books. Mrs. O'Donnell testified that in June, 1901, she heard that there was a man in Bainbridge, where she lived, who desired to sell a piano cheap, and she then purchased it from Mr. Jones, paying him part cash and giving him her note for the balance. The witness for the plaintiff testified that the piano was worth $230 at the time it was shipped, and, if kept in the same condition, would be of practically the same value at the time of answering the interrogatories. He had not seen the piano since shipment, and did not know what its condition was. The value of the piano for monthly hire or rent was about $4 per month. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the piano in question and for $4 rent per month, the same amounting to $68. The defendant made a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and contrary to the evidence, and alleged error in the admission of testimony for the plaintiff stating that the title was in Wing & Son, and of answers which indicated that the witness testified from books rather than his own knowledge. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

T. S. Hawes, for plaintiff in error. A. L. Townsend, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). The piano was shipped to Jones on a "trial order." The case is not to be controlled by the question as whether the defendant paid full value, but by determining whether Jones, in June, 1901, had a title, and the consequent right to sell to Mrs. O'Donnell. On April 1, 1901, he ordered the plaintiff to ship the piano, agreeing to take it on trial for 20 days, and if it proved satisfactory, he would pay $230, of which $65 was to be cash and the balance in monthly payments. If the piano did not prove satisfactory, he agreed to have it boxed and returned to the depot, to be held at the plaintiff's disposal. This amounted to a bailment, and not a sale. But it is manifest that time was important in determining the status of each party. If during the 20 days, and before he had expressed his satisfaction, the instrument had been destroyed, the loss would have fallen upon the bailor as owner. But if, without otherwise expressing satisfaction, Jones had retained the instrument after 20 days (Newburger v. Hoyt, 86 Ga. 508, 12 S. E. 925), and it had thereafter been destroyed, the plaintiff would undoubtedly have been authorized to recover the purchase price of him. If the title was in him as owner to bear the loss (Civ. Code 1895, § 3543), it was in him for purposes of sale. The "trial order" did not provide for a mere option. The terms of the agreement were definite. Nothing more was needed to make the minds of the parties meet so as to complete the sale. By the expressed language of the order Jones agreed to buy, if, after the 20-days trial, the piano was found to be satisfactory. That agreement was assented to by the plaintiff when she shipped the instrument. The question, therefore, of sale or no sale, depended upon satisfaction or dissatisfaction, to be determined within a given period. And by retaining the instrument beyond the time limited Jones, by his conduct, expressed such satisfaction as made the sale absolute. For a breach of the agreement to pay the cash and monthly balances due by reason of such satisfaction he became liable in an action to the plaintiff, who may yet maintain the same. Corvalle v. Humphreys, 16 East, 830 (1812).

In addition to retaining the piano, it appears that Jones sold it to the defendant. There are cases which hold that under shipments on trial order the fact that the article so received is sold to a third person is itself such an expression of satisfaction as to complete the sale. Title then passes from the seller to him who has obtained possession under a trial order with right to purchase on given terms if the property proves satisfactory. Delamater v. Chapell, 48 Md. 253. On the general subject of trial orders, see 2 Benj. Sales (Corbin's Ed.) § 911; 1 Mechem on Sales, 663 et seq. As to sales or return, see Newburger v. Hoyt, 86 Ga. 508, 12 S. E. 925; Furst v. Commercial Bank, 117 Ga. 472, 43 S. E. 728.

A witness for the plaintiff testified as to the value of the piano when it was shipped. He stated that he had not seen it between that date and the time of trial; that, if it was in the same condition as when it left the premises, it was worth $280; and that it was worth "about $4 for hire." There was no evidence whatever as to its condition at the time of delivery to the defendant, and no other evidence as to what would have been a reasonable hire for its use. The court should have sustained that ground of the motion for a new trial based on the direction of a verdict for the plaintiff for $4 a month rent.

MCCALL et al. v. WILKES et al.

PLEADING—ANSWER—AMENDMENT—ACTION ON NOTE—SET-OFF—REJOINDER—WARRANTY.

1. A defendant who has filed his plea may, after the expiration of the time within which he is allowed to plead, set up by amendment any new defense without making an affidavit that the omission of such defense from his original answer was not intended for the purpose of delay, if in the discretion of the trial judge the circumstances of the case or the ends of justice require that such amendment be allowed. Acts 1897, p. 35.

2. Where, in answer to a suit on a note, the defendants seek to set off the value of certain timber on land conveyed to them by the plaintiff by a warranty deed, alleging that as to the timber the warranty has failed, it is not a good rejoinder that the grantee had knowledge of an outstanding paramount title to the timber prior to the execution of the deed; nor is parol evidence admissible to show that it was not the intention of the parties that title to the timber should pass, the deed being in the usual form of a conveyance of land with a complete warranty of title. Civ. Code 1895, § 8615.

3. The defendants in their plea of set-off having averred that the timber on the land was worth only $3 per acre, a verdict allowing $3.25 per acre was contrary to law; but, the defendants having voluntarily written off the excess over the amount claimed by them, the verdict will not be set aside because of this excessive finding.

4. It appeared beyond dispute that the plaintiffs had made a conveyance of the timber to third persons prior to the date of the note given by the defendants for the value of the land including the timber. The jury found that the warranty of title had absolutely failed as to the timber, and that the defendants were entitled to set off its value. The lowest amount at which any of the witnesses estimated the value of the timber was in excess of the principal of the note sued on, and the jury would therefore not have been authorized, in striking a balance between the parties, to allow interest from the maturity of the note.

5. There was no error assigned requiring the grant of a new trial.

¶ 4. See Interest, vol. 29, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 123.

COBB, J. The plaintiff bought guano, and had it shipped to the defendant, upon an agreement that the guano was to be sold to planters, notes taken payable in the fall, the notes to be collected, the purchase price of the guano to be paid, and the surplus to be divided equally between the plaintiff and the defendant. The defendant, in his answer, admitted the contract as claimed by the plaintiff, but averred that he did not know how much guano had been received by him, and asked that the plaintiff be held to strict proof as to the quantity shipped. He further alleged that he had remitted a sufficient amount to pay the purchase price of all the guano for which collections had been made, but that there were two notes uncollected, for which he denied he was liable to plaintiff until collection was made. The claim of the plaintiff was for the balance due on the purchase price of the entire shipment and his proportion of the profits on the sales. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant excepts to the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

The burden was upon the plaintiff to show the contract, alleged, the guano shipped, the collection of the notes taken for the same by the defendant, and the failure to remit. The answer admitted the contract. As to the quantity of guano shipped the answer was evasive. The defendant knew, or should have known, how much guano he had received. As it was shipped directly from the manufacturer to him, and did not pass at all into the possession of the plaintiff, knowledge of the quantity shipped and received was more peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant than it could have been within the knowledge of the plaintiff. In such a case the defendant will not be permitted to impose upon the plaintiff the burden of proving the quantity shipped by an answer evasive in its terms, and therefore the allegation in the petition as to the quantity shipped will be taken as true. Civ. Code 1895, § 5054; Lester v. McIntosh, 101 Ga. 675, 29 S. E. 7 (3); English v. Grant, 102 Ga. 35 29 S. E. 157 (4). The only issue, therefore, in the case was whether the defendant had collected and failed to remit the amount sued for, or any part thereof. The plaintiff admitted that some of the notes had not been collected, and the amount of these uncollected notes is stated by the defendant in his testimony. Under this state of facts the plaintiff was clearly not entitled to recover the full amount sued for, which was due only in the event that all the notes taken for the guano had been collected by him. There was evidence authorizing a finding in favor of the plaintiff for some amount. It is difficult to determine, on account of the confused character of the evidence, exactly what this amount was; but the evidence did not authorize a finding for the full amount sued for. The evidence for the plaintiff is confused and unsatisfactory, and must be taken most strongly against him. Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Owens, 119 Ga. 835, 47 S. E. 213. Taking into consideration the positive testimony of the defendant that at least two of the notes were uncollected, and the contradictory character of the testimony of the plaintiff, we do not think he has carried the burden which the law imposes upon him, and a new trial should have been granted.

GOULD v. SMALL.

ACTION ON NOTE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. This being a suit by the indorsee of a negotiable promissory note against one of the makers thereof, the defense being failure of consideration and knowledge of such failure by the plaintiff at the time he took the note; and the defendant having failed to carry the burden of showing that the consideration of the note had failed, it was not error for the court to direct a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by A. B. Small against E. W. Gould. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John R. L. Smith, for plaintiff in error.
Steed & Ryals, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Roush and Gould executed to Thompson and Minchew their promissory note for $500, due four months after date. The note was transferred to Small for value, and before maturity; and upon default in payment Small brought suit against Roush and Gould as makers and Thompson and Minchew as indorsers. Gould filed a separate answer, in which he pleaded failure of consideration, and averred that Small had notice of this defense when the note was negotiated. At the conclusion of the evidence the judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, and Gould excepted.

The note sued on was given for part of the purchase price of certain timber situated on a tract of land known as the "Redd Minchew Place." This land lay partly in Bibb and partly in Twiggs county, but the evidence is undisputed that it constituted an entire tract. Roush and Gould went into possession, and began cutting the timber on the portion of the land in Bibb county. The land in Twiggs county lay adjacent to property owned by Small and others, and there was evidence tending to show that there was a dispute as to the boundary between the two pieces of land. An agent of the adjacent proprietors testified that he warned Gould and Roush not to cut any timber from a designated piece of land unless they could show that it was not part of the land owned by his principals. Other witnesses testified to the same effect. A number of deeds were put in evidence by Gould for the purpose of proving that at the time of the execution of the contract for the sale of the timber there was outstanding a title to the land paramount to that of Thompson and Minchew. It was admitted, however, that they had never been ousted of possession, and that possession once shown will be presumed to have continued until the contrary is shown. Coleman v. Rhee, 105 Ga. 164, 31 S. E. 424. Nor was there any effort to prove fraud on the part of Thompson and Minchew, or that they were insolvent; and under the ruling of this court in Black v. Walker, 98 Ga. 31, 26 S. E. 477, the fact that there was an outstanding title paramount to that of their vendors would not avail as a defense to an action on their notes for the purchase money unless there existed some additional ground, of the nature indicated, to authorize equitable interference with the carrying out of the contract as made. See, also, Mallard v. Alfred, 106 Ga. 503, 32 S. E. 588.

It was argued by counsel for the plaintiff in error that Gould was entitled to a verdict in the court below for the reason that Thompson and Minchew had no deed to the land on record, and that, therefore, if Gould should go on the land and cut the timber, he would be guilty of a misdemeanor under the act approved December 20, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 59). His brief does not elaborate this point, but we understand the contention to be that, unless Thompson and Minchew had a recorded deed, Gould would have no right to cut the timber, and that therefore the contract would be contrary to public policy as requiring the commission of an unlawful act. A complete reply to this argument is that no such defense is set up in the plea filed. It does not appear that the defendants have ever done anything to test their right to cut the timber for the purchase price of which the note sued on was given. Certain it is that they cannot avoid liability on that note merely by reason of the fact that they heeded the warning of one who notified them to refrain from cutting the timber unless they could show their right to do so. The record clearly discloses that the plaintiff in error failed to carry the burden imposed upon him by law of showing that the consideration of the note had failed, and it was therefore not error for the court to direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

NEW TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW.

1. Although the sections of the Code referred to in the motion for a new trial may have been applicable to the case, it does not appear that the principles therein embodied were not otherwise sufficiently submitted to the jury, and it is shown that there was no written request to give the sections in charge.

2. There being an express denial by the defendant of the notice and fraud alleged, the evidence supporting a verdict in his favor, and the finding having been approved by the presiding judge, this court will not interfere with his refusal to grant a new trial. Freeman v. Mencken, 42 S. E. 369, 115 Ga. 1020.

CITY ELECTRIC RY. CO. v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

TRIAL — SEPARATION OF WITNESSES — STREET RAILROADS—INJURIES TO PASSENGER — EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL—DAMAGES—OPINION EVIDENCE—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

1. "Where there is an order for the separation of witnesses, exceptions therefrom as to witnesses not parties to the case are discretionary with the court." Central Railroad Co. v. Phillips, 17 S. E. 952, 91 Ga. 523.

2. Plaintiff testified that he had ridden on defendant's cars six or seven times daily for several years; that he knew their usual motions and movements; that the jerk which it was claimed caused his injury "was an unusual jerk, in that it was very severe. It was a sudden jerk. Witness means by 'severe jerk' that it jerked him with such force that when he caught hold of the railing on the rear end of the car it jerked his hold loose. It was with such force that witness could not hold on to the bar." Held, that permitting the witness to testify that it "was an unusual jerk" was not cause for a new trial. Civ. Code 1895, § 5285.

3. Where in an action for personal injuries one of the items of the damages claimed was the decreased capacity of the plaintiff to labor and earn money, and the petition alleged that at the time the injuries were received plaintiff was capable of earning and was receiving $100 per month, evidence that, but for the injuries, he could earn $150 per month, was admissible, not as a basis for a recovery at that rate, but as tending to show that plaintiff was capable of earning the amount alleged in the petition. See Southern Bell Tel. Co. v. Lynch, 20 S. E. 500, 95 Ga. 529 (2). Where the defendant objected to the admission of such evidence on the ground that "plaintiff was limited by his declaration to a capacity of $100 per month," its admission, without an instruction by the court properly limiting its consideration by the jury, was not cause for a new trial, when it appeared from the amount of the verdict, considered in connection with the undisputed evidence in the case, that the defendant was not hurt by the failure to give such instruction.

4. In such a case it was competent for the plaintiff, after giving his reasons therefor, to testify as to what, in his opinion, his services would be worth but for his injuries. Civ. Code 1895, § 5285.

5. Refusing to allow a question to be propounded in a particular form to a witness, even if erroneous, is not cause for a new trial, when it appears that in response to other questions by the same party all that the witness knew on the subject was fully brought out. Elliott v. Banks, 42 S. E. 218, 115 Ga. 926.

6. Where the plaintiff testified that when riding on one of the electric cars of the defendant company he was thrown therefrom by a sudden jerk of the car, it was not error to allow a witness to testify, over defendant's objection, that the effect of suddenly turning on too much electricity to such a car would be to cause it to start too quickly; the objection being that there was no evidence in the case that any electricity was turned on.

7. Even if the court were in error in authorizing the plaintiff to submit evidence on a given subject and to a certain extent, if he introduced no such evidence the error was harmless.

8. Where, in an action against an electric railway company for personal injuries to one of its passengers, alleged to have been caused by a sudden and severe jerk of the car upon which such passenger was riding, a witness for the defendant testified that he had made certain tests with its cars to ascertain whether a jerking motion could be imparted to a moving car by suddenly turning on more electricity, and gave the details as to the character, extent, and result of such tests, upon which he gave an opinion upon the subject in favor of the defendant's contention, which opinion was contrary to one which he, during the same trial, had given when testifying in behalf of the plaintiff, the refusal of the court to permit him to testify that he had ample authority from the defendant company to make thorough tests was not, after a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, cause for sustaining the defendant's motion for a new trial.

9. The requests to charge as to the credibility of witnesses were, in so far as they were legal, covered by the instructions given.

10. There was evidence to authorize the verdict, and the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

ANDERSON v. HILTON & DODGE LUMBER CO.

ACTION ON CONTRACT—PLEADINGS—SPECULATIVE DAMAGES—PROFITS—FAILURE TO LOAN MONEY.

1. Where proceedings are brought to enforce rights arising under a contract required to be in writing, failure to allege in the pleadings that such contract was in writing cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer. The silence raises no presumption that the contract exists only in parol.

2. An allegation that the plaintiff sold to the defendant standing timber to be sawed into lumber, and that after the defendant had moved and located his mill for the purpose of cutting the timber the plaintiff stopped and prohibited the defendant from cutting the timber, whereby he was compelled to shut down his mill and lose the profits, was not demurrable on the ground that the damages were remote or speculative.

3. The profits sued for were not those which were dependent on some other business or enterprise entered into because of the contract, but the defendant was asserting a right for damages occasioned by his being prevented from making the profits which would have been the immediate fruit of the very contract by which the plaintiff granted the right to the defendant to enter upon the land, operate a mill, and sell the lumber. Civ. Code 1895, § 3798.

4. Profits being net earnings after the payment of all expenses, the defendant was not entitled to a recovery of the profits as damages, and likewise for the expense of moving and removing his mill.

5. The allegations in the plea were not sufficient to state a cause of action for damages because of the plaintiff's failure to comply with the promise to lend money to the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by the Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company against H. K. Anderson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company foreclosed a mortgage dated August 14, 1896, on personal property in the manner provided in Civ. Code 1895, § 2753. The mortgagor, Anderson, defended by the counter affidavit allowed by Civ. Code 1895, § 2756. There were several pleas, some of which were stricken, and after the case was remanded (110 Ga. 263, 34 S. E. 365) the affidavit was so amended as to charge that on August 14, 1896, the Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company sold to Anderson all the pine timber suitable for sawmill purposes on 28 lots of land in Laurens and Montgomery counties at 50 cents per thousand for all timber averaging 400 feet and 75 cents per thousand for all lumber containing over 400 feet, agreeing at the same time to buy from the defendant the lumber sawed therefrom at $9.20 per thousand feet; that the Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company also agreed to advance him certain sums of money with which to enable defendant to locate his sawmill on the property for the purpose of squaring the timber, said loan to be secured by an additional mortgage on the property previously conveyed; that the defendant agreed to, and did in pursuance of the contract, remove his sawmill about 14 miles to a point convenient to the timber sold; that the plaintiff knew, at the time of making the contract, that it would be necessary to make such removal and incur the expense incident thereto; that in February, 1897, the lumber company prohibited the defendant from cutting or sawing the timber; that this expense was a complete loss to the defendant, and the amount thereof he prays may be recouped or set off as against the plaintiff's claim; that defendant cut a small number of trees, and delivered them to Hall & Johnson to square the logs for market, and thereupon the plaintiff notified Hall & Johnson not to square the timber, or else that plaintiff would hold them responsible, and thereupon the said Hall & Johnson refused to square the logs, to defendant's damage; that shortly thereafter the plaintiff stopped and prohibited the defendant from cutting the timber on the 28 lots, to his damage, and by reason thereof defendant had to shut down his mill, and lost the profits which he otherwise would have made. He also sues for the expense of moving his mill to the timber, and for expenses for subsequently being obliged to move it away by reason of the conduct of the plaintiff. He states how much timber was on the land, and that he could have cut the same had he been allowed to do so by the plaintiff, and that he lost the profits of the business between February 1, 1897, and July 1, 1897. The mortgage shows on its face that it was given to secure not only the amount indicated, but such future advances as might be made. The defendant, by his affidavit, alleged that the plaintiff had agreed to advance him additional sums to operate his business, but failed so to do, and refused to pay checks drawn by him on it, to his damage. The court refused to allow the amendment. The defendant excepted. The original affidavit of illegality was filed in May, 1897. The demurrer filed at the January term, 1899, was sustained, and this judgment reversed. 110 Ga. 263, 34 S. E. 365. There was an additional amendment in July, 1898, to the effect that the defendant had been enjoined by one McLendon from cutting the timber; that he was delayed thereby for 60 days, and finally permanently enjoined; that thereby he lost the timber which the plaintiff had sold him, to his damage $1,800. The last amendment was filed on July 25, 1904. The affidavit of illegality and amendment were demurred to on 22 grounds. The bill of exceptions recites that the court refused the amendment "because it set up a contract for timber growing on said land, and did not allege that the contract was in writing, and because the damages sought to be set off in said amendment against the debt of the plaintiff were too remote and speculative to be so set off." The court thereupon sustained the demurrer to the original affidavit and amendment, and entered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant excepts to this ruling, contending, among other things, that the court could not consider the special grounds of demurrer to the affidavit and the amendment, which had been of file in court for several terms.

T. L. Griner and James K. Hines, for plaintiff in error. Dessau, Harris & Harris and De Lacy & Bishop, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). The objections raised by the special demurrer could have been cured by amendment. The parties have argued only the controlling question. It would be unprofitable to consider each of the many special grounds of the demurrer. We shall therefore consider only the points which the bill of exceptions indicates were involved in the decision by the trial judge. Moss v. Fortson, 99 Ga. 496, 27 S. E. 745.

1. A party is not obliged to set out in his pleadings the evidence on which he relies. The failure to allege that a contract is in writing raises no presumption that it exists only in parol. It is now well settled in this state that, where proceedings are brought to enforce rights arising under agreements required to be in writing, the failure to allege that the contract was in writing cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer. Taliaferro v. Smiley, 112 Ga. 62 (3), 66, 37 S. E. 106; Draper v. Macon Company, 103 Ga. 661, 30 S. E. 566, 68 Am. St. Rep. 136.

2, 3. The plaintiff agreed to sell certain timber to the defendant at a certain price. It also agreed to buy from him lumber cut therefrom at a certain price. The damages arising from the breach of the contract to sell or the breach of the contract to buy were recoverable, and the measure of damages in such cases is clearly defined. But treating the counter affidavit as pleading seeking to set up a cause of action for the damages resulting from the plaintiff's refusal to permit the defendant to operate the mill and cut the timber sold for that purpose, it was not demurrable. Anderson was not suing to recover profits which were dependent on some other enterprise entered into because he happened to have this contract. He sued for the profits which would have been the immediate result of his operating a mill which the plaintiff had agreed he might operate when it stipulated that he should cut the trees and saw them into lumber for purposes of sale. He was suing for damages in contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. Civ. Code 1895, § 3798; Stewart v. Lanier Co., 75 Ga. 582; Waycross Co. v. Offerman Co., 114 Ga. 731, 40 S. E. 738; Kenny v. Collier, 79 Ga. 744, 8 S. E. 58.

4. Of course, the defendant is not entitled to recover for the profits and also the expenses in conducting the business. Moving the mill to the land or removing the mill from the land were not expenses incurred in carrying out a contract between two parties, such as those included in Civ. Code 1895, § 3806. Nor are they expenses to which a party was put by reason of a tort referred to in Civ. Code 1895, § 3908. But the expenses of moving and removing the mill were a necessary part of the cost of conducting defendant's business, and by the expenditure of which he expected to make the profit for which he sued. They are no more recoverable than would be the expenses of paying his employes while the mill was actually in operation.

5. The mortgage did provide that the property thereby conveyed should be security for any advances thereafter made to the defendant by the plaintiff. It is alleged that an agreement to lend was violated, and that the defendant was damaged by the company's failure to advance money as agreed. But the defendant does not state enough to warrant a recovery on the ground that there had been damage to his credit by failure to pay the check. Nor does he allege enough to entitle him to recover for a breach of the agreement to lend. There have been cases in which such suits have been maintained, but they are extremely rare, and, in view of the nature of money, must be. One dollar in legal tender is worth no more than another. The price of money is the principal and the legal or contract rate of interest. Hence the circumstances must be peculiar in which a person is entitled to damages because of a failure to lend as promised. No injury will flow from such a breach if the same amount can be borrowed from another on the same terms. If there is a mere contract to lend, and no date is named for the maturity of the loan, repayment is due immediately. Damages for failure to receive that which would have to be at once returned would be nothing, though the circumstances might be such as to change this rule if the lender knew that the money was intended for some purpose which precluded the idea of immediate repayment. But it is evident that the nature of the transaction is such as to afford no room for the implications which so often supply the omitted terms in many other contracts. There must be something definite. The contract must be supported by a consideration. It must be mutual. Swindell v. Bank, 121 Ga. —, 49 S. E. 673. And it must be made to appear that the borrower had been unable to obtain a like sum upon like terms. It would further be necessary to show definitely and distinctly that the damage (other than that arising from having to pay a higher rate of interest) was in contemplation of the intending lender at the time he made the agreement to lend. The counter affidavit in the present case did not state a cause of action for the alleged breach of the contract to lend money or make advances. Blue v. Capitol Bank, 145 Ind. 518, 43 N. E. 655; Goodon v. Moses, 99 Ala. 230, 18 South. 765; McGee v. Wineholt (Wash.) 63 Pac. 571; Kelly v. Fahrney, 97 Fed. 176, 38 C. C. A. 103; Equitable Mortg. Co. v. Thorn (Tex. Civ. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. CHICAGO PORTRAIT CO.

ACTION ON CONTRACT—PETITION—CARRIERS—CONVERSION OF FREIGHT—AGREED VALUATION—DAMAGES—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. Where a petition can be construed either as a suit in contract or as an action for a breach of duty arising out of the contract, the latter construction will be adopted.

2. The shipment by a common carrier of non-perishable merchandise from the point of destination to another point on the line of its railway, for the purpose of sale as unclaimed freight, within less than six months from the time such goods arrive at destination, is a conversion of the same in the county where the point of destination is located.

3. In an action of tort against a common carrier for the conversion of goods consigned to the plaintiff the carrier cannot take advantage of his own wrong, nor lessen the measure of his liability, by invoking an agreed valuation which the plaintiff may have made for the purpose of reducing the freight rate or securing like collateral advantage.

4. In an action of the character above indicated the expenses of the plaintiff's agent, incurred while waiting for the delivery of the freight upon the statement of the agent of the carrier that the same had not arrived, when in fact it was then in his possession, is too remote to be the basis of a recovery against the carrier.

5. The allegations of the petition were not sufficient to authorize the recovery of attorney's fees.

6. The evidence authorized a verdict for the actual value of the goods converted, and the judgment is affirmed upon condition that all other sums be written off.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Albany; R. Hobbs, Judge.

Action by the Chicago Portrait Company against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition.

The Chicago Portrait Company brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, alleging that it delivered to the railway company in Chicago five boxes of nonperishable merchandise, to be transported by the defendant and its connecting carriers to Albany, Ga.; that the merchandise was delivered to the defendant company, and by it transported to its destination; that it reached Albany in good order; and that the defendant converted the same by causing it to be shipped to Savannah, Ga., as unclaimed freight, and there sold at public outcry, within less than six months after the same had arrived at Albany. The defendant filed special demurrers to the petition, a plea to the jurisdiction, and an answer. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant assigns error upon the judgments overruling its demurrers, plea to the jurisdiction, and motion for a new trial.

Wooten & Hofmayer, for plaintiff in error. S. J. Jones and Mayson, Hill & McGill, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. 1. We think the petition can be properly construed as seeking to recover for a tort committed in converting the goods. But even if the language of the petition is equivocal, any doubt as to its meaning is to be resolved by construing it as an action for a tort, rather than as an action for a breach of the contract of transportation. It has been said that in cases where the plaintiff has a right to elect to sue either upon a contract or for a tort arising out of a breach of duty under the contract, the petition, if equivocal in its terms, will be construed as claiming damages for the tort. Aiken v. Southern Railway Co., 118 Ga. 120, 44 S. E. 828, 62 L. R. A. 666, 98 Am. St. Rep. 107.

2. The suit was brought in the city court of Albany. The goods were sold in Savannah. The plea to the jurisdiction set up that the suit was improperly brought in Dougherty county, but should have been brought in Chatham county, where the sale took place; it being claimed that there was no conversion of the goods until the sale took place. The sale was undoubtedly a conversion; but we think the conversion was complete when the agent at Albany shipped the goods to Savannah as unclaimed freight, for the purpose of sale, within less than six months after they had arrived at destination. See Civ. Code 1895, § 2303. The plaintiff might have sued in Savannah, but it certainly had a right to sue in Albany.

3. It was contended that the contract of transportation was an Illinois contract, and was therefore to be governed by the laws of that state, and that under such laws a common carrier has a right to make a special contract, upon a sufficient consideration, limiting its liability for negligence and fixing the amount to be recovered in the event of a loss; and that under the contract made in this case with the initial carrier in Illinois, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, it was entitled to recover only $5 for every 100 pounds of freight. We do not find it necessary to determine in this case whether the contention as to the law of Illinois is correct, or whether, if correct, that law is applicable to the contract of carriage referred to in the petition. This suit is not brought for a breach of the contract of carriage. The wrong complained of is a conversion of the plaintiff's goods after the contract of carriage was completed. As was well said by Mr. Justice Lamar in Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company v. Johnson, 121 Ga. —, 48 S. E. 808: "In an action of trover or damages for conversion the tortfeasor could not take advantage of his own wrong, nor lessen the measure of his liability, by invoking an agreed valuation which the plaintiff may have made for the purpose of reducing the freight rate or securing like collateral advantage."

4. The plaintiff claimed as a part of its damages the expenses of its agent while he was waiting at Albany for the goods to arrive, after four of the boxes had reached there, and the agent had informed him that the other would soon come, when in fact it had actually arrived at that time. We do not think damages of this character could be properly recovered. They do not flow directly from the wrongful act, and are too remote to be the basis of a recovery. The court therefore erred in not striking upon demurrer that portion of the petition which claimed these damages.

5. In the ninth paragraph of the petition appears the following allegation: "Petitioner insists that, as it has made every effort for the past year and a half to get a settlement of this claim out of said railway without success, and said company's persistent refusal to settle or pay the same entitles petitioner to recover from said company its reasonable attorney's fees incurred in bringing and prosecuting this suit, which it shows is the sum of one hundred dollars." The averments just quoted were specially demurred to on the ground that they did not set out any legal reason why the defendant should be subjected to a claim for attorney's fees. We think this demurrer was well taken. Attorney's fees are not generally allowed a litigant, but the Code declares that they may be allowed if the defendant has acted in bad faith, or has been stubbornly litigious, or has caused the plaintiff unnecessary trouble and expense. Civ. Code 1895, § 8796. There was no allegation that the defendant had acted in bad faith, or had been stubbornly litigious, nor was it in terms alleged that it had caused the plaintiff unnecessary trouble and expense. The averment was, in effect, merely that the defendant had so acted as to compel the plaintiff to bring a suit to recover the amount due it. This is not sufficient to tax the defendant with attorney's fees. Pferdmenges v. Butler, 117 Ga. 400, 43 S. E. 695; Traders' Ins. Co. v. Mann, 118 Ga. 381, 45 S. E. 426.

6. While there are other assignments of error, none of them are of such a character as to require an extended discussion, and any error that may have been committed would not be sufficient of itself to require a reversal of the judgment. The evidence fully authorized a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $138.60 as the value of the articles lost; and, as this exact amount was sued for, and no interest was claimed in the petition, the recovery should have been limited to this sum. Ga. R. Co. v. Crawley, 87 Ga. 192, 13 S. E. 508. If the plaintiff will write off from the verdict and judgment the attorney's fees found and all damages except $138.60, the judgment will be affirmed; otherwise a judgment of reversal will be entered.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. A. Covington, Judge.

Action by the Driver Lumber Company against the Moultrie Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Driver Lumber Company brought suit against the Moultrie Lumber Company, alleging that the defendant had accepted an order from the plaintiff for switch ties, on condition that the defendant would guaranty quantity, quality, and count; that under the terms of the order the ties were to be shipped to Brunswick, and there inspected, and the defendant was "to stand the inspection and bear the loss of such culls and rejections as might be made"; that the ties were shipped, and the plaintiff paid to the defendant the full amount demanded; and that thereafter, when the ties were inspected, a number were rejected, and these rejections rendered the defendant liable to plaintiff in a stated sum. The defendant answered, admitting that ties had been shipped, and that the full amount of the bill had been paid, but averred that it was unable, from want of sufficient information, to either admit or deny the allegation in reference to the inspection and rejection. The defendant further pleaded that according to the terms of the order, as well to the general custom of the business in which the parties were engaged, the defendant was entitled to notice of rejections within a reasonable time, and that plaintiff had failed to report the rejections for four months, although often requested to make such report. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and error is assigned upon this ruling.

W. F. Way, Bryan & Watson, and Z. D. Harrison, for plaintiff in error. Shipp & Kline, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The answer of the defendant did not admit a prima facie case, and therefore the burden was upon the plaintiff to establish by proof such material allegations of the petition as were not expressly admitted in the answer. The order and the payment of the full amount claimed by the defendant as due for the shipment of cross-ties were admitted, but the answer did not admit that rejections had been made, or that the amount represented by rejections was the sum alleged in the petition. It was a necessary part of the plaintiff's case to prove that these rejections had been made as alleged. The only evidence offered to establish this was a report made by the Bainbridge Lumber Company to the plaintiff, which had been forwarded to the defendant, showing that rejections had been made as alleged in the petition. As against the defendant, this report was merely hearsay, and it is now settled in this state that hearsay evidence has no probative value. Equitable Mortgage Co. v. Watson, 119 Ga. 280, 283, 46 S. E. 440, and citations. The plaintiff having failed to make out a prima facie case by competent evidence, it was error to direct a verdict in its favor.

As the case is to be again tried, it is necessary to allude to the special plea of the defendant. As the order did not, on its face, provide for reports of inspection, to be made within a reasonable time, the defendant can take nothing under that averment in its plea to the effect that such was the contract. If upon another trial it should appear by competent evidence that there was a custom of the business in which the parties were engaged that, in orders of the character here involved rejections should be reported within a reasonable time, and that such custom was so universal in its application that a presumption would arise that both parties contracted in the light of it, then the defendant would be entitled to have the issue as to whether the reports in this case had been made within a reasonable time submitted to the jury. There was some evidence in reference to such a custom, but we will not now determine whether it was sufficient to establish a custom of the character above referred to. But, even in the absence of such a custom, the sale would be governed by principles similar to those applicable in cases where goods are delivered "on sale or return," and a failure, for an unreasonable time, to notify the seller that the articles delivered do not comply with the contract, would authorize the seller to treat the sale as complete; and certainly this would be the case if, after the lapse of a reasonable time, no notice of rejections was made, and the seller, treating the sale as complete, had paid out money or otherwise acted so that rejections then made would work to him harm or prejudice. See Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) § 597; 1 Mechem on Sales, §§ 675, 676.

WARREN v. POWELL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

TRESPASS—PETITION—ALLEGATION AS TO TIME.

1. There must be a time averred in the writ, showing when every material or traversable fact transpires. The demurrer attacking the petition on the ground that no time was stated should have been sustained.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

A. H. Russell, W. M. Harrell, and A. G. Powell, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Gilpin and T. S. Hawes, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The suit was for damages for trespass for cutting timber. The petition set forth a cause of action. But the special demurrer on the ground that the date of the trespass was not alleged should have been sustained, and the case dismissed, unless the defect were cured. It is true, as contended by the plaintiff, that the statute of limitations is a defense which may be taken advantage of by plea. But where it appears on the face of the petition that the cause of action is barred, the defendant may take advantage thereof by demurrer; the better practice being for the demurrer itself to set forth in terms this special objection. Coney v. Horne, 93 Ga. 725, 20 S. E. 213. The rules of pleading have been adopted partly with a view of saving both the parties and the public the trouble and expense of an unnecessary trial. A defendant is not bound to avail himself of the benefit of the statute of limitations. But if he intends to do so, it would be a useless consumption of time to enter upon the hearing and introduce evidence to establish the existence of a cause of action which the plaintiff admitted to be barred. If by a special demurrer the latter attacks the sufficiency of the petition on the ground that no date is alleged, he is entitled to an order requiring the plaintiff to make such an averment, not only to enable him to know the time of the transaction referred to, and to prepare his evidence accordingly, but also that he may thereafter demur if it should appear that the cause of action was barred, and thus avoid a useless hearing. That time is usually material and necessary to be averred appears from the ruling in Bond v. Central Bank, 2 Ga. 100, where the court said: "It is certainly true that the writ must aver a time when every material or traversable fact transpired. It must allege all the circumstances necessary for the support of the action, * * * and the time and place, with such precision, certainty, and clearness that the defendant, knowing what he is called upon to answer, may be able to plead a direct and unequivocal defense." Andrews v. Thayer, 40 Conn. 156, is directly in point. The action there was in trespass. The only time laid in the declaration was the statement "that heretofore the defendant took and carried away the personal property" described. There was a special demurrer that it did not appear in the declaration when the trespass was committed. The court held that the demurrer was properly sustained. In the present case the defendant, in due time and form, made the objection. The defect was not cured by amendment. The demurrer was overruled.

and the defendant forced to answer such defective petition. Under the rule laid down in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Griffith, 111 Ga. 565, 36 S. E. 859, a new trial necessarily results.

YOUNG v. FAIN, Jailer.

HABEAS CORPUS—REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

1. Where, in a peace-warrant proceeding, one has been committed to jail in default of a bond requiring him to keep the peace, a writ of habeas corpus cannot bring into review alleged irregularities or errors of procedure in the trial before the committal court, or questions as to the sufficiency of the evidence upon which the applicant in the writ was committed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Application by J. A. Young for a writ of habeas corpus to J. J. Fain, jailer. From an order discharging the petition, relator brings error. Affirmed.

W. R. Hammond, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., and Howard & Thompson, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. A peace-warrant proceeding was instituted by Fannie May Young against Mrs. Julia A. Young before J. G. Bloodworth, notary public and ex officio justice of the peace of Fulton county, which resulted in the magistrate passing an order requiring that the defendant therein should give bond in the sum of $200 to keep the peace, and that in default thereof she should be committed to the common jail of the county until discharged by due process of law. Mrs. Young refused to give the required bond, and was, in compliance with the order of the magistrate, confined in the jail. For the purpose of securing her discharge, she applied to Judge Reid, of the city court of Atlanta, and obtained the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus, directed to the jailer of the county. Upon the hearing of the writ, the judge denied the relief prayed for, and remanded the applicant to the jail in accordance with the order of the justice of the peace. Thereupon she sued out a writ of error, and brought the case to this court.

In the bill of exceptions, error is assigned upon the refusal of Judge Reid to permit the applicant to introduce in evidence before him the brief of the evidence heard by the magistrate upon the trial of the peace-warrant proceeding, certified to by him as being correct, and filed by him in the office of the solicitor general of the circuit, and upon the refusal of Judge Reid to even read this paper, or in any wise to consider it in the case. Error is also assigned upon his refusal to hear certain evidence, the purport of which was stated to him by counsel for the applicant, and also set forth in the petition for the writ, which it was alleged, in the petition for the writ, the magistrate, by an erroneous ruling, prevented the defendant in the peace-warrant proceeding from introducing upon the hearing before him. The rulings complained of in the bill of exceptions were based upon the position taken by Judge Reid, that, in the hearing of the writ of habeas corpus, he could not go behind the judgment of the magistrate, either for the purpose of correcting any error which he may have made in his rulings during the trial of the peace-warrant case, or for the purpose of ascertaining and determining from the evidence which the magistrate heard and reported whether or not there was probable cause for requiring Mrs. Young to give the bond to keep the peace. If the judge was right in so holding, then it necessarily follows that the rulings complained of were not erroneous. In our opinion, the question is settled in favor of the position taken by the judge by Pen. Code 1895, § 1224, the first paragraph of which completely covers a case like this. That section and paragraph provide that "no person shall be discharged upon the hearing of a writ of habeas corpus in the following cases, to wit: (1) Where he is imprisoned under lawful process, issued from a court of competent jurisdiction, unless in cases where bail is allowed and proper bail is tendered." The process under which the plaintiff in error was committed to the jail of Fulton county was just such process as the law authorizes and provides for in cases of the character of the one with which the magistrate was dealing when he issued it, and hence was lawful process, if he had jurisdiction to issue such process. It is equally clear that it was issued from a court of competent jurisdiction. "A court has jurisdiction of any subject-matter, if, by the law of its organization, it has authority to take cognizance of, try, and determine cases of that description." Cooley's Con. Lim. (7th Ed.) 575. Jurisdiction to issue peace warrants, and to hear and determine the cases arising thereunder, is expressly conferred upon justices of the peace by the statutes of this state. Pen. Code 1895, §§ 1235, 1238. The plaintiff in error was, to use the language of her petition in the present case, "temporarily sojourning in the county of Fulton and city of Atlanta" when the warrant against her was issued; and the fact that she was then in such county and duly served was sufficient, so far as the jurisdiction of the person was concerned. The jurisdiction of the magistrate, then, was competent. His jurisdiction in the peace-warrant proceeding, to hear the evidence submitted, and to determine therefrom whether there was probable cause for requiring that the defendant should give a bond to keep the peace, or be committed to the county jail until discharged therefrom in the manner provided by law, cannot be made dependent upon the question whether there was sufficient evidence before him of such probable cause, for this would be to argue in a circle, and to make his jurisdiction to decide upon the sufficiency of the evidence for this purpose dependent upon the sufficiency of the evidence.

The cases in other jurisdictions which the counsel for the plaintiff in error cites in support of his contention that the habeas corpus court could "review the evidence introduced before the magistrate on the peace warrant proceedings, and determine therefrom whether there was any reasonable or probable cause for the detention of the petitioner in the habeas corpus proceeding," are not in point here. Still less applicable are the cases which he cites in support of his contention that, "in addition to examining the evidence produced before the magistrate on the commitment trial, the court issuing the writ of habeas corpus may hear additional evidence in furtherance of the ends of justice." The prohibitory language, addressed to courts hearing writs of habeas corpus, which we have quoted from section 1235 of the Penal Code of 1895, clearly shows the rule in this state to be that lawful process, issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, is a bar to any investigation of the merits of the case behind such process, whether such investigation be confined strictly to the evidence before the court issuing the process, or be given a broader range, and include evidence newly introduced before the habeas corpus tribunal. It necessarily follows from this statute that in this state the rule announced by the Supreme Court of Connecticut in In re Bion, 59 Conn. 372, 20 Atl. 662, 11 L. R. A. 694, prevails. There it was held: "A writ of habeas corpus cannot operate to bring in review mere irregularities or errors of procedure, or questions as to the sufficiency of evidence, in the case upon which the applicant was committed." In that case, like this, the applicant sought by the writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from the county jail, where he was under commitment for noncompliance with an order of a justice of the peace requiring him to give bond to keep the peace. In the opinion, Loomis, J., well said: "Where one is committed to jail pursuant to a judgment valid on its face, by a court having jurisdiction, and by virtue of legal process valid on its face, the attack on the judgment under a writ of habeas corpus must necessarily be collateral, and subject to the rules restricting collateral attacks, and, if so, the validity and present force of the process are the only subjects for investigation under such a writ in such a case." A similar ruling was made in Ex parte Perdue, 58 Ark. 285, 24 S. W. 423, where it was held: "On certiorari to review the action of the circuit court in refusing to discharge a prisoner on habeas corpus, where it appears that the prisoner is held under a regular commitment by a magistrate in a cause wherein he had jurisdiction, the sufficiency of the evidence upon which the commitment was made will not be inquired into." Chief Justice Bunn, in delivering the opinion, cited State v. Neel, 48 Ark. 289, 8 S. W. 633, where it was held: "If the person restrained of his liberty is in custody under process, nothing will be inquired into, by virtue of the writ, beyond the validity of the process upon its face, and the jurisdiction of the court by which it was issued."

See, also, in this connection, the observations of Mr. Justice Candler as to the function of the writ of habeas corpus in Stephens v. Henderson, 120 Ga. 218, 220, 47 S. E. 498; Ex parte Granice, 51 Cal. 375; Turner v. Conkey, 132 Ind. 248, 31 N. E. 777, 17 L. R. A. 509, 32 Am. St. Rep. 251; In re Eldred, 46 Wis. 531, 1 N. W. 175; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 172, 175, 178.

It follows that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WILLIAMS v. SEWELL et al.

ANIMALS—RUNNING AT LARGE—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE—WARRANT OF ARREST—ALTERNATIVE SENTENCE—FINE—ENFORCEMENT—MALICIOUS ARREST—FALSE IMPRISONMENT—JUDGMENT FOR COSTS.

1. An animal tied to a stake in a public street for the purpose of permitting it to graze upon the herbage therein is an obstruction of such street, and is at large, within the meaning of ordinances authorizing the removal of obstructions from the public streets, and requiring the marshal of the town to take up live stock running at large and confine them in a pound. It is immaterial whether the portion of the street thus occupied by the animal is in actual use by the public at the time, if it is subject to be used as a highway.

2. A municipal charter which imposes upon the mayor the duty of seeing that the ordinances of the town are faithfully executed, and confers upon him jurisdiction to try all persons charged with violating such ordinances, authorizes the mayor to issue a warrant for the arrest for trial of one charged with the violation of an ordinance; and this is true notwithstanding the charter does not in express terms authorize the mayor to issue a warrant for such purpose.

3. A municipal court authorized by the charter to impose two or more kinds of punishment for a violation of the municipal ordinances may impose an alternative sentence (see Pol. Code 1895, § 712; Hathcock v. State, 13 S. E. 959, 88 Ga. 91, 99; Papworth v. Fitzgerald, 32 S. E. 863, 106 Ga. 382), but has no power, in the absence of express legislative authority, to impose a fine, and enforce its collection by labor upon the public streets (Brieswick v. Brunswick, 51 Ga. 639, 21 Am. St. Rep. 240 [1]; Carr v. Conyers, 10 S. E. 630, 84 Ga. 287, 20 Am. St. Rep. 337 [2]).

4. A judgment of a municipal court imposing a sentence that the accused pay a fine in a given amount, "and, in default of the payment of the same within ten days," that the accused work at hard labor on the streets of the municipality, is, under the rulings in the cases last above cited, not a judgment imposing an alternative sentence, but is a judgment imposing a fine, with a provision that its payment shall be enforced by labor on the public streets.

5. A judgment of the character above indicated, so far as it authorized the enforcement of the payment of the fine by labor on the streets, is void, when there is no express legislative authority conferred upon the municipality to enforce the payment of a fine by labor upon the public streets, and an arrest under such a judgment is unlawful.

6. Such a judgment is in the nature of a warrant for the arrest of the accused, and an officer who makes an arrest thereunder will not be liable either for malicious arrest or false imprisonment if he acts in good faith in attempting to execute the judgment. Civ. Code 1895, § 3852; Berger v. Sanl, 39 S. E. 326, 113 Ga. 869, 871; Page v. Citizens' Banking Co., 38 S. E. 418, 111 Ga. 86, 51 L. R. A. 463, 78 Am. St. Rep. 144.

7. A judgment for costs, in which no amount is stated, is not void. McLendon v. Frost, 59 Ga. 350.

8. There was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

Action by Lizzie Williams against H. H. Sewell and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. D. Jackson, James Beall, and Griffith & Weatherly, for plaintiff in error. W. F. Brown, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. The action was for trespass in taking and carrying away personal property, for assault and battery, malicious arrest, and false imprisonment. The defendants were the mayor and marshal of the town of Temple, and two others who were called to the assistance of the marshal. The charter of the town of Temple will be found in the Acts of 1901, p. 650 et seq. The legal principles controlling the case are set forth in the headnotes. The evidence demanded a finding that the defendants acted in good faith and without malice, and authorized a finding in their favor on all other issues. There was no error of such a character as to require a reversal of the judgment.

HELMS et al. v. MARSHALL.

JUDGMENT—REVIVAL—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. A judgment rendered against an administrator, purporting to revive a judgment which was dormant, but which, so far as the record discloses, was barred, there being no entry on the execution within 10 years after its issuance, is not void, and cannot be collaterally attacked by the heirs at law of the decedent in the trial of a claim interposed by them to the levy of an execution issued on the revived judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Talbot County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Claim case between F. J. Marshall, administrator, and Fannie Helms and others. From the judgment, Helms and others bring error. Affirmed.

J. J. Bull, for plaintiffs in error. Persons & McGehee, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was a claim case, in which Marshall, administrator, was the plaintiff in execution, the administrators of George and Caroline Boswell, respectively, were the defendants in execution, and the claimants were the heirs at law of George and Caroline Boswell. It was admitted that the Boswells were in possession at the dates of the death of each. From the evidence introduced in behalf of the claimants, it appears that judgment was rendered against George Boswell in 1873 in favor of the plaintiff's intestate. This judgment became dormant, and was duly revived in 1888, on a scire facias in favor of Marshall, administrator, against Caroline Boswell, as executrix of George Boswell. Execution upon the revived judgment was issued October 8, 1888, and there were no other entries on the docket. In 1902, more than 10 years from the date that the execution was issued, a proceeding to revive the revived judgment of 1888 was instituted against the legal representatives of both George and Caroline Boswell, and a judgment of revival was rendered against both after proper service. Why the legal representative of Caroline Boswell was made a party, does not appear. The court, over objection of claimants, ruled out all of the evidence introduced by them, on the ground that, being the heirs of George and Caroline Boswell, they could not attack the judgment that had been rendered against the administrators of the Boswells. A verdict was then rendered, finding the property subject, and claimants excepted; assigning error only upon the exclusion of the evidence above referred to.

It appears from the bill of exceptions only by inference that the purpose of the testimony introduced by the claimants was to show that the judgment rendered in 1902 reviving the judgment of 1888 was void, because the judgment sought to be revived was barred by the statute of limitations, and this is the contention of counsel for the plaintiffs in error in his brief. The judgment of 1888, so far as the record discloses, was barred in 1902, when the proceeding to revive it was instituted. Civ. Code 1895, § 3761. A scire facias to revive a dormant judgment is in the nature of a suit, and the defendant is bound to plead all matters of defense that he has, just as he would in an ordinary suit, or else he will be, after the judgment, concluded as to any defense which could have been made the subject-matter of a plea. Lewis v. Allen, 68 Ga. 400. When a legal representative is sued upon a debt of the decedent, it is not his duty to plead the statute of limitations, unless the bar attached during the lifetime of the decedent. Civ. Code 1895, § 3433. If, however, the bar attached during the lifetime of the decedent, it is his duty to interpose the defense of the statute. But if he allows judgment to be rendered against him in either case, both he and the heirs of the estate, who are his privies, are bound by the judgment, and cannot thereafter set up that the claim was barred. The heirs, however, are not precluded by the judgment from holding the administrator responsible as for a devastavit in case it be shown that the claim was not a just claim, or that the bar of the statute attached during the lifetime of the decedent. See Civ. Code 1895, § 3433. A dormant judgment is a debt of record, and the rules above referred to apply to a proceeding instituted thereon, whether it be an ordinary suit on the judgment, or a scire facias to revive the same. A judgment reviving a dormant judgment on scire facias instituted for that purpose is an adjudication between the parties and their privies that the judgment was a dormant judgment at the time the proceeding to revive the same was instituted, and they will not be heard subsequently to aver that the judgment was not dormant at the time the judgment of revival was rendered, or that at that time it was barred by the statute of limitations. Foster v. Reid, 57 Ga. 609; Dunn v. Brogden, 68 Ga. 63. It does not appear that the judgment of 1873 became either dormant or barred during the lifetime of George Boswell, and the judgment of 1888, of course, did not become barred during his life, as that judgment was rendered against his legal representative. So far as the judgment of 1902 was a judgment against the legal representative of George Boswell, it was a valid judgment between the parties and their privies, and was not subject to the attack which was sought to be made on it in the present case. Caroline Boswell was not a party to the judgment of 1873. She was a party to the judgment of 1888 at the time it was rendered, only in her representative capacity as executrix of George Boswell. If she became a party to that judgment in her individual capacity, it was by reason of something that transpired after the judgment was rendered. She may have been a surety on a supersedeas or stay bond, and have thus become bound by the judgment; and, if so, a proceeding to revive the judgment of 1888 would be properly instituted against her. As her legal representative was a party to the scire facias and made no defense, the presumption, after the judgment of revival, would be that she had become in some lawful way bound by the judgment sought to be revived; and a judgment of revival entered against her legal representative would be binding upon him and her heirs, whether the judgment sought to be revived became barred during her lifetime or not. In no view of the case as it appears in the record was the judgment of 1902 void. If it had been shown that this judgment was fraudulent or collusive, a different question would have been presented. No reason for reversing the judgment has been shown.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SALTER v. CITY OF COLUMBUS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—BUSINESS TAX—SOLICITING AGENT.

1. Where a municipal ordinance provides that each person engaged in any business "hereinbelow specified" shall register, pay a license tax, and take out a license, and makes it a penal offense for any person, or agent of any persons, whose duty it is to register and obtain a license, to transact or offer to transact either of the kinds of business specified, and where the business specified "below" is that of persons "dealing in spirituous, vinous or malt liquors," a person charged under these ordinances with "doing business without license" cannot be lawfully convicted on proof that he, as agent of another, solicited orders for malt liquor, and, after the delivery of such liquor by other agents of the principal, collected for his principal the purchase price. Such person was merely a soliciting and collecting agent, and, even if embraced within the ordinances, was not guilty, as charged, of "doing business" himself.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; R. B. Russell, Judge.

R. L. Salter was convicted of doing business in the city of Columbus without payment of license tax, and brings error. Reversed.

Henry C. Cameron and Hatcher & Carson, for plaintiff in error. T. T. Miller, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In the mayor's court of the city of Columbus, Ga., Salter was charged with "doing business in said city without first paying the license tax required." He was summoned to appear to answer concerning a charge of "doing business without license." Upon the trial he was convicted of "doing business without license." He took the case by certiorari to the superior court, where the decision was again adverse to him. He excepted.

The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appeared that Salter was merely an agent for the F. W. Cook Brewing Company, a corporation of Indiana. This company has a cold storage place and place of doing business in Girard, Ala., immediately across the Chattahoochee river from Columbus, Ga.; the river being there spanned by a bridge. The brewing company ships large quantities of beer to Girard, and there stores it. Salter resides in Columbus, and solicits orders from the retail dealers in liquors in that city; the orders being sometimes solicited at the places of business of such retail dealers, and sometimes telephoned by such dealers to the brewing company's place at Girard. Such orders are then filled from the Girard cold storage place by the brewing company delivering the beer to the retail dealers in Columbus. Delivery is made by wagons owned and operated by the brewing company; the beer being taken in such wagons, in the original packages, from Girard to the retail dealers' places in Columbus. Delivery by the brewing company is a part of the contract of purchase of the beer. After the delivery of the beer to the purchasers, Salter collects from them the purchase price. Neither Salter nor the brewing company, nor any person representing them, has taken out or obtained any license from the city of Columbus to sell or deal in any kind of liquors. Salter is engaged in no business other than that here described, and has no office or place of business in Columbus, but has his office and place of business in Girard, at the place of business of the brewing company, at which place he remains the greater part of his time. The ordinance under which Salter was convicted is as follows: "It is further ordained by the authority aforesaid, that each person, firm or corporation engaged in any business, trade, profession or occupation hereinbelow specified, shall register under oath [etc.] his, her or their business, trade or occupations, as hereinbelow specified, and shall pay the license tax prescribed by the 15th day of February, 1904, and take out a license for said business, trade, profession or occupation. * * * And if any person, firm or corporation or agent of any persons, firms or corporations whose duty it is to register and obtain a license, shall transact or offer to transact in said city, either of the kinds of business, trades or occupations in this section specified, without having first registered and obtained said license, * * * he, she or they or such agent, shall on conviction before the recorder, be punished by a fine," etc.

"Below" appeared an ordinance imposing a license tax upon "every person or firm dealing in spirituous, vinous or malt liquors within the corporate limits of the city of Columbus, whether as a wholesale or retail dealer."

Salter, the present plaintiff in error, was not, within the meaning of these ordinances, a person "dealing" in liquors. He merely acted as the soliciting and collecting agent of his principal, the brewing company. The "dealing" in malt liquors was done by the principal, acting through Salter and the agents who effected the delivery of the goods ordered and sold. It is not necessary to decide whether the ordinance embraced Salter as an agent of an unlicensed dealer. Conceding that it did so, still this was not the charge made against Salter in the present case. He was himself charged with "doing business without a license." This cannot be held to mean a charge that he was acting as agent for a dealer who should have registered and taken out a license, but had failed to do so. The charge contains no intimation that Salter was merely soliciting business for an unlicensed principal. It is a charge against Salter that he was himself doing the business dealt with in the ordinances, and that he was doing so without having paid the tax required of him, and without having taken out the prescribed license. On this charge he was not guilty. Even if he was guilty of a violation of the ordinances, he was not guilty of having violated them in the manner charged, and his conviction was erroneous. For this reason, the certiorari should have been sustained.

ACTION AT LAW—WAIVER OF HOMESTEAD—RELIEF IN EQUITY.

1. This case is controlled by the ruling in Bell v. Dawson Grocery Company, 48 S. Error from City Court of Americus; O. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by the Lamar, Taylor & Riley Drug Company against J. R. Hudson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Lamar, Taylor & Riley Drug Company brought suit in the city court of Americus against J. R. Hudson on a promissory note for $1,630, dated December 20, 1902, due on demand, with provision for the payment of attorney's fees, and waiving for himself and family any and all homestead or exemption rights he may have by virtue of the Constitution and laws of the state of Georgia or the United States. The defendant pleaded that the note was given in settlement of an account long past due, and not for a consideration given at the time it was signed, and that the homestead waiver was without consideration, and void. For further plea he set up that the plaintiff ought not to have and recover of the defendant, because on January 7, 1903, plaintiff and two others instituted proceedings to have the defendant adjudged an involuntary bankrupt; that on January 21, 1903, defendant was duly adjudged a bankrupt; that in February, 1903, at a meeting of the creditors, the plaintiff proved its debt in the bankrupt court, and on March 19, 1903, filed before the referee its objections to the homestead assigned to the defendant by the trustee in bankruptcy, and on May —, 1903, the plaintiff filed a petition in the district court, and obtained an allowance of $135 as attorney's fees for filing the proceedings in bankruptcy. There was a demurrer to the plea, and an agreed statement of facts, from which it appeared that the note was given for merchandise purchased of the plaintiff by the defendant; that at a meeting of the creditors it was agreed that the stock and assets should be sold, and the claim of the plaintiffs under its homestead waiver, the lien of a mortgage creditor, should be divested from the goods and attached to the proceeds; that the stock was sold for $1,400, and the sale was confirmed April 8, 1903; that on February 25, 1903, the trustee filed his report setting apart as exempt the property described in the bankrupt's claim for exemption; that the plaintiff objected to the report as against its debt because of the waiver of homestead in the note; that the question raised by the objections is still undetermined in the bankrupt court; that on December 18, 1903, the bankrupt filed his petition for discharge, whereupon the plaintiff filed objections to the discharge on the ground that it held the note in which the homestead had been waived, stating that it had entered a suit in the city court of Americus upon such note for the purpose of subjecting the exemption; and that the plaintiff had given the notice required by law to entitle it to recover attorney's fees. The case was submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury, and a judgment was entered for the plaintiff for principal, interest, and attorney's fees, to which the defendant excepted because the judgment was contrary to law, because the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment for more than the value of the homestead, nor to a judgment for attorney's fees, nor to a general judgment against the defendant; because the right of the plaintiff to enforce a waiver note was an equitable right, of which the city court of Americus had no jurisdiction; because, in any event, the plaintiff could only be entitled to a judgment in rem against the exempt property; because the homestead waiver was without a present consideration given at the time that the note was signed, when the defendant was insolvent and in contemplation of bankruptcy, and so known to the plaintiff, by reason whereof the waiver was a preference within the meaning of the bankrupt act, and therefore void.

TERRY v. KEIM et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—TENDER OF PRICE.

1. Before equity will decree specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, there must be an absolute and unconditional tender of the purchase price. An offer to pay the purchase price on delivery of a properly executed deed is not an unconditional tender.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Irwin County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by J. J. Terry against M. C. Keim and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John W. Haygood, Eldridge Cutts, and B. B. Cheney, for plaintiff in error. E. W. Ryman, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. Terry brought suit against John Fry and Louis and M. C. Keim to compel the specific performance of a contract of purchase of certain land. The defendant Fry was a nonresident, and service was not made upon him, and at the trial the plaintiff abandoned his case as to him. The plaintiff submitted evidence tending to establish the following facts: John Fry, a resident of Charlottesville, Ind., was the owner of the premises described in the declaration, and contracted to sell them to plaintiff for $150. The contract was made by correspondence, the beginning of which was a letter from Terry to Fry offering to buy the land for $150. Fry accepted this offer, and instructed Terry to send check to a certain bank, and that as soon as he (Fry) found out the draft was in the bank he would send a deed in proper form. Fry then sent a deed with draft for purchase money attached to the First National Bank of Fitzgerald. Plaintiff declined to pay the draft because the deed was attested by only one witness, and wrote Fry to have the deed executed before two witnesses, and to return it, and he would pay the draft. Fry declined to do this, and afterwards sold the land to M. C. Keim. At the time of Keim's purchase, he had knowledge of plaintiff's contract of sale. The property was vacant, and the plaintiff took possession of it. He has ever been willing to pay the purchase money on receipt of properly executed deed. On the trial of the case, after the plaintiff had submitted his evidence, he tendered the full amount of the purchase money to the defendant Kelm. On motion of the defendant the court granted a nonsuit, and the bill of exceptions assigns error on the judgment of nonsuit.

The court held that the tender of the purchase money was conditional, in that it was coupled with a demand for a deed executed before two witnesses; that, to entitle the plaintiff to specific performance of the contract of sale, it was necessary for him to show, prior to the institution of the suit, an unconditional and absolute tender of the purchase money. In thus holding the trial judge followed the cases wherein this precise question has been adjudicated by this court. In Cothran v. Scanlan, 34 Ga. 555, it was held that a bill for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of land was demurrable where there was no allegation of an unconditional and absolute tender of the purchase price. In that case the allegation of tender was that it was "upon condition that said Cothran and Black would then and there make titles," etc. This case has been cited and the principle therein announced has been approved in De Graffenreid v. Menard, 103 Ga. 651, 30 S. E. 560, and again in Elder v. Johnson, 115 Ga. 692, 42 S. E. 51, and Morris v. Insurance Co., 116 Ga. 53, 42 S. E. 474. The principle of law impelling the court to grant the nonsuit is clearly defined in the cases cited, and the judgment of nonsuit was right.

GEORGIA, F. & A. RY. CO. v. SIZER & CO.

CERTIORARI—TRAVERSE TO ANSWER—VERIFICATION.

1. Where a certiorari has been sued out, taking a case from an inferior judiciary to the superior court, and a traverse is filed to the answer by the plaintiff in certiorari, such traverse may be verified by his attorney at law.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

The Georgia, Florida & Alabama Railway Company levied a distress warrant on property claimed by Sizer & Co. Judgment for claimant. Certiorari dismissed, and plaintiff in certiorari brings error. Reversed.

Donalson & Donalson, for plaintiff in error. T. S. Hawes, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. It appears from the record that certain lumber was levied upon by virtue of a distress warrant in favor of a railroad company and was claimed by Sizer & Co. The case was tried in the city court of Bainbridge, and the property found not subject. Thereupon the railroad company applied for and obtained a writ of certiorari from the superior court. The judge of the city court answered the certiorari, and upon the coming in of his answer a traverse thereto was filed by the plaintiff in certiorari. This traverse was verified by the railroad company's attorney at law who had participated in the trial in the city court. The defendant in certiorari moved to dismiss the traverse upon the ground that it was not verified by the affidavit of the party. The judge of the superior court granted this motion, and the plaintiff in certiorari excepted.

Section 4651 of the Civil Code of 1895 declares that the plaintiff or defendant in certiorari may traverse the truth of the answer, which traverse must be in writing "and verified by affidavit." It will be observed that this section does not prescribe who shall verify the traverse. The broad construction would seem to authorize any one to do so who knew the facts. We know by experience that in many cases tried in the courts one or the other of the parties is not present, and the party himself would in such case be unable to verify the traverse. He could know the facts only upon the information of others. Our Code provides that any act authorized or required to be done under the Code by any person in the prosecution of his legal remedies may be done by his agents, and for this purpose the agent is authorized to make an affidavit or execute a bond although his agency be created by parol. Civ. Code 1895, § 3035. Section 4638 expressly authorizes the attorney at law of a party to make the affidavit required in suing out the certiorari. Having this authority, and the section which requires a traverse to be verified not prescribing by whom the affidavit shall be made, we think it clear, taking all these sections together, that the attorney who tried the case may verify the traverse. There is good reason for believing that the attorney who is expressly authorized to sue out and verify the petition for the writ of certiorari has also authority to prosecute the proceeding, where necessary to his client's interests, by verifying the traverse to the answer. In the present case the attorney who verified the traverse had participated in the trial in the city court. It will be presumed that he knew as much of the facts proved on the trial as did any other person, as it was his duty to attend to them, and to comment on them to the court and jury. He was probably better informed as to these facts than any one else upon his side of the case. If the verification of the traverse had to be made by the party himself, it would, as before remarked, often have to be done upon the information of others. For these reasons we think that the court erred in dismissing the traverse. Let the traverse be tried, and, when the record is made up by the allowance or disallowance of the traverse by the jury, the judge below will then pass upon the merits of the case, and exercise the discretion vested in him in such cases.

ATLANTIC & B. RY. CO. v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MONTEZUMA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

RAILROADS—USE OF STREET—ORDINANCE—VALIDITY.

1. Where, by virtue of Civ. Code 1895, § 2167, par. 5, and a contract with the city, the plaintiff had a right to construct and maintain a railroad track through Cherry street, in Montezuma, this would not authorize the company to use the street for drilling, switching or transferring cars.

2. The chancellor did not err in refusing to enjoin the city from enforcing an ordinance limiting the speed of trains and requiring a flagman to precede the trains in the street, and prohibiting the company from stopping, drilling, or in any manner shifting or transferring cars between indicated points on the street.

Error from Superior Court, Macon County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company against the mayor and council of Montezuma. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On April 7, 1902, in consideration of the mutual benefits arising to each party, it was agreed that the mayor and council of Montezuma would secure for the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company a right of way from the line of Macon county to Flint river, "including right of way to and through Cherry St. in Montezuma, Ga., and would hold the railroad company harmless from any damages arising from the operation of said road through Cherry St. which might be claimed by the owners of the property adjacent thereto by reason of the use of this street for this purpose having been allowed by the city council." The city also provided for the right of way for the location of a "Y" on lands outside of the city, the "Y" to be used for turning locomotives and trains, and donated a right of way 1,200 feet in length running west of Dooly street towards the Flint river. The railroad company, on its part, agreed to begin and prosecute to a finish the building of its road from Cordele to and through Montezuma. By its petition the railroad company alleged that in pursuance of this contract it had constructed its line of railway through Cherry street to the aforesaid tract of land, upon which it erected its depot, and has continued to maintain and operate its road to said point as its terminus; that especially in the handling of freight cars at said point where connection is made with the Central of Georgia Railway, it is necessary to switch and drill its trains upon Cherry street, and in shifting and transferring cars it is compelled to use the part of Cherry street between the east side of Spalding street and the old Rosser storehouse in Montezuma; that, notwithstanding it has endeavored only to use Cherry street for these purposes in a reasonable manner, and so to limit the use as not to interfere with the interests of the defendant or of the public, and although no damage has resulted to the defendant or the public, the city council, on March 25, 1902, passed an ordinance prohibiting engines going through Cherry street at a greater rate than three miles an hour, and also requiring a flagman to go ahead of the train, "and no train or engine will be permitted to stop, drill, or in any manner shift or transfer cars between the east side of Spalding street and the old Rosser warehouse, except to prevent accident, under penalty of being punished as provided in section 13 of the charter"; that the city council has caused this ordinance to be enforced by arresting engineers, and preventing switching, drilling, shifting, and transferring cars between the points designated, so as to seriously interfere with the plaintiff's business as a common carrier, and it threatens so to enforce said ordinance as to prohibit the plaintiff from the use of that portion of Cherry street, to its irreparable damage, and to the annulment of the rights and privileges granted by the aforesaid contract. Whereupon it prayed for an injunction. The city demurred and answered, claiming that when the contract was made the plaintiff specially agreed that Cherry street should only be used by trains coming and going on schedule trips, and did not include any right to switch or to drill; that the city of Montezuma is built in a narrow space between Flint river and Beaver creek; that, while Cherry street is the busiest portion of the town, with many of the chief houses of the place on each side, it is the narrowest street in the city, and at the point indicated by the ordinance four different streets and three public ways converge into said street; that the plaintiff has shut up and practically excluded the public from all access to the town west of Rosser street, and so obstructed Cherry street as to make it impassable beyond that point; that during the time of switching and transferring cars, which is almost continuous, the travel and business of the town is absolutely paralyzed and stopped; that the noise of the engines is deafening; and that it is unreasonable for the company to make a side track and a switchyard of Cherry street; and that the ordinance was passed and is being enforced in the discharge of the city's duty to the public. There was evidence pro and con. On the return of the rule to show cause after hearing affidavits and argument on the demurrer, the court refused, in vacation, to pass upon several issues raised, holding that, irrespective of the verbal agreement, the municipal authorities had the authority to prohibit by ordinance the use of the street for the purposes complained of in the petition, and thereupon refused the interlocutory injunction prayed for. To this order the plaintiff excepted.

J. L. Sweat and J. M. Du Pree, for plaintiff in error. Greer & Felton, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. There is a "marked difference between the lawful and unlawful use of railroad property." Austin v. Augusta Terminal Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 690, 34 S. E. 852, 47 L. R. A. 755. Both the contract and Civ. Code 1895, § 2167, par. 5, permitting the longitudinal use of the street, must be construed to authorize only lawful use, and not the creation or maintenance of a nuisance thereon. Streets and highways are intended primarily for the purposes of travel and transportation. When a railroad company is authorized to lay its track thereon, there is a conclusive presumption that the use thereunder must be for similar purposes. A private citizen would not be authorized, even in front of his own premises, to obstruct a street, or to use it as a place of storage, or for any purpose which would interfere with the rights of the balance of the public. The railroad company stands upon the same footing. While permitted to use the street or the highway for transportation, it must adjust itself to the rights of the public in the same way that the public must adjust itself to the rights of the company. The railroad company cannot unreasonably obstruct the street, or interfere with travel. It cannot use the street as a depot, or a place for loading or unloading cars. And it has been repeatedly held that a railroad company cannot use the street as a yard, or for switching or drilling purposes. The court did not err in refusing the injunction. W. & A. R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 7 S. E. 912, 12 Am. St. Rep. 320 (3); Kavanagh v. R. Co., 78 Ga. 803, 4 S. E. 113; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 179 (12).

TRAMMELL v. SWIFT FERTILIZER WORKS.

NOTES—SURETYSHIP.

1. If the fact of suretyship does not appear on the face of a note, it may be proved by parol, and the relative position of the makers' names is immaterial, if one is surety of the other. A charge to this effect is not erroneous because the court failed to add that, as a presumption of fact, the first name was that of the principal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 1964.]

2. The law controlling the issues made by the pleadings was fairly charged by the court, the evidence fully warranted the verdict, and no reason is shown for disturbing the judgment denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Stewart County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by the Swift Fertilizer Works, for the use of Carter & Patterson, against H. N. Bailey and D. O. Trammell. Judgment for plaintiff, and Trammell brings error. Affirmed.

B. F. Harrell and G. Y. Harrell, for plaintiff in error. E. T. Hickey and J. T. Harrison, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The Swift Fertilizer Works, for the use of Carter & Patterson, brought suit against H. N. Bailey and D. O. Trammell to recover an amount alleged to be due on a promissory note, a copy of which was attached to the petition. The note contained a promise to pay the Swift Fertilizer Works $162.75, and recited that: "The payment of this note is secured by a Lien to the extent of said advance on all the crops which may be grown or cultivated on said farm or plantation during the year 1901, wherever said crops, parts or part of them are to be found." It was signed by H. N. Bailey and D. O. Trammell as makers, and by J. E. Ware as a witness. There is nothing in the note indicating other than that the makers were liable as joint principals. Bailey filed no defense. Trammell pleaded that he signed the note as surety, and that he had given notice to the plaintiff to sue the principal, H. N. Bailey, which notice was disregarded by the plaintiff, and for that reason he was discharged from liability. At the trial no evidence was introduced to sustain this plea, but his plea was amended by alleging that the note which he signed as surety embraced a mortgage upon the crops of his principal, Bailey; that the payee had failed to have the instrument recorded, or to make any effort to collect the note out of Bailey or the mortgaged property; that defendant's risk as surety had thus been increased, and he was no longer liable on the note. During the progress of the trial no question was raised as to the sufficiency of the mortgage clause in the instrument sued upon. The plaintiff contended that Bailey was the tenant of Trammell; that the consideration of the note was a quantity of fertilizer which had been sold to Trammell, as landlord; and that credit had been extended on the faith of his signing the note as principal. The defendant Trammell introduced testimony tending to show that Bailey was his tenant, and had made sufficient crops to pay off the note, but that the plaintiff had made no effort to collect the same; that he had signed the note only as surety; and that the payee had not recorded the instrument, or taken any steps to enforce the mortgage lien on Bailey's crops. The jury found for the plaintiff the full amount of the note. Trammell made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1. The main issue in the case was whether Trammell was a surety or a joint principal. Upon this issue the evidence was conflicting. The court fully submitted the issue to the jury; charging them, in substance, that, where the fact of suretyship does not appear on the face of a note, it may be proved by parol, and the relative positions of the makers' names is immaterial, if one really signed as surety for the other. Not only did the judge charge this principle of law in the abstract, but he also applied it to the facts developed by the evidence. Exception is taken to the charge on the ground that it was argumentative, and deprived the defendant of the evidentiary value of the relative location of the names on the note, he having signed last. Where two persons sign a note, apparently as joint principals, and there is nothing in the note to indicate that one was surety for the other, the presumption of law is that both are liable as joint principals. This is not, of course, a conclusive presumption, but may be rebutted by parol. Civ. Code 1895, § 2984. It is immaterial in what order the names may appear on the note, if, in point of fact, one of the makers is liable only as surety. No presumption of law or of fact can arise, in a case where both sign apparently as joint principals, that the person who signed last was surety only. The burden was on the defendant Trammell to overcome by proof the presumption that, as indicated by the note itself, both he and Bailey signed the note as a principal, and the charge of the court was as favorable to Trammell as he had any right to expect.

2. There is nothing in the note confining the operation of the lien therein referred to, or indicating a purpose to limit it to the property of one only of the makers. No question was made before the court as to the validity of the lien. The case was tried as though the instrument was a note and mortgage. One of the contentions of the plaintiff was that the lien was as much upon the property of Trammell as it was upon the property of Bailey. The court submitted this contention to the jury, and instructed them that, if the lien was intended to cover Trammell's crops, he would not be released because of the failure of the payee to place the note upon record; but, on the other hand, if the mortgage was upon the crop of Bailey only, it was the duty of the payee to place the instrument on record, and, if the payee failed to do so, and the jury should find that Trammell signed as surety, such failure would operate to release him. Of this charge Trammell has no just cause of complaint. The issue as to whether or not he signed as surety was fully and fairly submitted to the jury, and the jury were instructed that, if the lien was intended to cover Bailey's crops only, a failure to record the mortgage would release Trammell as surety, if he signed the note in that capacity. The jury found against Trammell on this issue, and the evidence fully warranted their finding.

In one of his exceptions, the plaintiff in error complains that the court, in its charge, submitted to the jury the question whether or not the clause in the note sued on, relating to a lien on crops of the makers, amounted to a mortgage. In a note the judge certifies that he did not submit that question to the jury, but only called on them to determine whether the mortgage operated on the crops of Bailey, or on the crops of Trammell as well. This being true, we cannot undertake to deal with the exception taken; the statement of fact on which it was based not being certified.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SEALE v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

SUNDAY—RUNNING FREIGHT TRAINS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—INDICTMENT.

1. On the trial of one indicted for a violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 420, prohibiting the running of freight trains on the Sabbath day, it is not error to admit evidence of any violation of the law prior to the finding of the indictment, and within the statute of limitations.

2. The word "destination," as used in the second exception to section 420 of the Penal Code of 1895, means the point at which the train finally stops, and not the point at which it crosses the state line.

3. Where, on the trial of the superintendent of transportation of a railroad company for a violation of the Code section referred to in the preceding headnotes, it appears that the accused knew of and was responsible for a schedule of the railroad company, the compliance with which necessitated a violation of the law, it is not error of which he can complain that the court charged the jury that he might justify himself by proving that the employees of the company acted in direct violation of his orders and rules, but that "mere general orders and rules would not be a justification under the statute."

4. Nor, in such a case, is it error to refuse to charge (especially in the absence of a written request) that the accused could not be found guilty if it appeared that he did not know that the train had been run in violation of law, if such was the fact, until after it was so run.

5. An indictment for a violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 420, need not allege that the train for the running of which the accused is charged to be responsible was not within any of the statutory exceptions to that section. Allegations to that effect are mere surplusage, and need not be proven to warrant the conviction of the accused. Jackson v. State, 15 S. E. 905, 88 Ga. 787, approved and reaffirmed.

6. Upon a review of the case of Jackson v. State, 15 S. E. 905, 88 Ga. 787, the same is reaffirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

J. N. Seale was convicted of a violation of the Sunday law, and brings error. Affirmed.

John J. Strickland, for plaintiff in error.
W. A. Charters, Sol. Gen., for the State.

CANDLER, J. The accused was superintendent of transportation of the Southern Railway Company; and the indictment charges that on the 14th day of June, 1903, which was Sunday, he caused a freight train of that company to be run in the county of Habersham, "the said freight train being then and there drawn and pulled by an engine numbered 289; the said freight train not having one or more cars loaded with live stock and delayed beyond the schedule time, and said freight train not running over said road on Saturday night on a schedule fixing its time of arrival at destination according to said schedule by which it started not later than eight o'clock Sunday morning; and said freight train not being a special fruit, melon or vegetable train, the cars of which contained no other freight except perishable fruits, melons, vegetables, fresh fish, oysters, fresh meats, live stock and other perishable goods of a like nature; and the said freight train not being a train on a road having its terminal in another state and not running over 30 miles in the state of Georgia." It was undisputed that the train for running which the accused was indicted left Atlanta on Saturday night, the schedule time of its departure being 11:40 p. m.; that it was bound for Greenville, S. C., at which point it was due to arrive, under its schedule, at 10:50 a. m. Sunday. It was due to reach Toccoa, in Habersham county, at 5:55 a. m. Sunday, but on the occasion under investigation it arrived at that point behind time. Whether its arrival in Toccoa was before or after 8 o'clock Sunday morning is a question as to which the evidence is in conflict, but, under the view we take of the case, this point is immaterial. Upon arriving at Toccoa the train was put on a side track, and was not moved again until after 12 o'clock Sunday night. The accused was found guilty. He moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

1. Error is assigned upon the admission by the court below of evidence to the effect that the railroad company of which the accused was superintendent of transportation had run other trains on Sunday in Habersham county during the year 1903. The objection made to this evidence at the time it was offered was that it "would have the tendency to prejudice the jury against the defendant in the case on trial." We are clear that this was not a good objection, and that for no reason urged on the trial in the court below should the evidence have been excluded. It is well settled as a general principle that, in the trial of indictments for violations of Sunday laws, "the proof of any Sunday, before the finding of the bill and within the statute of limitations, is sufficient." Whart. Cr. Ev. (9th Ed.) § 106, and authorities there cited. It was not denied that the accused had been superintendent of transportation of the Southern Railway Company during the year 1903, and no objection was made that the evidence admitted referred as well to the period of the year after the indictment was found as before. In the able brief of counsel for the accused it is urged that, as the indictment specified the number of the engine which drew the train, the state was confined to proof as to that particular engine, and that evidence as to other offenses in which that engine was not concerned was inadmissible. No such point, however, appears to have been made on the trial in the court below, and hence it will not be considered here.

2. It is contended by counsel for the accused that the word "destination," as used in Pen. Code 1895, § 420 (2), which provides that the prohibition of the statute shall not extend to "a freight-train running over a road on Saturday night, if the time of its arrival at destination according to the schedule by which it started on the trip, be not later than eight o'clock Sunday morning," means the state line, and not the ultimate stopping place of the train; and the motion for a new trial complains of certain charges of the court at variance with this view. It is urged with considerable plausibility that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to undertake to deal with the operation of a train after it had passed beyond the state's borders; that the statute is only applicable to trains in Georgia; and that, when a train has passed the Georgia line, it has reached its "destination," so far as the Georgia law is concerned. A brief examination of the history of the present legislation against Sunday freight trains in this state will, however, suffice to show that this argument is without substantial foundation. The first enactment on the subject was in 1850, when the prohibition against running freight trains on the Sabbath day was made absolute. Subsequently an exception was made in order to permit trains loaded with live stock, which should not have reached their destination before the beginning of Sunday, to run on to a stock pen where the animals could be fed and watered, but beyond that they could not be run on Sunday. Acts 1873, p. 63. The exception now under consideration was enacted into a statute on February 28, 1874. (Acts 1874, p. 97), and recited, as a preamble, that, "under the existing laws of this state, many freight-trains have to lie over during the Sabbath day at wayside stations, remote from the families and the churches of employees." It was therefore enacted that "it shall and may be lawful for all freight-trains on the different railroads in this state, running over said roads on Saturday night, to run through to destination: provided, that the time of arrival, according to the schedule by which the train or trains started on the trip, shall not be later than 8 o'clock on Sunday morning." We have, then, clearly expressed, the reason of the law—to enable employees of the railroad company to reach their homes in time to spend Sunday with their families and attend religious services. Bearing in mind this evident object of the law, we hold that "destination" means destination, not the state line—the place where abide the families, where are located the churches, of the railroad employees.

3. The court charged that the accused might justify himself by proving that the employees of the railroad company acted in direct violation of his orders and rules, but that "mere general orders and rules would not be a justification under the statute." The portion of the charge which we have quoted is assigned as error. In the view that we take of the law under which the accused was tried, and of the admitted facts, this charge was harmless, even if erroneous. The schedule of the train placed it at its destination after 8 o'clock on Sunday morning, and hence it could not, under the law, move a wheel in Georgia after 12 o'clock Saturday night, unless it came within one of the exceptions of the statute. This schedule was well known to the accused—indeed, he was responsible for it. Therefore, regardless of whether the train reached Toccoa at 7:45, as claimed by the accused, or at 9, as claimed by the prosecutor, the train had been running in violation of law every moment after 12 o'clock; and it was not claimed that its running and operation after that time were in violation of the orders of the accused.

4. The only remaining ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial complains that the court failed to charge that the accused could not be found guilty if it appeared that he did not know that the train had been run in violation of law, if such was the fact, until after it was so run. It does not appear that any written request was made to give this charge; but, independently of that fact, as we have already shown, it was undenied that the accused knew of the existence of the schedule, which in itself called for the illegal operation of the train after midnight on Saturday night, and consequently he was not entitled to the benefit of such a charge as the one under consideration.

5. The sole question remaining for decision is whether or not the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and without evidence to support it, in that the state failed to show, as was alleged in the indictment, that the train in question was not within any one of the exceptions to the prohibitory statute. It is contended by counsel for the accused that it was essential to the validity of the indictment that it allege that the train did not come within any of these exceptions, and consequently that it was necessary to the conviction of the accused that the allegations be supported by proof. In the case of Herring v. State, 114 Ga. 96, 39 S. E. 866, Mr. Justice Little, in an exhaustive and elaborate opinion, has dealt fully with the question as to when it is necessary to allege and prove that one accused of crime is not one of a class excepted by law from the operation of the penal statute; and in the course of the opinion (page 101, 114 Ga., page 863, 39 S. E.) he quotes with approval from Wharton on Criminal Practice & Procedure, § 241, where it is declared that the test is practically this: "Is it the scope of the statute to create a general offense, or an offense limited to a particular class of persons or conditions? In other words, is it intended to impose the stamp of criminality on an entire class of actions, or upon only such actions of that class as are committed by particular persons or in a particular way? In the latter case the defendant must be declared to be within the class; in the former case this is not necessary." Judge Little adds: "This reasoning seems to be sound, affording a practical and reasonable conclusion, namely: If, by the words of a statute, particular acts done are declared to be a crime for which punishment is provided, the offense created is general and applicable to all; and an indictment which sets out the offense in the language of the statute is sufficient, notwithstanding there may be matters found in the body of the statute elsewhere which provide that a given class of persons, or persons with certain qualifications, shall not be convicted of that offense, or that certain existing conditions may be a justification for doing the act set out in the statute. In such a case the offense is a complete one as it stands stated, and it is not necessary, in framing the indictment, to negative the conditions under which the force of the statute may be avoided. These are matters of plea and defense to a general statutory crime." As we have already seen, the act of 1850 prohibited in the broadest terms the running of freight trains in Georgia on Sunday. This act then became a general statutory crime, and the subsequent enactments on the subject merely excepted from the operation of the statute particular classes of trains, or trains run under particular conditions. Applying the principle ruled in the Herring Case to the facts of the case at bar, we are clear that it was not necessary for the indictment to allege that the train was not within the exceptions to the statute; that these allegations, when made, were mere surplusage; and that the failure to support them by proof did not render the conviction of the accused unlawful. See, also, the case of Kitchens v. State, 116 Ga. 847, 43 S. E. 256, where the Herring Case was followed and approved. Tigner v. State, 119 Ga. 114, 45 S. E. 1001; 1 Bish. New Crim. Proc. § 640.

6. Upon a review of the decision of this court in the case of Jackson v. State, 88 Ga. 787, 15 S. E. 905, we reaffirm the same.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(121 Ga. 836)

OLIVER v. HENDERSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

WILL—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. A testator devised to A. a part of his property, described as "lot of land (78) in the Second District of Dooly county." Testator did not own lot 78, but did own 68, in the district named. It did not appear whether he owned other lots in that district. The testator said during his lifetime that he intended to give lot 68 to A., and often referred to it as the property of A. Held, that a petition alleging these facts, and praying that the averments as to the intention of the testator might be shown by parol evidence, was properly dismissed on demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by Henry Oliver against D. L. Henderson, guardian, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Henry Oliver, in his will, gave to his wife a life estate in all of his property, the language of the will descriptive of the property being as follows: "All my property, both personalty and realty." To the heirs of his son I. O. Oliver the testator bequeathed "the said personalty and realty" after the death of his wife, except that Henry Oliver, Jr., was to have "lot of land (78) in the Second District of Dooly county more than the rest of the heirs of the said I. O. Oliver." Henry Oliver, Jr., filed a petition alleging that the life tenant was dead; that the testator never at any time in his life owned lot 78 in the Second District of Dooly county; that he did own at the time of his death lot 68 in that county and district, "and other lands adjoining"; that he intended to devise to plaintiff lot 68, and the insertion of lot "78" was a mistake; that the testator often told plaintiff that he intended to give him lot 68; that the testator was illiterate, and told the scrivener who wrote the will that he wanted to give plaintiff lot 68, and the scrivener by mistake or oversight wrote "78" instead. The plaintiff prayed originally for a reformation of the will, but by amendment struck this prayer, and prayed for a recovery of lot 68 from the possession of the defendant, and that he be allowed to show by parol evidence the facts set forth in relation to the mistake in writing lot 78 in the will instead of lot 68. The court dismissed the petition on demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

C. L. De Vaughn, J. A. Hickson, M. P. Hall, and W. F. George, for plaintiff in error. Whipple & McKenzie, J. W. Haygood, and Crum & Jones, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. The testator gave to his wife a life estate in all of his property. He then undertook to dispose of the remainder interest therein, giving to the heirs of I. O. Oliver the fee in all of the property, one of such heirs being given, in addition to an equal share, a lot of land which is described as "lot of land (78) in the Second District of Dooly county." It appears that the testator did not own lot 78. The description "lot 78" is therefore false, and, under the maxim, "Falsa demonstratio non nocet," may be rejected, provided after so doing there is a sufficient description left to identify the property intended to be devised. Thus the "Zachariah Emerson Place," described in a deed as being in lot 125 of a given district, may be shown by parol to be located in some other lot. Johnson v. McKay, 119 Ga. 196, 45 S. E. 992. And so a description in a will of "the land contained in eighty-one, west side of the old run of Flat creek," may be shown by parol to refer to a lot of another number, the latter lot answering the true description "west side of the old run of Flat creek." Rogers v. Rogers, 78 Ga. 688, 3 S. E. 451. See, also, Tyler v. Justice, 120 Ga. 879, 48 S. E. 328; Doe v. Roe, 1 Wend. 541; Whitcomb v. Rodman, 156 Ill. 116, 40 N. E. 553, 28 L. R. A. 149, 47 Am. St. Rep. 181; Merrick v. Merrick, 37 Ohio St. 126, 41 Am. Rep. 493; cases in note to Chappell v. Missionary Society, 50 Am. St. Rep. 289. Likewise ambiguities in a will, both latent and patent, may be explained by parol. Civ. Code 1895, § 3325. A latent ambiguity, says Lord Bacon, is "that which seems certain and without ambiguity for anything that appeareth upon the deed or instrument, but there is some collateral matter, outside of the deed, that breedeth the ambiguity." See 1 Jaria. Wills (Am. Notes) top page 743. This definition was applied in Walker v. Wells, 25 Ga. 141, 71 Am. Dec. 164, where it was held that a grant to "Berry Stephens, an orphan," might be shown by parol evidence to have been intended to be a grant to the orphan of Berry Stephens, there being such a person in life, and there being no person answering the first description.

But, while parol evidence is admissible to raise a latent ambiguity in a description, and then explain it, in every case the intention of the maker of the instrument must be gathered from the instrument itself, read in the light of the parol evidence. Of course, it is not permissible to create a devise or bequest by parol, but the parol evidence must show what the testator's real intention was from the language used. Thus language which is susceptible of two meanings must have been intended to mean only one, and the question to be decided in each case is, which of the two meanings did the testator intend should be given it? If this double meaning is apparent on the face of the instrument, then the ambiguity is a patent one. If the language is apparently not of double meaning, but is shown to be so only by the aid of collateral or extrinsic facts, the ambiguity is latent. While the general rule is that only latent ambiguities are explainable by parol evidence, under our Code either a patent or a latent ambiguity may be so explained. Civ. Code 1895, § 3325. But equity has no jurisdiction to reform a will. Willis v. Jenkins, 30 Ga. 167; Bingel v. Volz (Ill.) 31 N. E. 13, 16 L. R. A. 321, 34 Am. St. Rep. 64. Wills must be taken to mean just what the language, considered in the light of the circumstances and the situation of the testator, was intended by him to mean. Parol evidence is not admissible to show that the testator meant one thing when he said another. See Smith v. Usher, 108 Ga. 233, 33 S. E. 876. This rule seems to be without exception, and those decisions which appear to depart from it will generally be found to be only erroneous applications of the rule.

There are many decisions dealing with questions similar to that raised by the present record. In Judy v. Gilbert, 77 Ind. 96, 40 Am. Rep. 289, a will described property as the "northeast quarter of the southwest quarter" of a section of land. It was held that parol evidence was not admissible to show that the "northeast quarter of the southeast quarter" was intended, even though it appeared that the testator owned no such land as that described, and no other land than that which it was claimed he intended to devise. In the opinion it was said: "There is no mistake here upon the face of the will which is here subject to investigation. There is no latent ambiguity. The property devised is accurately described. The claim is not that there is an inaccurate description apparent upon the face of the will, but that the testator ought to have described some other property. The court is asked to admit parol evidence to show that, although the testator described with perfect accuracy one parcel of land, he meant another. The bare statement of the appellant's position exposes its hostility to fundamental and salutary principles of jurisprudence." To the same effect are Bingel v. Volz (Ill.) 31 N. E. 13, 16 L. R. A. 321, 34 Am. St. Rep. 64; Fitzpatrick v. Fitzpatrick, 36 Iowa, 674, 14 Am. Rep. 538; Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 514, 8 Am. Rep. 665; Ehrman v. Hoskins, 67 Miss. 192, 6 South. 776, 19 Am. St. Rep. 297; Sherwood v. Sherwood, 45 Wis. 357, 30 Am. Rep. 757. See, also, in this connection, Venable v. Burton, 118 Ga. 156, 45 S. E. 29. There are, however, decisions which are not in all respects in accord with those just cited. Some of them will be found, upon a close inspection of their facts, to be distinguishable, while others are wholly irreconcilable with the cases just above referred to. All of them purport to be based upon the intention of the testator as expressed in the will, when the language of the will is considered in the light of the parol evidence. The case of Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 210, 6 Sup. Ct. 617, 29 L. Ed. 860, is a leading one. There a testator devised a lot, "together with the improvements thereon erected," but erroneously stated the number of a lot which had no improvements. It was held that parol evidence might be introduced to show that the testator had another lot which had improvements on it, and that this lot would be held to be the land intended to be devised. So, where a testator owned only three city lots in a certain block, and undertook to devise these three lots, but erroneously gave the number of one of them, describing them all as being in the specified block, it was held that the three lots owned by the testator in that block would pass, notwithstanding the erroneous description. See Seebrook v. Fedawa, 33 Neb. 413, 50 N. W. 270, 29 Am. St. Rep. 488. A similar conclusion was reached in Eckford v. Eckford, 91 Iowa, 54, 58 N. W. 1093, 26 L. R. A. 370. See, also, Zirkle v. Leonard (Kan. Sup.) 60 Pac. 318; Priest v. Lackey, 140 Ind. 399, 39 N. E. 54; Stewart v. Stewart (Iowa) 65 N. W. 976. In every one of the cases where the parol evidence was admitted there was some general description, other than the false description, sufficient to identify the property intended to pass. In every one of the cases it distinctly appeared that in the district or block or other area mentioned the testator owned no other property than that which it was claimed he intended to devise, and that he did not own property answering to the description claimed to be false.

In the present case it is distinctly alleged that the testator did not own lot 78 in the Second District of Dooly county. But, to have made the evidence admissible, it should have been alleged also that the testator owned only one lot in the Second District of Dooly county, which lot was No. 68. If this had been alleged, the court might well have said, as against the demurrer, that, inasmuch as it is manifest that the testator intended to devise a lot in the Second District of Dooly county, he must have intended lot 68 to pass, because that was the only lot in that district and county which he owned. But the petition not only fails to allege that lot 68 was the only lot owned by the testator in that district and county, but it avers that he owned lot 68 in the Second District of Dooly county "and other lands adjoining." This is an ambiguous averment. The adjoining lands may or may not lie in the Second District of Dooly county. Probably, under the rule requiring pleadings to be construed most strongly against the pleader, the averment should be taken to mean that the adjoining lands do lie in that district and county. But, in any event, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to allege distinctly that they did not. There is nothing in the will to indicate that the testator intended lot 68 in the Second District of Dooly county to pass, rather than some other lot in that district and county, if he owned such other lots. He may have owned 88 or 54, and, if so, how can the courts say that he meant 68, rather than 88 or 54? There is no legal method by which the intention of the testator can be ascertained. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

FLINT RIVER LUMBER CO. v. SMITH et al.

POWER OF ATTORNEY—RECORDING—EVIDENCE.

1. A power of attorney, executed in the same manner as deeds subject to registry are required to be executed, may be recorded at any time after its execution, although no conveyance has been executed in pursuance of the power; and, upon the registry of a conveyance executed under the prior recorded power of attorney, the latter becomes a part of the registered conveyance, and admissible in evidence under the same rules and regulations as the conveyance would be.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by the Flint River Lumber Company against George O. Smith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Flint River Lumber Company sued the Smith Lumber Company and George O. Smith to recover a described tract of land, for injunction, and damages for trespasses committed on the land. One of the links in the plaintiff's chain of title was a deed from James U. Horne to Maston O'Neal, dated October 23, 1883, and recorded on December 7, 1883, in Book AA, p. 153, in Decatur county. This deed was executed by M. A. Bell under a power of attorney from James U.

Horne, which power of attorney was executed in 1882, and recorded on April 14, 1883, in Book Z, p. 484, in Decatur county. The defendants objected to the introduction in evidence of the deed and power of attorney on the ground that they were not recorded "along together," and that their record was illegal. The court sustained the objection, and the plaintiff excepted.

Donalson & Donalson, for plaintiff in error. A. H. Russell and T. S. Hawes, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Powers of attorney are not mentioned in the registry laws of this state. The law which imposes the duties of a registration officer upon the clerk of the superior court requires him to keep "books for recording all deeds, mortgages and other liens, and bills of sale separately." Unless the power of attorney is considered a part of the instrument executed under its authority, there is nothing in our law which would make its registry constructive notice. In Tenant v. Blacker, 27 Ga. 418, it was held that powers of attorney may be recorded under the same rules as the deeds made under them, and, when thus recorded, may be read in evidence in the same way as registered deeds. Judge Benning, in the opinion, stated that the practice of recording powers of attorney, "along with the deeds made under them," and admitting them in evidence, without further proof, "along with their deeds," was a practice of so long standing that the court did not feel prepared to disturb it. In Anderson v. Dugas, 29 Ga. 440, it was held that, when a deed executed under a power of attorney is duly recorded, the record of it is constructive notice, though the power of attorney be not recorded. Judge Stephens, in the opinion, says: "We do not think that the recording of the power of attorney was necessary to make the record of the deed serve as notice. The power of attorney is a muniment of title, and may therefore be properly recorded along with the deed." See, in this connection, Jackson v. Neely, 10 Johns. 374. In Graham v. Campbell, 56 Ga. 258, it was ruled that the existence of a power of attorney which was "recorded with the conveyance" could be shown by a copy from the records. In Dodge v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co., 109 Ga. 396, 34 S. E. 673, Mr. Chief Justice Simmons says: "This power of attorney, under our law, must be recorded with the deed made by the attorney in fact." There are a number of cases where reference is made to the recording of powers of attorney, and the expressions "along with the deed," or "with the conveyance," or similar expressions, have been used; but in none of the cases cited, nor in any other case, so far as we have been able to ascertain, is there a distinct ruling declaring what is the meaning of such expressions. Do they mean that the power of attorney must be recorded at the same time, in the same book, and in physical connection with the deed executed under it? Or do they mean that the power of attorney must be recorded at the same place that deeds are recorded; that is, in a particular book in the office of the registrar of deeds, without reference to whether the deed executed under it is recorded in the same book, or in immediate connection with the power? In Maryland there was a statute which declared that a power of attorney to sell real estate should be "recorded with the deed" executed under the power. In Rosenthal v. Ruffin, 60 Md. 324, it was held that the power of attorney might be recorded either at or before the recording of the deed; that the statute did not require it to be recorded eo instante with the deed, the term "with the deed" meaning "upon the proper records of the city or county where the deed is recorded." In that case the power of attorney was recorded before the deed was executed thereunder. In Mix v. Hotchkiss, 14 Conn. 32, Church, J., said that the power of attorney "was recorded with the deed," although it did not appear upon the same page or leaf of the book of records as the deed, but at a distance of 80 pages from it, and was recorded after the record of the deed. There was, however, no distinct ruling by the court on this question, as the case was decided on another point. The power of attorney is for some important purposes an essential part of the deed, and is complete in itself; and we see no good reason why a power of attorney executed in the same manner that a deed subject to registry would be executed might not be entered upon the record immediately upon its execution, and that, whenever a conveyance subsequently made under the authority of the power of attorney is thereafter duly recorded, the power of attorney and the deed should not be considered as recorded with each other, both being found upon the records where those interested are bound to go to obtain information in reference to muniments of title. The order in which the deed and the power are recorded is immaterial. Of course, the naked power of attorney, although recorded, would not be constructive notice until the deed executed thereunder is also placed upon record; but, whenever both are recorded, the power of attorney, as a part thereof, will become notice from that date. The deed showed upon its face that it was executed under a power of attorney, and this would be sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to the existence and genuineness of the power of attorney, and would naturally lead to a search of the records, to ascertain whether the same had been recorded, although, as held in Anderson v. Dugas, supra, and in the New York case cited above, the record of the power of attorney was not essential to make the deed constructive notice of the conveyance.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

PONDER v. QUITMAN GINNERY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

APPEAL—RECORD—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—DEMURRER—NUISANCE—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

1. An amendment offered to a petition, but disallowed by the trial judge, becomes no part of the record, and consequently cannot be considered by this court unless set forth in the bill of exceptions or annexed thereto as an exhibit and duly authenticated.

2. When a petition is demurred to on both general and special grounds, and dismissed upon the former only, this court cannot, upon a bill of exceptions sued out by the plaintiff, in which he assigns error upon the ruling adverse to him, undertake to pass upon the sufficiency of the special grounds of demurrer.

3. The employment, by the owner of a ginning plant, of machinery which separates dust and sand from cotton and expels the particles of dust and sand into the air in large volumes, causing the same to be blown into the dwelling house of an adjacent proprietor, to his great discomfort and injury, in an invasion of his property rights, for which an action for damages will lie.

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by F. V. Ponder against the Quitman Ginnery. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. W. Edmondson, for plaintiff in error.
Bennet & Bennet, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The plaintiff in error filed a petition in which she named the Quitman Ginnery as defendant, and wherein she set forth the following complaint: Plaintiff is the owner of a dwelling house in the town of Quitman of the value of $8,000. The defendant, a corporation, has erected and is now operating an extensive ginning plant just across a narrow street from her dwelling, which plant is run continuously for about five months of each year, and has been in operation for the past five years. The gins installed in this plant have flues attached for the purpose of taking the dust and dirt out of the cotton as it passes through the gins, and this dust and dirt is continuously being blown into her residence, greatly to the hurt, vexation, and injury of plaintiff, causing her to do a great amount of extra work in sweeping and dusting and trying to keep her house clean and in order, and endangering her in the sum of $50 per year. By reason of the blowing of the dust, dirt, and lint from defendant's plant into her dwelling house the health of herself and family has been very much impaired, her husband having been unable to perform scarcely any labor for several months in consequence thereof. Being poor, and advanced in years, she is dependent in a great measure upon his labor for a support. In order to get away from such a nuisance, she has offered to sell or rent her place and move away to the country; but, owing to the proximity of defendant's plant, she can neither get a purchaser nor tenant. Because of the noise and confusion made by the running of the machinery in said plant she is unable to get as much sleep and rest as is necessary for the enjoyment of good health, the machinery often being run far into the night, and being always started before day in the morning. By reason of detriment to her health and the mental worry so caused she has been damaged in the sum of $50 per year, and because of the impairment of her husband's health she has suffered damages to the amount of $100. Her furniture, bedding, window curtains, and wearing apparel have been injured by the dust, dirt, and lint blown into her house from the defendant's plant, entailing upon her a loss of $100. In consequence of the erection, operation, and maintenance of the nuisance aforesaid in such close proximity to the residence of plaintiff her house and lot have become almost, if not totally, valueless, to her injury and damage in the sum of $2,500. Waste cotton seed are allowed to accumulate under and around said plant and there rot, the stench from which is almost unbearable, and contributes largely to her damages, which in the aggregate amount to $3,000.

At the hearing of the case, the plaintiff asked leave of the court to amend her petition in certain particulars, but the defendant objected to the allowance of the proposed amendment, and the court declined to allow the same. The defendant then pressed a demurrer, which it had filed to the plaintiff's petition, which demurrer embraced both general and special grounds. Without undertaking to pass upon any of the special grounds of the demurrer, the court granted an order sustaining it generally, and dismissed the plaintiff's action. To both of the adverse rulings above mentioned she excepted. The proposed amendment to the petition is not set out in her bill of exceptions, nor annexed thereto as an exhibit, but appears in the transcript of the record sent up to this court, having been improperly incorporated therein by the clerk of the trial court.

1. 2. The question of practice dealt with in the first headnote has heretofore been definitely settled by this court. Moore v. Town of Guyton, 110 Ga. 330, 35 S. E. 339; Taylor v. McLaughlin, 120 Ga. 703, 48 S. E. 203, and cases cited. The ruling announced in the second headnote is in accord with the decision rendered in Linder v. Whitehead, 116 Ga. 206, 42 S. E. 358.

3. The action is one for damages accruing from the erection and maintenance of a private nuisance. The tortious act complained of is the operation of a ginnery situated in close proximity to the plaintiff's premises in such a manner as to seriously interfere with her enjoyment thereof as a home. "A nuisance is anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage, to another; and the fact that the act done may otherwise be lawful, does not keep it from being a nuisance. The inconvenience complained of must not be fanciful, or such as would affect only one of fastidious taste, but it must be such as would affect an ordinarily reasonable man." Civ. Code 1895, § 3861. The plaintiff has a natural right to the enjoyment of the unpolluted air; and if the defendant corporation, by contaminating the air with dust, dirt, and lint, thrown into the air by artificial means, and blown into her dwelling, to her hurt and discomfort, has interfered with her enjoyment of the premises, the defendant must respond to her in damages. Swift v. Broyles, 115 Ga. 885, 42 S. E. 277, 58 L. R. A. 390; Farley v. Gate City Gas Light Co., 105 Ga. 331, 31 S. E. 193. With respect to this alleged unlawful interference with her rights of property, at least, the petition set forth a cause of action. The defendant may have been engaged in an occupation which could be lawfully conducted, but it had no right to so conduct its business as to inflict injury to owners of adjacent property. The employment of machinery which separates dust and sand from cotton by means of a blast which drives the particles of dust and sand into the air, and causes them to be blown into the plaintiff's dwelling, is an invasion of her right to enjoy her home in its natural state under ordinary surroundings. Nothing decided in Austin v. Augusta Terminal Co., 108 Ga. 671, 34 S. E. 852, 47 L. R. A. 755, is in conflict with what is here held, as in that case the acts complained of did not amount to a nuisance.

As the demurrer was sustained generally, we have confined our inquiry to the question whether or not the petition set forth a cause of action. As the court below held it did not, the plaintiff was cut off from curing by way of amendment such defects in her pleading (if any) as were subject to special demurrer. When the case "comes up for another hearing, the court below may yet do what it has not heretofore done, viz., pass upon the special grounds of the demurrer." Linder v. Whitehead, 116 Ga. 210, 42 S. E. 358.

CERTIORARI—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL—REVIEW—JURY—CHALLENGES.

1. Even where there have been two verdicts in a justice's court in favor of the plaintiff, this court will not interfere with a second grant of a new trial on certiorari where it appears that there were errors which in a close case may have been injurious to the losing party. Texas v. R. & Banking Co., 5 S. E. 114, 79 Ga. 330; Turner v. R. Co., 6 S. E. 690, 81 Ga. 336.

2. Even though the defendant were ignorant of the fact that the names of two jurors did not appear upon the jury list, he cannot take advantage thereof after verdict. Jordan v. State, 48 S. E. 679, 119 Ga. 443 (5).

3. It was error to overrule the challenge to the juror whose name did not appear upon the regular jury list. Mitchell v. Bradberry, 78 Ga. 15.

4. It appearing that the defendant was forced to strike the incompetent juror thus put upon him, the answer of the justice as to the juror's being finally "accepted" may well have been construed by the judge of the superior court to relate to the other talesmen who seem to have been selected from the list of voters, and who actually served on the jury, and as to whom there was an assignment of error in the petition for certiorari, though the assignment did not itself show cause for the grant of a new trial.

5. Statements of fact contained in the brief of counsel and the attached affidavit of the justice, explaining what he meant by his answer, cannot be considered in reviewing the order of the judge of the superior court in sustaining the certiorari and in directing a new trial.

VERBACK v. SPIVEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1903.)

JUDGMENT—GARNISHMENT—ANSWER—DEFAULT.

1. While the act establishing the city court of Moultrie (Acts 1901, p. 143, § 35) provides for appearance and trial terms, and declares that in cases in which there is no plea or defense filed on the call of the appearance docket a judgment may be rendered by the court at said appearance term, yet section 19 (page 141) enacts "that the garnishment proceeding in the city court shall be conformable to the laws on the subject applicable in the superior court."

2. In the superior court, under Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4551, 4709, the garnishee in all cases has until the first day of the second term after the service of the summons of garnishment in which to answer.

3. Where, therefore, a garnishee failed to answer at the term of such city court to which he had been summoned, a judgment by default should not have been entered, and the judge, on a motion filed on the first day of the succeeding term, properly set the judgment aside and allowed the garnishee to answer.

4. The garnishee was not in default for failing to answer while the motion was under consideration by the judge. The answer filed immediately upon the grant of the order vacating the previous judgment was not too late.

Action by M. J. Averback against J. F. Spivey. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

T. W. Mattox, for plaintiff in error. J. D. McKenzie, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. In this case a garnishment was sued out on a judgment as provided in Civ. Code 1895, § 4705. By the last clause of section 4709 proceedings subsequent to the affidavit and summons "shall be the same as prescribed in cases of attachments." By Civ. Code 1895, § 4551, the answer in all cases is in time if made on the first day of the second term of the superior court after service of the summons. Sanders v. Miller, 60 Ga. 554; Jarrell v. Guann, 105 Ga. 141, 31 S. E. 149; Atlanta Journal v. Brunswick Pub. Co., 111 Ga. 722, 36 S. E. 929. Under these decisions and sections of the Code the garnishee therefore had until the first day of the February term, 1903, in which to answer, and the default judgment entered during the November term, 1902, was void (Liverpool v. Savannah Grocery Company, 97 Ga. 747, 25 S. E. 828), unless the act establishing the city court of Moultrie has modified the general law contained in the Code. Section 35 of that act (Acts 1901, p. 143) provides for an appearance and a trial term, and declares that "in all cases in which there is no plea or defense filed on the call of the appearance docket * * * a judgment may be rendered by the court at said appearance term." Section 15 provides that the laws governing pleading and practice in the superior court shall be applicable to said court unless otherwise provided in the act; section 18, that all laws upon the subject of attachments and garnishments in the superior court shall apply to said city court so far as the nature of said city court will admit. By section 19 it is further enacted "that the garnishment proceedings in the city court shall be conformable to the laws on the subject applicable in the superior court." It is claimed that under this statute a failure of the garnishee to answer on or before the call of the appearance docket at the first term after service of the summons authorizes a judgment against him. There is language in the act which might admit of such a construction. But considering the nature of the garnishment proceeding, and the relation of the garnishee to the case, and giving full effect to the provision of section 19, which expressly declares that the "garnishment proceedings in the city court shall be conformable to the laws on the subject applicable to the superior court," it appears that, whatever might be the rule as to other classes of cases or in other city courts (Dodson Supply Co. v. Harris, 114 Ga. 963, 41 S. E. 54; Matthews v. Bishop, 103 Ga. 564, 32 S. E. 631), the General Assembly intended here to give to the garnishee all of the rights which he had under the Code. Among these was the privilege to have the case continued until the first day of the second term, where there had been a failure to answer at the first term. Having promptly made application for this privilege, the garnishee could not be prejudiced by reason of the failure to answer during the time the application was under consideration by the court. The judge did not err in vacating this judgment. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider whether the sickness of a member of the garnishee's family constituted such providential cause or excusable neglect as would authorize the court in a proper proceeding to set aside the judgment. See Phillips v. Taber, 83 Ga. 566, 10 S. E. 270 (4); Leaming v. McMillan, 59 Ark. 162, 26 S. W. 820.

CASSELS et al. v. FINN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

TRUSTEE EX MALEFICIO.

1. The failure to perform an oral promise, made by the sole heir at law of one desiring to dispose of her estate by will to third persons, that he will dispose of her estate as she desires, cannot make the heir at law, in case of an intestacy, a trustee ex maleficio as to the property inherited by him, in the absence of actual fraud (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by O. S. Cassels and others against L. E. Finn. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

In 1875 John L. Finn married Miss Susie Smith, and they lived together as man and wife until she died on July 25, 1894. At the time of her death she was seised and possessed of a separate estate, which in part consisted of certain lands acquired by inheritance from her father. She had for some time previously been in bad health, and for about six weeks prior to her death had been confined to her bed, but she was at the time of sound and disposing mind and memory. On the night of June 17, 1894, Mrs. Finn repeatedly, in the presence of Mrs. Cora S. Cassels, her sister, and another, expressed a desire to make a will providing for the payment of certain small legacies, disposing of one-half of the residue of her property to Mrs. Cassels and her children, and providing that her husband should have a life estate in the other half, charged with the expense of educating one of the sons of Mrs. Cassels, with remainder over to this son. Mrs. Cassels, in order to quiet her sister and enable her to rest during the night, prevailed upon Mrs. Finn to postpone the making of a will until the following morning, when she could send for some one to come and see her and prepare the necessary papers. The next morning Mrs. Finn sent for her husband, and told him what disposition she wished to make of her property, and upon his assurance that he would carry out her wishes in the matter, she abandoned her intention of making a will. During the period of her illness he frequently requested Mrs. Cassels not to encourage his wife to make a will, saying he would treat Mrs. Cassels right touching the distribution of his wife's estate. Upon his wife's death, he, as her sole heir at law, took possession of her estate. In 1896 Finn intermarried with Mrs. Lillian E. Winn, and in January, 1898, died, leaving her as his sole heir at law. He died without carrying out, save in minor particulars, the wishes of his former wife respecting the division to be made of her separate estate. After the death of Finn, his second wife, Mrs. Lillian E. Finn, took possession of and assumed control over all of the property of which he died seised, including much of the property inherited from his former wife. The present action was brought against Mrs. Lillian E. Finn by Mrs. Cassels and her children to compel an accounting, and to recover of the defendant all of the property in her possession which had formed a part of the separate estate of Mrs. Susie S. Finn at the time of her death. The theory on which the petition was framed was that, inasmuch as Finn's former wife had been induced by his fraudulent conduct to abandon her intention of executing a will, and as he had thus been enabled to acquire her estate by inheritance, the property belonging thereto became impressed with an implied or constructive trust in favor of the plaintiffs, and that Finn held the same merely in the capacity of a trustee for them. Upon a demurrer to the petition interposed by the defendant, the court below held that no cause of action was set forth in the petition, and the action was accordingly dismissed. To this ruling the plaintiffs except.

Denmark, Ashley & Smith and S. A. Roddenberry, for plaintiffs in error. W. M. Hammond and Fondreu Mitchell, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). Unless the allegations of the petition respecting the conduct of the husband of the defendant relating to the intestacy of Mrs. Susie Finn will imply a trust which can be established by parol proof, the demurrer was rightfully sustained. Express trusts must be created or declared in writing. Civ. Code 1895, § 3153. Hence the parol promise alleged to have been made by John Finn to his first wife cannot be upheld as an express trust. But if, from the nature of the transaction, it be manifest that it was the intention of Mrs. Susie Finn to make a will devising her property to plaintiffs, as alleged in the petition, and she was prevented from so doing by the fraud of her husband, whereby upon her decease he became vested with the absolute title to all her property as heir at law, equity will imply a trust. Civ. Code 1895, § 3159. "There is no law which requires a fraudulent undertaking to be manifested by writing. Those who use promises, which they make deceitfully, for the purpose of accomplishing fraudulent designs, are generally careful not to furnish written evidence of their turpitude. Such promises, whatever may be their terms, do not, unless reduced to writing, raise express trusts; but the law, acting upon them according to their nature, makes them a basis upon which to build up in favor of the defrauded party an implied or constructive trust." Brown v. Doane, 86 Ga. 38, 12 S. E. 179, 11 L. R. A. 381. The learned judge who delivered the opinion in that case quoted approvingly from 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1656: "In order that the doctrine of trusts ex maleficio with respect to land may be enforced under any circumstances, there must be something more than a mere verbal promise, however unequivocal; otherwise the statute of frauds would be virtually abrogated. There must be an element of positive fraud accompanying the promise, and by means of which the acquisition of the legal title is wrongfully consummated." There is a great difference between the breach of a promise made with no intention of performing it and the breach of a promise not fraudulent of itself. In discussing this distinction, Lumpkin, J., in Robson v. Harwell, 6 Ga. 615, said: "The rule I am contending for is not only the rule of the books, but it is the dictate of sound reason. Let the doctrine be once established that a failure to comply with a parol promise made contemporaneous with a deed is ipso facto a fraud, and can be proved, and the promise decreed to be performed in equity on the ground of fraud, and you do what the Master of Rolls in Portmore v. Morris [2 Bro. C. C. 219] refused to do—demolish one of the foremost rules of law."

Do the allegations of the petition show any fraudulent conduct on the part of John Finn? It is charged that Mrs. Susie Finn sent for her husband, and "repeated to him several times what disposition she wanted made of her property"; it being the same described in the petition. "Thereupon the said John L. Finn said to his wife, 'I promise and swear to do everything just as you wish and as you have stated.' His wife then replied to him, 'John Finn, your word is as good as a will.' The said Mrs. Susie S. Finn then, relying on his promise, and believing that he would in good faith carry out her wishes, decided not to have a will prepared." This conversation is said to have occurred on June 18, 1894, and Mrs. Finn died on the 25th of July following. The petition further states that for some time after her death her husband seemed disposed to carry out and perform in good faith his promise to his deceased wife, even going so far as to make remittances to Mrs. Cassels of moneys received by him in part from the collection of rents and from the sale of a vacant lot in Thomasville, and repeatedly assuring Mrs. Cassels of his intention to carry out every pledge made to his deceased wife. John Finn, up to the time of his death, also paid the school expenses of Alexander Cassels. According to the petition, Finn never denied his parol promise to his deceased wife, but died without executing it. No act of mala fides is alleged, and, so far as we can learn from the petition, it was Finn's intention to perform his promise. His promise to his wife does not appear to have been made with contemporaneous fraudulent intent. The failure to perform a verbal promise, made by the sole heir at law of one desiring to dispose of her estate by will to third persons, that he will dispose of her estate as she desires, cannot make the heir at law, in case of an intestacy, a trustee ex maleficio as to the property inherited by him, in the absence of actual fraud. There is a line of authorities, both English and American, holding that, if a testator be induced to make a devise by the promise of the devisee that it shall be applied to the benefit of another, a trust is thereby created which may be established by parol evidence. Oldham v. Litchfield, 2 Vern. 506; Thynn v. Thynn, 1 Vern. 296; Williams v. Vreeland, 29 N. J. Eq. 417; Williams v. Fitch, 18 N. Y. 546; Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 432; Gilpatrick v. Glidden (Me.) 18 Atl. 464, 2 L. R. A. 662, 10 Am. St. Rep. 245. The reasoning of this line of decisions is strongly put by Gibson, C. J., in Hoge v. Hoge, 1 Watts, 163, 26 Am. Dec. 52: "It is contended that parol evidence of a trust is contrary to our statute of wills, which corresponds, as far as regards the point in dispute, with the British statute of frauds. Undoubtedly every part of a will must be in writing, and a naked declaration of trust in respect of land devised is void. The trust insisted on here, however, owes its validity, not to the will or the declaration of the testator, but to the fraud of the devisee. It belongs to a class in which the trust arises ex maleficio, and in which equity turns the fraudulent procurer of the legal title into a trustee to get at him; and there is nothing in reason or authority to forbid the raising of such a trust from the surreptitious procurement of a devise." So, in the case of Dixon v. Olmius, 1 Cox, Ch. 414, the will of Lord Waltham had been revoked by suffering a fine and recovery, and Lord Waltham desired to republish it, but was fraudulently prevented by acts of fraud and violence of Mr. Olmius, the husband of the testator's daughter, who was tenant in tail, and entitled to the estate in case the recovery was defeated. Lord Thurlow held that the tenant in tail could not take advantage of her husband's fraud, and that the estate would be treated as if the will had been republished. The case of Beddian v. Seaton, 3 Wall. Jr. 279, 3 Fed. Cas. 38, differentiates between a transaction whereby the absolute title is acquired by will by means of a fraudulent promise, and one whereby the title is acquired by inheritance by means of a fraud practiced by the heir at law to prevent his ancestor from making a will otherwise disposing of his estate. The facts of this case are very similar to those of the case at bar, and the distinction sought to be pointed out is that in case of the procurer of the title by will by fraudulent promise of the devisee a trust arises, which adheres to the land thus fraudulently obtained, whereas, when the title is cast upon the heir by the law, such a trust cannot be implied, for in the latter case the promise would be a mere parol contract, and not a trust descending with the land. In principle I am unable to perceive any rational distinction between the two classes of cases. In each the title is procured by means of fraud, and it is the fraud which creates the trust, and not the particular manner by which the result is accomplished.

Pervading all the cases cited the dominant note is fraud, and not the mere breach of a parol promise. The Illinois Supreme Court clearly brings out this distinction in Lantry v. Lantry, 51 Ill. 453, 2 Am. Rep. 310, wherein it is ruled: "If A. voluntarily conveys lands to B., the latter having taken no measures to procure the conveyance, but accepting it and verbally promising to hold the property in trust for C., the case falls within the statute, and chancery will not enforce the parol promise. But if A. was intending to convey the land directly to C., and B. interfered, and advised A. not to convey directly to C., but to convey to him, promising, if A. would do so he, B., would hold the land in trust for C., chancery will lend its aid to enforce the trust, upon the ground that B. obtained the title by fraud and imposition upon A." To the same effect, see Fischbeck v. Gross, 112 Ill. 208. Before one can become a trustee ex maleficio, he must obtain another's property from him by fraud.

We have endeavored to demonstrate that the plaintiffs' cause of action is dependent upon the determination of the conduct of the defendant's husband as fraudulent. That it was not fraudulent is clear from the allegations of the petition. His parol promise appears to have been made in good faith, and the breach thereof was occasioned by his death before fulfillment. Mrs. Susie Finn lived five weeks after her husband made the promise. During this period the husband is not charged to have done any act to prevent the execution of a will. His wife simply relied on a promise not binding in law, but only in conscience. The failure to perform such verbal promise was not per se fraudulent; and, as no act of fraud is alleged to have been committed by John Finn whereby he became the owner of the property upon the decease of his wife, he was not a trustee ex maleficio. The demurrer was properly sustained.

THOMPSON v. AMERICAN MORTG. CO. OF SCOTLAND, Limited.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1903.)

JUDGMENT—AMENDMENT.

1. Where a petition was filed and process issued against A., and the return of the sheriff shows that he served "the defendant," and where, in entire conformity to the pleadings, judgment by default was entered against A., such judgment cannot, on the ground that its rendition against A. was the result of a clerical error, be so amended as to make it a valid judgment against B.; there being apparent on the face of the record no evidence of any clerical error or inadvertence. This is so, though B. admits that he was the party who owed the debt sued for, and should have been made the defendant in the suit, and informally consents that the judgment be so amended as to apply against him.

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Claim case between the American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, and A. J. Thompson. Judgment for the company, and the claimant brings error. Affirmed.

A. C. Pate and J. H. Martin, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Simmons and W. L. Grice & Sons, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. On March 26, 1884, Caroline Coley conveyed to J. K. O. Sherwood the land which is the subject-matter of the present controversy, to secure a loan of $800, and took from Sherwood a bond to reconvey upon payment of the loan. On the same day Sherwood conveyed the land to the American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, subject to Mrs. Coley's rights under her bond to reconvey, and also indorsed to it Mrs. Coley's note, to secure which the deed was made. The deed from Caroline Coley to Sherwood and that from Sherwood to the mortgage company were both duly recorded April 26, 1884. On November 19, 1890, a judgment was rendered against Lancaster, as administrator of Caroline Coley, in favor of the mortgage company, upon the note to secure which the deed was given, and execution issued thereon November 20, 1890. A deed from the mortgage company to Lancaster, as administrator for the purpose of levy and sale, was duly filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court; the execution was levied on the land on April 23, 1891; and on May 2, 1891, a claim was interposed by the plaintiff in error. At the February term, 1904, of Pulaski superior court, the issue thus made came on for a hearing, and was by agreement tried by the judge without a jury. An agreed statement of facts was submitted, which embraced what has already been set out; and, in addition, it appeared that in 1890 Nettle Westcott brought suit against Mrs. Mary Coley in the county court of Pulaski county. Process issued against Mary Coley, and the return of service thereon was as follows: "Served a copy of this summons on the de-defendant by leaving at her house. Sept. 11, '80. W. D. Martin, Deputy-sheriff." On January 24, 1881, judgment was rendered in this suit against Mary Coley, and on April 11, 1881, execution thereon issued against her. On January 28, 1884, the judge of the county court of Pulaski county passed an order, of which the following is an exact copy: "Pulaski County Court, January term, 1884. It appearing to the court in the case of Mrs. Nettie Westcott vs. Caroline Coley, upon which a judgment was rendered at the January term, 1881, of said court, has been by a clerical error entered up against Mrs. Mary Coley; and it further appearing that the pleading and all the papers show that said suit was against said Caroline Coley, who had due and legal service perfected upon her, and with no defense filed, that judgment was rendered properly. Ordered, that the minutes of the court be amended 'nunc pro tunc' so as to speak the truth in said case, and that being so amended a fi. fa. do issue against said Mrs. Caroline Coley. Ordered also that the clerk of this court place the same on record. This January 28th, 1884. H. H. Whitfield, J. P. C. C." In accordance with this order, on September 3, 1884, an execution issued from the county court of Pulaski county in favor of Mrs. Nettie Westcott against Mrs. Caroline Coley, and on September 29, 1884, this execution was levied on the land in controversy. On December 29, 1884, a deed to the land was made by the sheriff of Pulaski county to John Pusser; on February 26, 1886, Pusser sought to convey it to Mrs. Mary T. Mims; and on January 17, 1884, Mary T. Mims made a deed to the land to A. J. Thompson & Co. All these deeds, it was agreed, covered the land in dispute. Mrs. C. W. Mims testified that her given name was Mary; that she was a daughter of Mrs. Caroline Coley; that she knew the land levied on, and was familiar with the circumstances under which her mother conveyed it to Sherwood; that her mother was in possession of it at the time the conveyance was made, had been for some 15 or 16 years prior to that time, and continued so for 2 or 3 years afterwards; that her mother was served in a suit brought in the county court by Mrs. Nettie Westcott; that she remembered that her mother was served twice with Westcott papers, but that she read over none of the papers that were served on her mother, and did not know what was in them. It was agreed that C. W. Mims, the husband of Mary T. Mims, would testify that Caroline Coley got a summons left at her house by the deputy sheriff, and that she and said Mims came to Hawkinsville to confer with an attorney about the Westcott suit. She came once after a judgment had been rendered against Mrs. Mary Coley, and agreed with Judge Kibbee that there was a mistake in the name of the defendant, that she (Mrs. Caroline Coley) owed the debt, and that the judgment rendered in the suit against Mrs. Mary Coley might be corrected so as to be against her. So far as known, however, she did not go to the courthouse, and did not see the judge of the court about it. It was also agreed that Mims would testify that Caroline Coley died November 15, 1887; that Mary T. Mims was in possession at the time she made the deed to Thompson & Co.; that Thompson & Co. went into possession January 1, 1888, and have remained in possession since that time. To the original petition of Mrs. Westcott in the suit referred to was attached an itemized account against "Mrs. Coley." On the evidence and the agreed facts above stated, the judge of the superior court found the property subject Thompson, surviving partner, excepted.

In the argument, both here and in the court below, it was agreed by counsel that the sole question for determination was as to the legality of the order amending the judgment against Mary Coley so as to make it a judgment against Caroline Coley. Civ. Code 1895, § 4047 (6), empowers a court "to amend and control its process and orders, so as to make them conformable to law and justice, and to amend its own records, so as to make them conform to the truth." The order in this case by which it was sought to amend the judgment against Mary Coley so as to make it a valid judgment against Caroline Coley recited that the judgment as originally rendered was the result of a clerical mistake. It further recited "that the pleadings and all the papers show that said suit was against said Caroline Coley." The facts as disclosed by the record show that this amendatory judgment did not itself speak the truth. The petition was against Mary Coley, the process was against Mary Coley, and the return of the sheriff showed that the defendant was served. If the declaration and process had been against Caroline Coley, and the judgment against Mary, then the error would have been amendable, if made in the proper manner. Or, if the suit had been against Caroline, and the process and judgment against Mary, the error could have been cured by amendment. But the declaration, process, and judgment were all against Mary Coley, and execution issued against Mary Coley. There could have been no clerical error or inadvertence on the part of any officer of court. Everything done, both by the clerk and the sheriff, was in conformity to the plaintiff's pleadings, and the judgment rendered was also in conformity thereto. The subsequent order of the court did not seek to amend anything except the judgment rendered, and its effect was to destroy the conformity between the judgment and the pleadings and process. In other words, taking the record as now presented to us, we have a petition and process against Mary Coley, service on the defendant named, and a judgment against Caroline Coley. There is no question that a judgment may be amended, even after execution has issued thereon; but it is clear that the amendment must harmonize with the pleadings, and unless it does so, it will be void—especially as to third persons whose rights are affected thereby. Caroline Coley was not a party to the suit, and was nowhere named in the petition, nor even in the bill of particulars. While it appears that she consented to the amendment of the judgment, we know of no law which will authorize a party who has not been sued to come into court in an entirely informal manner and substitute himself as the defendant in a judgment against a party who has been sued. To hold such an amendment good as against the rights of the plaintiff in execution in the present case would be to open wide the door to unlimited possibilities of fraud.

It follows from what has been said that the sheriff's deed to Pusser, and the subsequent deeds under which the claimant relied, conveyed no title, and that the court below properly found the property subject.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except EVANS, J., disqualified.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. CASTELLOW.

APPEAL—NEW TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The requests to charge, so far as legal and pertinent, were in substance covered by the general charge. The evidence was sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence against the company, and a finding that the presumption had not been rebutted was authorized. The discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial will not be interfered with.

E. SWINDELL & CO. v. SADDLER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

INJUNCTION—CUTTING TIMBER—PETITION—SALE.

1. Where a plaintiff seeks to enjoin the cutting of timber under Civ. Code 1895, § 4927, and the abstract attached to his petition shows that he has not the perfect paper title prescribed by that section, he may amend by alleging that the defendant is insolvent, and that the damages threatened will be irreparable.

2. Where, in such an action, it appears that the plaintiff has signed an unambiguous contract for the sale of the timber in dispute, and no effort is made to reform the instrument on the ground that it does not speak the real agreement between the parties, it is error to grant the injunction prayed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by Moses Saddler against E. Swindell & Co. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

Saddler sought to enjoin Swindell & Co. from cutting timber on a tract of land alleged to be his property. He did not allege that the defendants were insolvent, or that the damages would be irreparable, but apparently relied upon the perfect paper title prescribed by Civ. Code 1895, § 4927, as the basis of an action to enjoin the cutting of timber. The abstract of title attached to his petition was, in so far as the purposes of this suit are concerned, defective, in that parol evidence was necessary to show that one of the grantors therein named was the heir at law of his predecessor in title. See Powell v. Brinson, 120 Ga. 36, and cases cited on page 38, 47 S. E. 499, 500. A temporary injunction was granted, and the defendants filed a motion in the nature of a demurrer to the petition, praying that this injunction be dissolved. Two amendments to the petition were then allowed over the objection of the defendants. In one of these amendments it was alleged that the defendants do not claim title to the timber in dispute, "except under and through a certain receipt, which plaintiff gave defendants for the sum of ten dollars, which was part payment of a contract price of thirty dollars, which said defendants were to give plaintiff for certain trees of a certain character" on the land involved in this suit; that the plaintiff did not read the paper so signed by him, for the reason that he could not read, but relied entirely upon the statement of the defendants' agent with whom the transaction was had as to its contents; that the agreement between the parties was that only the "big yellow-hearted trees" were to be sold, the rail timber being expressly excepted from its operation; that the defendants went upon the land and proceeded to cut all the timber of every description—"in fact, more timber than the agreement called for"; and that the defendants are hopelessly insolvent and unable to respond in damages. In the other amendment it was alleged that the damage to the plaintiff would be irreparable. The defendants filed answers to the petition and to the amendments. They admitted that they claimed the timber under a contract with the plaintiff, but denied that that contract embraced only the timber of a certain character on the land. They also denied all the material portions of the petition and the amendments. Attached to the answer as an exhibit was a copy of the contract in question, which was as follows: "Feb. 21st, 1899. State of Georgia, County of Decatur. Received of E. Swindell & Co. the sum of $10.00 dollars, the same being part of the purchase-money for the timber on lot of land No. 305, the east side, 110 acres timber in the 16th district of said county, and also for the right to construct and build upon the said lands, at any time, tram-roads, rail-roads and wagon-roads, and such other devices as they may see fit. The deed to the said timber and said privileges to be delivered as soon as the title to said land can be examined and perfected, and the balance of said purchase-money to be paid when the deed is so made and delivered by Moses Saddler to the said E. Swindell & Co., as follows: Balance $20.00 to be paid at the commencement of cutting timber. In the event no deed is made I agree to refund the said part of the purchase money so paid by the said — on demand; it being understood and agreed that it is optional with the said E. Swindell & Co. to accept the said title to the said property and pay the purchase-money therefor." This writing was signed by Saddler by his mark, and was attested by two witnesses—one a justice of the peace; and it was in evidence on the hearing, and its execution admitted by the plaintiff. The court granted an order enjoining the defendants as prayed until the final hearing. The defendants except to this order, the allowance of the amendments to the petition over their objection, and the refusal of the court to dissolve the injunction as prayed.

Albert H. Russell and Townsend & Dickenson, for plaintiffs in error. W. D. Sheffield, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1. Under the liberal law now of force in this state in regard to the allowance of amendments, and the liberal construction of that law by this court, we are not prepared to hold that the amendments to the petition which were allowed over the objection of the defendants set up a new and distinct cause of action. "Relatively to the law of pleading, a cause of action is some particular right of the plaintiff against the defendant, together with some definite violation of that right." City of Columbus v. Anglin, 120 Ga. 785, 48 S. E. 318 (4). In the present case the particular right declared on by the plaintiff was the right to the unmolested possession and enjoyment of the timber on his land, and the definite violation of that right the cutting of the timber by the defendants. It is true that the original petition sought relief under a particular act of the General Assembly, on the theory that the plaintiff had a perfect paper title to the land on which the timber was located, while the amendments sought relief on the ground that the defendants were insolvent, and that the damages sustained or about to be sustained would be irreparable. This, however, was a matter which went to the form of the assertion of the plaintiff's right, rather than to the substance of the right itself. No new cause of action was set up by the amendments, and their allowance was not error.

2. We are clear, however, that, upon the face of the pleadings as they appear in the record, the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief sought. It was not denied that the plaintiff signed a contract for the sale of the timber, the cutting of which he now seeks to enjoin. On its face this paper stipulates for the sale of all the timber on the plaintiff's land. If it does not speak the true agreement between the parties, it must be reformed before equity will interfere to restrain the apparent rights of the defendants thereunder. A case directly in point is Perkins Lumber Co. v. Wilkinson, 117 Ga. 394, 43 S. E. 696; and further discussion is unnecessary, other than to say that, under the decision in the case cited, the grant of an injunction was clearly error.

MILLER et al. v. BUTLER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

TRUSTEE—ACTIONS BY AND AGAINST — PARTIES—RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARIES—DEMURRER—ADMISSIONS—FRAUD—MISJOINDER OF PARTIES.

1. It being the duty and within the power of the trustee to defend the estate committed to his care, he may institute or defend actions relating thereto without joining the cestuis que trust as parties, and in the absence of fraud they are bound by the judgment rendered therein.

2. If the cestuis que trust suffer loss by reason of the conduct of the trustee, the remedy is not to undo what has lawfully been done, but to proceed against the trustee, whose solvency and capacity was passed upon by the settlor in appointing him to represent the estate when it became necessary to deal with third persons.

3. While a demurrer admits facts properly pleaded, it does not admit a fraud charged, except as the facts establish or constitute fraud.

4. The petition in the present case stated no facts constituting fraud, nor did the subsequent breach of the contract under which the decree was taken amount to fraud which would relate back and vitiate a decree which was otherwise free therefrom.

5. The right of the plaintiffs to unite in a suit grew out of the unity of their interest under the trust deed.

6. The trustee and beneficiaries thereunder were not the promisees in the express contract sued on, and therefore had no right to maintain an action thereon in their own names.

7. The parties sued in one capacity under the trust deed. But the right to recover for the breach of the express contract was only in two of the parties, and in a capacity different from that in which they sued.

8. The causes of action and prayers for relief were dissimilar and antagonistic.

9. If, by virtue of the interest created by the trust deed, the beneficiaries have any cause of action against the defendant alone, or against the defendant and the trustee, or the right to recover from the defendant an amount equal to the consideration alleged to have been given for the consent verdict, the same must be asserted in a separate and distinct suit.

Error from Superior Court, Troup County:
R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Suit by Willis Miller and H. W. Miller against H. C. Butler. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Willis Miller, for the benefit of himself, and also for the benefit of his daughter-in-law and grandchildren, conveyed certain land to his son H. W. Miller, trustee. There was no power to sell conferred upon the trustee. The land described in the trust deed was claimed by Butler under a sheriff's deed. He was also prosecuting a suit against Willis Miller on a debt antedating the trust deed, with a view of enforcing the judgment entered thereon. Thereupon Willis Miller and H. W. Miller, trustee, filed a bill against Butler to enjoin this common-law suit, and to remove the cloud on the title created by the sheriff's deed held by Butler. He answered, attacking the trust deed on several grounds—among others, that it was void because Willis Miller, the grantor, had therein reserved a benefit to himself. Pending the suit, Willis Miller died, and his administrator was made a party plaintiff. In May, 1895, a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant, establishing the validity of his title to the land, and also entering a decree in his favor for $2,590. Several years thereafter (March, 1900) H. W. Miller as trustee, and the cestuis que trust under the trust deed above recited, brought an equitable petition against Butler, alleging that the verdict above referred to had been taken by consent under an agreement by which Butler undertook to levy the execution to be issued thereunder on certain land belonging to Willis Miller; agreeing also that at the sale he would buy in such land, and convey the same by absolute deed to H. W. Miller and his wife. The petition alleged that within the last few months he, on demand, had failed to carry out this agreement. It was claimed that the children were not parties to the original suit. There was a prayer that Butler should be forced to carry out his agreement as to H. W. Miller and Mary Miller. It was charged that Butler had failed to carry out the agreement, and that such was fraudulent conduct, and it was prayed that the decree should be set aside for fraud. Butler demurred, and subsequently the petition was amended, by which the complainants prayed that, if they were not entitled to specific performance of the contract made by Butler, they be awarded damages for its breach. The court sustained the demurrer, and the trustee and beneficiaries under the trust deed excepted.

D. J. Gaffney and W. O. Wright, for plaintiffs in error. F. M. Longley, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). Where the title to property is put in one person for the benefit of others, the latter take cum onere. The skill, ability, and solvency of the trustee operate to their advantage. But as to acts within the scope of his express or implied powers, they must suffer the consequences when they ultimately prove detrimental to the beneficiaries. The remedy in such a case is not to undo what has lawfully been done, but to proceed against the trustee (Clark v. Flannery, 99 Ga. 239, 25 S. E. 312), whose personal and financial fitness were passed upon by the grantor when giving the land. The very instrument which created the estate put forward the trustee as the person who was to represent those interested therein when it became necessary to deal with third persons. On this principle, cestuis que trust are bound by his nonaction for a time long enough for him to be barred by the statute (Civ. Code 1895, § 3773); they are bound by his loss of a loan made in good faith to a person then solvent (Walker v. Walker, 42 Ga. 135); by his receipt of funds which other prudent men then took as currency (Campbell v. Miller, 38 Ga. 304, 95 Am. Dec. 389); by a compromise honestly and in good faith made by him (Maynard v. Cleveland, 76 Ga. 53 [6]). They are likewise bound by the results of suits instituted or defended by him for the benefit of the estate. Gunn v. James, 120 Ga. 482, 48 S. E. 148. And this is so even if the judgment is rendered by default. Sanders v. Houston, 107 Ga. 59, 32 S. E. 610 (4). See Ferris v. Van Ingen, 110 Ga. 102, 35 S. E. 347 (6, 7), where the minor was held bound by the conduct of the mother, to whom a year's support for herself and child had been set apart.

In proceedings by a trustee to get a benefit personal to himself, or to secure the right to exercise a power not granted by the trust deed or not implied by law, the cestuis que trust must be made parties. Meyer v. Butt, 44 Ga. 468; Snelling v. American Freehold Co., 107 Ga. 854, 33 S. E. 634, 73 Am. St. Rep. 160. But it required neither express power in the deed, nor an order from the chancellor, to authorize or require the trustee to defend and preserve the estate committed to his care. That was a prime duty imposed by his appointment. Schley v. Lyon, 6 Ga. 535; Bourquin v. Bourquin, 120 Ga. 115, 47 S. E. 639. The beneficiaries under this deed were therefore not necessary parties to the suit brought by the trustee to preserve the corpus as against the claim asserted by Butler. In the absence of fraud or collusion, they were bound by the decree that the title of Butler was superior to that created for them by the deed of settlement. Sanders v. Houston Co., 107 Ga. 55, 56, 32 S. E. 610; Snelling v. American Freehold Co., 107 Ga. 854, 33 S. E. 634, 73 Am. St. Rep. 160; Knorr v. Raymond, 73 Ga. 750 (10a); Smith v. Cook, 71 Ga. 705.

But the plaintiff in error contends that, even if the decree in the former suit would ordinarily have bound them, it has no such effect here, because of the allegation in the bill that it was the result of fraud on the part of Butler. Where litigation is pending, and by the fraud of one party the other is prevented from making his defense, or induced to withdraw his plea, appeal, or motion for a new trial, or where by reason of fraud a judgment apparently conclusive is rendered, relief therefrom may be had by appropriate proceedings. Everett v. Tabor, 119 Ga. 130, 46 S. E. 72. If a consent judgment is taken under an agreement that it is to be used only in a particular way after a certain time, or only against designated property, the party will be held to his contract, and equity will enjoin against another or different use being made of the judgment. Markham v. Angier, 57 Ga. 43. But it will be noticed that in these classes of cases the judgment was either originally void because fraudulently obtained, or its enforcement was enjoined because it was being used contrary to the terms of the very agreement on which it had been entered. In the present case the contract calls for exactly the form of decree which was taken, as well as for the exact use which was to be made under it. There is no allegation that, at the time of making the contract, Butler fraudulently intended not to pay the price for the decree operating as a quasi conveyance to the land already held by him under the sheriff's deed. There is therefore nothing even within the analogy of the principle of Civ. Code 1895, § 3531.

In pleadings, epithets and hard words are not sufficient to make out a case of fraud when relief is asked because of its existence. While a demurrer admits facts properly pleaded, it "does not admit a fraud charged, except as the facts establish or constitute a fraud. A merely pro forma statement will not do. The facts must be stated, that the court may judge whether they amount to fraud or not." Bellamy v. Woodson, 4 Ga. 175, 48 Am. Dec. 221; Schaifer v. Bacon, 88 Ga. 135; Kilgo v. Castleberry, 38

Ga. 512, 95 Am. Dec. 406 (3); Powell v. Parker, 38 Ga. 644 (1). Fraud is subtle, and slight circumstances may be sufficient to establish its existence. But the pleadings should at least indicate some of the slight circumstances intended to be proved. Some issuable and specific fact should be stated so as to put the defendant on notice, even if it be only a charge that he fraudulently intended, while insolvent, not to pay. In the present case there is an utter absence of such allegation, and the only fact relied on to constitute fraud in 1895, when the judgment was taken, is Butler's failure, on demand, in 1900, to comply with the former promise. But while a subsequent breach of a contract affords ground for relief, it does not constitute fraud infecting and vitiating the validity of the original agreement. This is particularly so in the present case, where the very contract required that the execution under the decree now attacked for fraud was to be levied on certain land, which was thereupon to be bought in by Butler, and the property should then be conveyed by him by absolute deed to H. W. Miller and his wife. The original petition therefore set out no cause of action based upon the allegations of fraud.

Nor did the amendment save the case. It may be that, as indicated in the speaking demurrer, the land passing under the trust deed is now in the hands of bona fide purchasers; that either for this reason, or because the plaintiffs apprehending that the deed from Willis Miller to H. W. Miller, trustee, might be successfully attacked by Butler, they ask, in the alternative, for damages for the breach of the contract under which the consent verdict was taken. The amendment does not attack the contract as void because the consideration moved to H. W. Miller instead of to H. W. Miller, trustee. Instead of treating it as void, the amendment treats the contract as valid. But if so, the cause of action thereon was not in the cestui que trust. They were not promisees. Hawkins v. Central R. Co., 119 Ga. 159, 46 S. E. 82. The right to enforce the contract was not in the trustee or the beneficiaries, but in H. W. Miller and wife. The demurrer to the petition as amended was therefore properly sustained. If a part of the plaintiffs have one cause of action, and the rest another, they must assert the same in separate suits. If all or a part of the beneficiaries have a cause of action against Butler alone, or against Butler and the trustee, they must institute a different form of action.

Whatever may be the rights of the parties in another suit, there was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the present proceeding, and the judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

JOHNSON v. McKAY.

LIS PENDENS—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—PAROL EVIDENCE—RES JUDICATA—FRAUD—NEW TRIAL.

In March, 1895, A. filed a petition to recover from B. a tract of 1,143 acres of land (described by naming coterminous owners), alleging that the same descended to her as the sole heir of her husband, who was the brother of the defendant B., but that said land was then held and claimed by B. under an improper construction of a contract made in 1856, relating to the division of land between her husband, his mother, and B. In April, 1895, B. filed his answer, admitting possession, and claiming title by virtue of such contract, the terms of his father's will, and the death of his brother without children. Pending the suit, the plaintiff A., in October, 1895, mortgaged to J. two tracts which went to form a part of the 1,143 acres. Thereafter a decree was entered that the land referred to in the petition, described by reference to then coterminous owners, was the property of B. Held:

1. That the description of the property as set out in the pleadings was sufficient to operate as lis pendens.

2. That parol evidence was admissible to show that the property mortgaged formed a part of the land referred to in the pending suit.

3. That, in the absence of fraud or collusion, J., the mortgagee, was bound by the decree subsequently entered in the cause, finding against the mortgagor and in favor of B., even though he had no actual notice of the pendency of the suit when he took the mortgage.

4. The fact that costs were taxed against B. in the equity cause was not sufficient to establish the existence of fraud so as to relieve J. from being bound by the decree.

5. Even if the plaintiff's evidence as to possession by the mortgagor was sufficient to make out a prima facie case, there was like evidence sufficient to rebut the same.

6. Considering the want of certainty as to the description of the land mortgaged, the dispute as to possession, and the effect of the decree, there was nothing in the rulings as to admission or exclusion of evidence or in the charge of the court which required the grant of a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Jones County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Claim case between J. C. Johnson and H. A. McKay. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On October 1, 1895, Mrs. Julia McKay executed a mortgage to J. C. Johnson on several tracts of land in Jones county. Among the property thus mortgaged was "all that tract of land in Jones county, Georgia, containing 153 acres, known as the 'Zachariah Emerson Place,' part of lots No. 125 in the 11th District, and part of No. not known." Also "the Thomas Bazemore place, containing 196 acres, more or less, joining the land of Sarah Emerson, Elisha Owens, Madison T. Bazemore, and H. D. McKay." The execution and levy followed the description in the mortgage. H. A. McKay, executor of G. W. F. McKay, filed a claim. At the trial the plaintiff introduced a deed from Hammock, administrator of Zachariah Emerson, to Hugh McKay, dated September 5, 1854, describing the 153-acre tract as in the mortgage. Also a deed from Thomas J. Bazemore to Hugh McKay, dated September 28, 1848, describing the 196-acre tract exactly as it was described in the mortgage. It was admitted that the mortgagor, Mrs. Julia McKay, was the sole heir at law of Hugh McKay. Plaintiff testified that Hugh McKay was in possession of these two places at the time of his death, and that after his death his widow went into possession thereof, and remained in possession until she settled the suit between herself and George McKay. These two places adjoined and lay broadside of each other. She was in possession of these lands at the date of the execution of the mortgage to the plaintiff. On cross-examination he testified that he knew she was in possession from going on the land with her and in assisting in collecting the rent. Did not remember what was the year. "I may have stated in the former trial that what I knew about her possession I got from her." Do not know when the husband died. "My recollection is that she was in possession in 1894. What I know about her possession is what she told me, and from going upon the place with her to collect the rent. The mortgage is dated October 1, 1895. She was collecting rents for that place at that time. I got the description of the land from the deeds placed in my possession." There was much evidence seeking to establish the boundaries of the Emerson and Bazemore places described in the mortgage, and a plat thereof, made by Childs, a surveyor, who ran the lines according to information derived from persons who pointed out a hedge row which forms a part of one of the lines, and indicated what they thought were the lines. Maj. Jones, who pointed out some of the lines and assisted the surveyor, testified: "I do not think I could go around any of these places now and show the lines. I do not know anybody that could." The surveyor who made the map testified that it was "correct, according to the information obtained from Major Jones. Lot 125 in the 11th District is from five to seven miles away from these lands." Other witnesses for the plaintiff testified as to what they knew concerning the boundaries of the two tracts, stating also that what they knew as the Bazemore and Emerson places would be contained in a tract of 1,143 acres as the same was described in the petition resulting in the decree on which claimant relied. The evidence for the claimant tended to show that it was impossible to identify the lines of the Bazemore and Emerson places on which the plaintiff claimed to have a mortgage. The claimant also introduced the record of a suit between Mrs. Julia McKay and George W. McKay. In it she set out a contract made in 1856 between Sarah McKay and her two sons, Hugh and George. It recited that Sarah McKay was the owner of certain property for life, that she had theretofore given to her two sons certain property, and that they had divided it among themselves. Under this division 1,143 acres therein described had been assigned as the portion belonging to Hugh McKay. "This agreement is only to affect property that has come into possession of the said George and Hugh from the said Sarah, and not what may have come into their possession from other sources, there having been land and railroad stock heretofore sold and the proceeds of the same have been equally divided between the two sons. They are hereby prohibited from calling on each other to respond for any part of the proceeds thereof, further than has already been done." There was also attached a copy of the will of Hugh McKay, the husband and father of the parties to this agreement, in which the devise of his estate was to his wife for life, and after her death the property was to be equally divided between the two sons, or the whole to go to the survivor of them, should they not then not be both in life, to them and their heirs forever. The theory of her petition was that under the contract of 1856 the 1,143 acres of land became the absolute property of the mortgagor, Julia McKay's husband, Hugh, but that when the latter died in 1891 George McKay improperly entered and took possession of the land claiming the same as his own. The petition alleged that George had possession of the papers, and petitioner was not able accurately to describe the property. She did, however, describe the 1,143-acre tract as adjoining M. T. Bazemore on the east, William Paulk on the north, Gordon on the northeast, Finney on the southwest, George McKay on the southeast; said lands lying on the waters of Town creek, in Jones county. This petition alleged that these lands were acquired by Sarah McKay by purchase from various persons with the proceeds of property bequeathed for life by her husband; that Sarah McKay died in 186-; and that petitioner's husband, Hugh McKay, died in 1891. This petition was filed on March 25, 1895. George McKay's answer to this suit was filed on April 16, 1895, several months before the execution of the mortgage from Julia McKay to Johnson, the plaintiff in fi. fa. In his answer he admitted possession of the 1,143 acres, claiming that right of possession and title vested in him under the contract of 1856 and the will of his father on the death of Hugh McKay, petitioner's husband, without children. On October 19, 1896, there was a verdict finding "for the defendant the premises in dispute covered by the declaration." A decree was entered accordingly, but the land was described as 1,123 acres, more or less; and, instead of following the petition and contract, naming the coterminous proprietors as they existed in 1856, the decree gave the names of the coterminous proprietors as they existed at the time it was entered. This appears from the testimony of a witness (Tom Gordon) who shows that the adjoining landowners as described in the decree would have been a good description of the entire tract of which Hugh McKay died in possession. And by other evidence in the case it appears that the Bazemore and Emerson places were included in the land of which he died possessed. In the decree there was an order that the defendant pay costs. The claimant relied on the decree, the contract of 1856, the will of Hugh McKay, Sr., and offered evidence to show that George McKay, the claimant's testator, was in possession of the 1,143 acres containing the Bazemore and Emerson places at the time of the execution of the mortgage. He offered evidence that one of the places was not cleared, that the other one was rented, and that George McKay collected the rent for 1895.

There have been three trials in the case. The plaintiff in fi. fa. made a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence, and because the court erred: (1) In the charge on the subject of lis pendens and the notice by the suit between Julia McKay and George McKay. (2) In allowing parol evidence to be considered to show that the Bazemore and Emerson places were included in the property therein referred to, movant contending that the suit would only be notice affecting him if it on its face showed that the Bazemore and Emerson places formed a part of the subject of the controversy. (3) In refusing to permit Johnson to testify that he had no actual notice of the suit. (4) In excluding the evidence of Johnson that he knew where the lines of the home place were; that Hugh McKay showed him the lines. (5) In admitting the evidence of Maj. Jones (on cross-examination): "I only know what Childs surveyed from what Henry McKay told me. According to what Henry showed me, he was not on the Emerson line." This was objected to as hearsay. The motion was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

Hardeman & Moore and R. N. Hardeman, for plaintiff in error. Johnson & Johnson, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). The mortgage of 1895 described the property as in the deeds of 1848 and 1854. Neither of these deeds gave corners, courses, lines, or distances. One did not name the adjoining landowners, and the other gave the coterminous proprietors as they existed in 1848. Naturally, in half a century there had been great and radical changes in this regard. And while the descriptions in neither the deeds nor the mortgage were void, as ruled when the case was here before (119 Ga. 196, 45 S. E. 992), yet it was necessary to resort to extrinsic evidence to show that the land levied on was that described in the fi. fa. Whether this burden was carried in the first instance by the plaintiff, or whether it was rebutted by the claimant's testimony, was a question for the jury. The inherent difficulties of the plaintiff's case in this regard, the change of coterminous proprietors, the destruction of buildings and fences, the obliteration of old lines, resulting from the lapse of time were increased by the special obliteration due to the fact that these two lots were included in a still larger tract of 1,143 acres, held by the same person for more than 40 years. While there was some evidence that the Bazemore and Emerson places were in possession of the mortgagor in 1895, that fact really added little to the description, because there was no evidence as to the extent of these places. The plaintiff in fi. fa. contends that the petition filed in March, 1895, did not operate as notice by way of lis pendens when he took the mortgage in October, 1895, because of the insufficient description of the land therein sued for, and because the contract of 1856 recited that the division therein alluded to did not affect lands previously acquired by either of the sons. He claims that it could not apply to the Bazemore and Emerson places, because the deeds to those two tracts had been made to Hugh McKay in 1848 and 1854. The fact that Hugh McKay had acquired these two places before 1856 necessarily led to the conclusion that they were excepted out of the agreement. For the petition distinctly alleges that the 1,143 acres had been acquired by Sarah McKay by purchase from various persons with the proceeds of property bequeathed to her for life by her husband. It is entirely possible that she could with these proceeds have bought these very lots from her son Hugh.

Nor was there any error in excluding the testimony of the plaintiff that he had no actual knowledge of the suit when he took the mortgage. The very purpose of the rule of lis pendens is to charge with notice in law when there is no notice in fact. Civ. Code 1895, § 3936. There was evidence from which the jury could have found that George McKay was in possession of the mortgaged property. That itself was notice. The mortgagee therefore took subject to that notice, as well as to the notice imparted by the suit. There is no contention that the decree rendered in that suit was not binding on the mortgagor and the mortgagee, unless it was void for collusion. There was no evidence tending to show the existence of any fraud, except that the plaintiff contends that the decree putting the cost on the defendant indicates that there had been a settlement. But the verdict was generally for the defendant. It was an equity case. The costs could therefore be taxed against either party. Civ. Code 1895, § 4850. Even if it was improper, only George McKay could complain. Certainly the fact that he was required to pay the costs is not sufficient to avoid a decree otherwise in his favor.

The charge that the description of the land mentioned in the pleadings must have been sufficient to put Johnson upon inquiry as to whether it included the Bazemore and Emerson places was not error against the plaintiff. The petition gave the outside boundaries of the 1,143 acres, and was sufficient to identify the whole tract so as to operate as lis pendens. It was obviously necessary to resort to parol testimony to show that a part was included in a properly described whole. Rarely, if ever, does a description of an entire tract contain a proper description of a portion in the center of the tract.

There was nothing requiring the grant of a new trial in the exclusion of evidence as to what others had stated to the witness about the line. It is extremely doubtful whether any of the land mortgaged could, under the evidence, have been so marked and identified as to enable it to be properly described by the levying officer in making conveyance as a result of the sheriff's sale. Certainly, the mortgage itself contained no such description. But at last the case is controlled by the fact that the petition of the mortgagor showed that the 1,143 acres were in possession of George McKay, claiming title by reason of a certain contract and will; that George McKay filed his answer admitting the possession and asserting the title; and that this petition and answer were filed months before the plaintiff took his mortgage. It further appears that the mortgaged property was a part of the 1,143 acres. There is no proof that the judgment finding that the land belonged to George McKay was the result of fraud or collusion. This judgment bound the mortgagor and the plaintiff, who was in privity with her. Considering the case as a whole, and irrespective of the other assignments of error which could not be controlling, the judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

POWELL v. GEORGIA, F. & A. RY. CO.

APPEAL—REVIEW—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION—ACTION FOR SERVICES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In order to properly present for decision by the Supreme Court the question whether or not error was committed in admitting given evidence, the complaining party must make it appear not only that the evidence was admitted over his objection, but also what grounds of objection he urged before the trial court at the time the evidence was offered.

2. Where the promoters of a railroad mutually agree to render without compensation their personal services in furthering the enterprise, one of them who performs services in pursuance of the agreement cannot exact payment therefor from the railway corporation receiving the benefit of the same. Such an agreement does not lack a good and valuable consideration; and, though the corporation be not a party thereto, it may, as matter of defense, negative any implied promise on its part to pay for the services so rendered by showing that they were performed for its benefit under that agreement. If one of the parties to it is a partnership, the members of which assent to its terms and undertake to comply therewith, services performed by one of the partners are legally to be regarded as having been rendered by the partnership, and not by him as an individual.

3. The court fully, fairly, and correctly submitted to the jury the contention of the plaintiff that the services performed by him were rendered, not in pursuance of any such agreement, but under circumstances from which the law would imply a promise by the defendant company to pay therefor what they were reasonably worth.

4. A charge to the effect that it is incumbent on a plaintiff to make out his case, in every essential element, "to the satisfaction of the jury," is not calculated to so operate to his prejudice as to afford cause for a new trial, when it appears that he made no request to charge as to how the burden of proof resting upon him could be successfully carried.

5. In charging upon the contentions of the defendant, the court did not express any opinion as to what had been proved; the evidence fully warranted the finding of the jury; and for no reason assigned should the verdict be set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; B. B. Bower, Judge.

Action by M. D. Powell against the Georgia, Florida & Alabama Railway Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

T. S. Hawes and Toomer & Reynolds, for plaintiff in error. Donalson & Donalson, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The plaintiff below, M. D. Powell, brought suit against the Georgia, Florida & Alabama Railway Company, formerly the Georgia Pine Railway Company, for $6,000, in which amount the plaintiff alleged the defendant company was indebted to him for services rendered by him in procuring its right of way, superintending the construction of its roadbed, etc. The defendant filed an answer denying all liability in the premises. On the trial the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show he had performed services in behalf of the company as alleged, which services he had been induced to perform under an implied, if not an express, promise on the part of the company's officials to pay therefor. The defendant, on the other hand, introduced evidence in support of its contention that such services as were rendered by the plaintiff were performed by him in compliance with an understanding between the promoters of the enterprise, of whom he was one, that they were to receive no compensation for their services in building the road, as they, in their capacity of stockholders, would be mutually benefited by the construction of the road, which they contemplated selling at a profit after it was completed between two designated points. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, whereupon the plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court, and he excepted.

1. It appears that Powell Bros., a partnership composed of the plaintiff and his brother E. R. Powell, subscribed to stock, and was largely interested in the success of the project of building the road, as were Henry Bruton and J. P. Williams, other promoters of the enterprise. The defendant offered witnesses who testified that both of the members of the firm of Powell Bros. agreed that they would, in order to subserve the interests of that firm, contribute their personal services in securing a right of way and superintending the construction of the road, provided Bruton and Williams would likewise, without compensation, lend their aid in promoting the project, and that it was under this arrangement, which was assented to and carried out by all parties at interest, that the plaintiff rendered the services performed by him. The defendant also tendered in evidence a letter dated July 27, 1898, of which the following is a copy: "Mr. J. P. Williams, Prest., Savannah Ga.—Dear Sir: Your favor of the 9th inst. just received. As I have been away from home for two weeks or would have replied to you earlier. I don't think Mr. Henry Bruton will attempt to put in any account for services rendered the G. P. Ry. Co. as he very well understands the agreement in regards to salaries, before the commencement of the construction of the road, and I will certainly oppose paying Mr. Bruton for any services he has rendered to the G. P. Ry. Co., as I did hard work and for a long time, but did not expect one cent for it, as it was my understanding that we was to attend to the work without any salaries for services. Yours truly, E. R. Powell." Complaint is made in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in admitting this letter "over plaintiff's objection," but what objection he urged against its admission is not stated. Such an assignment of error cannot be considered by this court, for the reason that it is incumbent on a plaintiff in error to make it appear what were the grounds of objection stated to the trial court at the time the evidence objected to was offered by the opposite party. Tilley v. McJunkin, 116 Ga. 423, 42 S. E. 741; Butts v. State, 118 Ga. 750, 45 S. E. 593. It is true in the present case, as the Chief Justice remarked was true in the case of Frey v. Macon Sash Co., 112 Ga. 244, 37 S. E. 376, that, "In making the motion for a new trial, reasons were assigned why the evidence was inadmissible; but, as has been frequently held, this court cannot consider such reasons where it does not appear that they were presented to the trial judge at the time the evidence was offered."

2. In view of the evidence summarized in the preceding division of this opinion, it is obvious that there is no merit in the further complaint of the plaintiff that the evidence did not warrant the court in submitting to the jury the contention of the defendant that the services for which the plaintiff sought compensation were really rendered to the company by the firm of Powell Bros., and not by M. D. Powell, the plaintiff, as an individual. The court further instructed the jury, in effect, that if the plaintiff performed the services rendered under an agreement to which Bruton, Williams, and Powell Bros. were parties, whereby none of these parties was to receive compensation for services rendered in furthering the enterprise, then the plaintiff could not legally call on the defendant company for payment for the services performed by him of which it received the benefit. Exception is taken to this portion of the charge on the grounds (1) that it precluded the jury from finding that the company had made an implied promise to pay the plaintiff for his services; (2) that the alleged agreement was without consideration; and (3) the company, not being a party thereto, could take no advantage thereof, even if it was operative and binding on the persons who entered into it. Evidently these contentions grow out of a misapprehension of the law. The mutual promises of the parties to the agreement to perform services without compensation constituted a valid consideration for the obligations each assumed under that agreement. By express covenant, the defendant company was to receive the benefits of this agreement; and it follows, necessarily, that in accepting the fruits thereof the company in no wise impliedly promised to pay the plaintiff anything for services performed by him in compliance with this agreement.

3. The court fully and fairly submitted to the jury the contention of the plaintiff that he had never been a party to any such agreement, but had performed services for the company under circumstances from which the law would imply a promise on the part of the company to pay him therefor what they were reasonably worth. On the other hand, the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff was bound to show he performed the alleged services "under some contract, either express or implied." This charge is excepted to on the ground that it excluded from the consideration of the jury "any services which may have been rendered to defendant, by plaintiff and accepted by it," for which services the law would imply a promise to pay, "though not performed under any express or implied contract." We infer that the criticism thus sought to be made on the charge is that the jury may have understood the court to mean that the plaintiff was bound to show that there was an express or implied contract made before he performed any services. The jury could not have received this impression, for in the same connection the court stated to the jury that "an implied contract would be any action" by the defendant company, or conduct on its part, such "as induced Powell to perform the services," acceptance by the company of his services, and ratification of their performance. The court further charged: "If there is no express contract, then it might be under some implied contract; some contract that arose from the action and conduct of the parties; arose from the fact that he went forth and performed the services, and the defendant accepted the services, and encouraged him in performing them, and ratified or enjoyed by taking the benefit of the services." The plaintiff insists that this instruction was erroneous, in that it cut off all right to a recovery, save in the event the jury should "find that the services rendered by the plaintiff to defendant had been noticed or encouraged by the defendant." The point is not well taken. The court merely informed the jury that, under such circumstances as were detailed, the law would imply a promise to pay. The term "noticed" was not employed; nor did the court by this charge make it incumbent on the plaintiff to show, as a condition precedent to a recovery, that the company "encouraged" him in performing services in its behalf. The charge was in accord with the evidence on which the plaintiff relied as disclosing that the officials of the company knew that the plaintiff was assisting in constructing its road, encouraged him to continue his services, and ratified his action by accepting the fruits of his toil, and enjoying the benefits flowing therefrom. If the plaintiff desired any further instructions to the jury on this line, he should have presented a timely request in writing.

4. In another ground of the motion for a new trial, exception is taken to the following charge: "When the plaintiff brings a suit into court, the burden of proof is on him to make out his case to the jury to the satisfaction of the jury in every essential element." The assignment of error on this charge is that "it imposed upon the plaintiff a greater burden than is imposed by law," and "incorrectly stated to the jury the rule of law as to the weight and preponderance of evidence." The court was not undertaking to instruct the jury as to the law relating to the weight and preponderance of evidence, but merely to inform them that under the law (Civ. Code 1895, § 5160) the burden of proof rested on the plaintiff, not upon the defendant, and it was necessary that the plaintiff should prove every fact essential to making out his case. The court added: "The burden would be on Mid Powell to show that he performed this service, and that the services were worth the amount that he charged for them, or such other amount he claims for them under the proof." We fail to see how the plaintiff was prejudiced by the court telling the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff to establish these facts by proof which was to them satisfactory, for it left them free to find in his favor if they credited the testimony submitted in his behalf, irrespective of the question whether he had established his contentions by a preponderance of the evidence. The jury could not have understood the court to mean that they were at liberty to act arbitrarily in the matter, and to capriciously expect him to produce more or better proof than was sufficient to satisfy the minds of reasonable men honestly endeavoring to arrive at the real truth of the controversy. If either of the parties desired the court to specially charge how the plaintiff could successfully carry the burden resting upon him, or to charge on the subject of the weight or preponderance of evidence, a request to so charge should have been presented. Gunn v. Harris, 88 Ga. 439, 14 S. E. 593 (5). In the case cited the losing party was the defendant, and he insisted that a charge on the burden of proof similar to that excepted to in the present case was more favorable to the prevailing party than the law justified.

5. There was considerable difference of opinion on the part of the witnesses as to the extent and value of the plaintiff's services. He complains that the court charged: "They first contend that the services were performed, and put further proof of how each was performed." The exception to this charge is that "it contained an expression by the court that a material fact in controversy, to wit, the extent of the services rendered by the plaintiff to defendant, had been proved." By referring to the entire charge of the court, which is a part of the record, we find that, in using the pronoun "they," the trial judge referred to the defendant company. But his statement that it had "put further proof of how" the services of the plaintiff had been performed did not amount to an expression of opinion as to the extent of such services, or to anything more than a statement that the defendant had introduced evidence as to how they were performed. The play is apparently upon the use of the term "proof," rather than of the word "evidence." As is conclusively evidenced by the verdict, the jury either did not dream that the court had expressed an opinion that the extent of the plaintiff's services was shown by the defendant's evidence, or else wholly disregarded what the court said in this connection, and found for the defendant on the issue whether or not the plaintiff was a party to an agreement under which he was to perform these services without compensation. In other words, the jury found that, irrespective of the extent and value of the services rendered, he could recover nothing from the company, because he had bound himself to perform such services free of charge to it. The evidence fully warranted this finding, and for no reason assigned in the plaintiff's motion for a new trial should the verdict be set aside.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

KENDRICK v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)
RAILROADS—INJURY TO TRESPASSER—NONSUIT.

1. A railroad company owes to a trespasser walking upon its tracks the duty not to hurt him willfully or negligently after his presence becomes known to its servants in charge of one of its trains.

(a) In view of the presumption of negligence raised by law against the defendant company, the evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff was such as, if not overcome by evidence showing due diligence on the part of the company, would authorize a recovery by the plaintiff, and accordingly it was error to grant a nonsuit.

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by Mamie Kendrick against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Williams & Harper, for plaintiff in error.
E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. Hozie Kendrick was killed by the running of the cars of the defendant railway company, and his widow sued for the value of his life. On the trial the plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that the homicide occurred under the following circumstances: The deceased lived near the city of Americus, and was going from his home to Americus, walking upon the railroad track. When he had reached a point within the yards of the railway company near the coal chute, he was standing near the rail of the main line, watching a freight train, which was moving in his direction with considerable noise. While thus engaged he was struck by an engine running backwards on the main line, and knocked about 10 feet in advance of the engine, and then run over by it. The switchman testified he was riding on the footboard of the engine which killed the plaintiff's husband; that the engine was running backwards at a speed of 7 or 8 miles per hour, and that within about 75 yards of the place of the catastrophe he observed something on the track, and when the engine approached to 40 yards of the place he recognized the object to be a man. He immediately gave a signal to stop, but, as he was standing on the footboard of the tender on the fireman's side, the signal was not seen by the engineer. The deceased was looking at the freight train, which was coming from the east on a parallel track. When the engine was about three feet from the deceased, he turned his head, and apparently observed his danger, and attempted to get off the track. Just at this time the freight train, which was going in an opposite direction with the engine, was passing the place where the deceased was standing. As soon as the deceased was struck by the engine, the switchman gave a signal of distress, which was answered by the engineer with a blast of the whistle, and the engine was stopped. The engine was equipped with steam brake, but no brake was applied until after the engine struck deceased. By applying the brakes the engine could have been stopped in about 10 yards at the rate of speed it was running. The homicide occurred about half past 6 o'clock in the month of December. At the time and prior to striking plaintiff's husband the bell on the engine was ringing. Another witness testified that he had frequently used the railroad track through the yard in walking to and from Americus, and had seen other people "going backwards and forwards there sometime." Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence she was nonsuited, and the bill of exceptions complains of the grant of the nonsuit.

The plaintiff's husband was walking down the track of the railway company at the time he was killed by the running of the cars. The proof that one pedestrian may have frequently, and others occasionally, used the railroad track in the company's yards as a footpath, is insufficient to establish an implied license to pedestrians to use the track. See Grady v. Railroad Co., 112 Ga. 668, 37 S. E. 861. The plaintiff's husband at the time of his death was therefore a trespasser. The general rule is that "as to a trespasser walking upon the track of a railroad the duty of observing ordinary care and diligence for his protection does not devolve upon the company's servants in charge of a train until his presence upon the track becomes known to them." Hambright v. Railroad Co., 112 Ga. 36, 37 S. E. 99. When the plaintiff proved that the switchman knew her husband was upon the track, then the burden was on the railway company to show that the death could not have been averted by the exercise of proper care. The company owed the deceased no duty except not to hurt him willfully or negligently after his presence became known to its servants in the operation of the locomotive. Grady v. Railroad Co., supra. But when the company was charged with knowledge of the presence of a trespasser on its track it immediately owed the trespasser the duty of exercising ordinary care and diligence to prevent any injury to him. The signal of the switchman was not heeded. The conclusion of the switchman was that the signal could not have been observed by the engineer because of his location on the footboard of the tender. Let this be granted. The record does not disclose whether or not there was a fireman on the engine. If there was a fireman, and he had been on his box, he probably would have observed the signal; and, if he did observe it, his duty would have been to have acted with reference thereto. Assuming there was a fireman, the evidence is silent as to his position, or his knowledge of the signal. He may have been engaged in other duties which would have prevented him from seeing the signal, but this did not appear from the evidence. If there was no fireman, then it would become a question as to whether the switchman exercised due care in placing himself on the footboard of the engine so that his signals could not be seen by the engineer. The plaintiff's evidence establishing a duty on the part of the railroad's servants to exercise ordinary diligence in avoiding any injury to the person of the plaintiff's husband, and the factum of the injury by the operation of the engine, was sufficient to raise the presumption of negligence against the company. Civ. Code 1895, § 2321. Of course, the defendant might show that due care was exercised so as to rebut the presumption, but until that was done the plaintiff's right to recover existed. The court should have submitted the case to the jury for them to determine whether the defendant's servants exercised ordinary care after the presence of the deceased on the track became known to its servants, or whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the killing of the plaintiff's husband was wanton or willful.

(121 Ga. 817)

BUTLER et al. v. TIFTON, T. & G. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

RAILROADS — LOCATION OF STATION — SPUR TRACK — CONTRACT TO BUILD — DISMISSAL OF SUIT — RES JUDICATA.

1. The right of a railroad company to contract for the location and maintenance of stations may be restricted by the fact that the public has an interest in the times and places for stoppage of trains to receive and discharge freight and passengers.

2. There is no such restriction on the company's power to contract to build a spur track from its main line to a sawmill or other private enterprise.

3. The validity of such contract was recognized in Tifton Co. v. Bedgood & Co., 43 S. E. 257, 116 Ga. 949, 951, and it was not error to overrule the demurrer.

4. Instead of reducing an agreement to writing, the parties, by reference, may adopt the terms of a contract already in writing.

5. A party must be held bound by a ruling which he invoked, and by a judgment in his favor which he procured.

6. If, in a pending suit, the plaintiff offers an amendment, and the defendant demurs thereto on the ground that "it sets up a new and distinct cause of action," and such demurrer is sustained, the judgment dismissing such suit will not bar the plaintiff from suing on the cause of action set out in the amendment offered, but disallowed for the reason that it was a new and distinct cause of action.

7. Such ruling on the demurrer further shows that the merits of the matter set out in the amendment were not and could not have been determined in the first suit.

8. It was error to sustain the plea of res adjudicata.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. S. Humphreys, Judge.

Action by J. L. Butler and others against the Tifton, Thomasville & Gulf Railway Company. From a judgment both parties bring error. Reversed.

Many of the facts involved in the present case are stated in 116 Ga. 945, 43 S. E. 257. While the record is voluminous, the following is a synopsis of what is material to an understanding of the points involved in the decision: The Union Lumber Company owned 1,617 acres of land in Colquitt county, the timber privileges on which it sold to Huber & Stokes. On October 24, 1899, this firm entered into a contract with the Tifton, Thomasville & Gulf Railway Company, by which, in consideration that they would locate their sawmill on the premises, and ship all the lumber cut from this land over the railway company's line, the latter agreed to build a side track to the sawmill, and to haul the timber therefrom at a rate as low as that charged other shippers. On November 8, 1899, Huber & Stokes sold the timber and assigned this contract to Bedgood & Co. The latter, on April 21, 1902, brought an action against the railway company for damages for breach of the contract to build the side track. The company's demurrer to this petition was sustained by this court (116 Ga. 945, 43 S. E. 257) on the ground that the contract sued on was not assignable. On the return of the remittitur Bedgood & Co. offered an amendment to the petition setting up that a competitor of the defendant had a line of road near the timber described; that it was to the advantage of the defendant to enter into an agreement by which it would secure the freight from the sawmill, instead of allowing it to go over the other road; that for this reason the contract in reference to the side track was made; that prior to the purchase by Bedgood & Co. of the timber from Huber & Stokes, and before the payment of any purchase money therefor, Bedgood & Co. informed the officers of the railway company that they were negotiating to acquire the timber, and desired to know if the railway company would carry out the contract and put in the spur track if the plaintiffs should purchase the timber and have transferred to them the contract aforesaid; that the railway officials notified Bedgood & Co. that the railway company would carry out the contract with plaintiffs should plaintiffs purchase, and did then and there assent to the transfer of said contract to plaintiffs, and on this assent being given plaintiffs parted with $7,550 in the acquisition of the timber rights aforesaid; that, in addition to the above-mentioned consideration, plaintiffs agreed, as a part of the trade, to assume and carry out the obligations of Huber & Stokes under the contract aforesaid; that plaintiffs were financially responsible, and the railway company agreed for the contract to be transferred to plaintiffs, and agreed and fully bound itself to carry out for plaintiffs all the terms of the contract as they had bound themselves to do with Huber & Stokes, and never denied its obligation until about the time of the filing of this suit; that about March 1, 1900, the railway company insisted under the contract upon plaintiffs giving to it the output of the mill, and again stated to plaintiffs that, if plaintiffs would haul the cut of the mill to the main line, then the railway company would hasten the construction of the spur track, and put it in at once, and to this end had their engineer mark out the line; that, though plaintiffs were not bound to ship said lumber over defendant's line until the completion of the spur track, yet, relying on the obligation aforesaid, they did, as requested by the railway company, ship the output of their mill over the road. To this amendment the defendant demurred upon several grounds; among others, that the amendment sought to add a new and distinct cause of action. After argument it was ordered and adjudged "that the amendment offered by plaintiffs to said declaration be disallowed on the ground that the same sets up a new and distinct cause of action." Thereupon, on July 21, 1903, Bedgood & Co. brought a new suit, containing, among other things, all the allegations set forth in the foregoing amendment, and alleging the items of damage, the extra expense of hauling lumber to the main line, aggregating $6,511.91. To this second suit the railway company filed both a demurrer and a plea of res adjudicata. The demurrer was both general and special, and attacked the petition on many grounds; among others, that the contract was vague and indefinite, not assignable, without consideration, void under the statute of frauds, involved the title to land, of which the city court had no jurisdiction, contrary to public policy, being an undertaking by a quasi public corporation to perform an unlimited amount of work during an unlimited time. There were also many other grounds of special demurrer, which it is unnecessary to state in detail. The court overruled the demurrer, to which judgment the railway company, by cross-bill, excepted. The court sustained the plea of res adjudicata, to which was attached as an exhibit the original suit with the amendment and the judgment disallowing the amendment on the ground that it set up a new cause of action. To this judgment sustaining the plea of res adjudicata the plaintiffs excepted.

Shipp & Kline, for Butler and others. J. L. Sweat, J. H. Merrill, and J. A. Wilkes, for railway company.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1-3. The public has an interest in the location of depots and the time and place at which trains must stop for the reception of freight and passengers. A railroad company's power to contract in reference thereto is therefore not unrestricted, but public policy must be considered in determining the legality of such agreements. See the cases cited in 7 Rap. & Max, Rd. Dig. 201-204. But such limitation on its power to contract does not apply to a case where the railroad company covenants to build a spur track from its main line to a sawmill or other private enterprise. The interest of the public cannot in any way be seriously affected by the construction and maintenance of such track. Austin v. Augusta Co., 108 Ga. 692, 693, 84 S. E. 852, 47 L. R. A. 755; Graham

v. R. Co., 120 Ga. 757, 49 S. E. 75 (3). Indeed, the validity of such contract was recognized in Tifton Ry. Co. v. Bedgood, 116 Ga. 949, 951, 43 S. E. 257. The allegations of the petition then under review were so nearly identical with those in the present case that it is unnecessary further to consider the question raised by the demurrer, which the court properly overruled.

4-6. In the case last cited this court held that, while the contract bound the railroad company to build a spur track for Huber & Stokes, it could not be assigned to Bedgood & Co., so as to give the latter a right of action for its breach. On the return of the remittitur the plaintiffs offered to amend the petition by alleging that they not only had an assignment from Huber & Stokes, but that the railway company assented to the assignment, and agreed that, if Bedgood & Co. would buy the land, build the mill, and ship the lumber over its lines, it would build the spur track. In other words, the amendment averred that there was an independent agreement between Bedgood & Co. and the railway company in reference to the building of the spur track. Instead of reducing this agreement to writing, however, the parties adopted terms which were already in writing, and by reference or otherwise parties can adopt the terms of a contract between others. American Co. v. Continental Co., 188 U. S. 107, 23 Sup. Ct. 285, 47 L. Ed. 404; International Co. v. Hardy, 118 Ga. 512, 45 S. E. 311. Compare Town of Douglasville v. Johns, 62 Ga. 427 (3). The amendment therefore set out a cause of action. But the court held that it "set up a new and distinct cause of action"; that the original suit was on a contract between Huber & Stokes and the railway company, while the amendment sought to recover for an entirely different cause of action arising out of a contract between different parties. Yielding to that decision, Bedgood & Co. thereupon brought the present action, making therein most of the allegations contained in the amendment which had been thus disallowed by the court. To this the railway company filed a plea of res adjudicata, and upon the production of the record in the former suit the plea was sustained.

It is evident that Bedgood & Co. have not had a hearing on the merits, and that the matters set up in the present suit were not passed on in the former. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5095, 3744. It is further evident that the facts set out in the present case could not "have been put in issue in the cause where the judgment was rendered." Civ. Code 1895, § 3742. For when Bedgood & Co. endeavored to secure a hearing on the new matter, they were prevented from so doing by the order sustaining the company's demurrer. Having secured a judgment sustaining their position, the railway company must be held bound by the ruling which it invoked, and by the judgment in its favor which it secured.

Brown v. State, 109 Ga. 571, 34 S. E. 1031; Papworth v. City, 111 Ga. 55, 36 S. E. 311; Neal Co. v. Chastain, 121 Ga. —, 49 S. E. 618. The very terms of the record offered in support of the plea of res adjudicata show that "the new cause" could not be barred by a judgment in an "old" and "different cause," one so different that the new could not be added to it by way of amendment. This is not a second suit for the same cause of action, but a new suit for a distinct cause of action. That it is new and distinct from that formerly brought appears from the record attached to the plea. The case should not have been dismissed.

HEWIN et al. v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—BUSINESS TAX—CLASSIFICATION—TRADING STAMPS—INJUNCTION—ILLEGAL TAX—PARTIES.

1. An agreement between a number of merchants and a corporation provided that the latter should print the names of the former in its subscribers' directory, and circulate a number of copies of the book in a named city, and that the merchants should purchase of the corporation a number of so-called trading stamps, to be delivered to customers with their purchases (and not to be otherwise disposed of), and by them preserved and pasted in the books furnished by the corporation until a certain number had been secured, when they should be presented to the corporation in exchange for the customers' choice of certain articles kept in stock by the corporation.

Held: (1) That the furnishing of the trading stamps by a merchant to his customers did not constitute a business separate and distinct from that of selling merchandise, but was merely an instrumentality in or an incident to that business, being in its nature incapable of such separate existence as to constitute of itself a business in either a commercial or a legal sense. (2) That authority in a municipal charter "to make just and proper classification of business for taxation," and "to classify business, and arrange the various business, trades, and professions carried on in said city into such classes of subjects for taxation as may be just and proper," did not authorize the passage of an ordinance separating from the business of selling merchandise the incident of furnishing trading stamps for the purpose of increasing the sale of merchandise, and classifying the furnishing of such stamps as a separate business, subject to taxation. (3) That whether the furnishing of the trading stamps be treated as a gift, or as a part of the contract of sale of the merchandise, which is delivered at the time the stamps are furnished, the furnishing of the stamps does not constitute a business subject to be taxed under charter authority to classify and tax business. (4) That the word "business," in a commercial or legal sense, means something done or carried on for a livelihood, profit, or the like. (5) That, even if the General Assembly is authorized to impose a tax upon one who gives away his property, the giving away of property is not a business, within the meaning of a charter provision authorizing the taxation of business.

2. An application for an injunction, filed jointly by the trading stamp company and one or more merchants who are its customers, seeking to enjoin the collection of a tax imposed under an ordinance of the character above referred to, is not bad for misjoinder of parties.

3. Persons against whom an unlawful exaction in the form of a tax is sought to be made may unite in an application for an injunction to restrain the collection of the tax, and are not compelled to pay the same, and bring separate suits against the tax officer for damages. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by S. W. Hewin and the Atlanta Trading Stamp Company against the city of Atlanta. W. D. Payne and the Atlanta Milling Company filed interventions. From an order denying an injunction, Hewin, Payne, and the Atlanta Trading Stamp Company bring error. Reversed.

S. W. Hewin and the Atlanta Trading Stamp Company, a corporation, filed a petition against the city of Atlanta, in which an injunction was prayed to restrain the city from enforcing an ordinance under which a business tax had been levied upon all persons furnishing "trading stamps to their customers." W. D. Payne filed an intervention, and was duly made a party. The Atlanta Milling Company, a corporation, also filed an intervention, and was made a party, but its name was subsequently stricken from the case. The defendant filed both a demurrer and an answer. At the hearing the judge refused the injunction prayed for, and Hewin, Payne, and the Atlanta Trading Stamp Company excepted.

The trading stamp company entered into an agreement with its coplaintiffs and other merchants in the city of Atlanta, the material parts of which are as follows: The trading stamp company agrees "to print in the directory of their subscribers' book the name, business and address of the party of the second part. To deliver to the people of — said books, soliciting the trade of such persons and explaining to them how to use the same. To advertise, and in every way to use their best endeavor to promote the business interest and trade of the party of the second part." The merchant agrees: "(1) To receive of the party of the first part a sufficient number of trading stamps to be supplied as discounts for cash trade to all persons who may call for them, and the party of the second part also agrees to give out such stamps as follows: One stamp to be given for each and every ten cents represented in a purchase; ten stamps for one dollar, etc. Said party of the second part also agrees not to sell said stamps or dispose of them in any other way. (2) To pay the party of the first part 50 cents per hundred for all stamps disposed of; and to make weekly settlements with the party of the first part for each full page of stamps used. (3) To co-operate in every way possible with the party of the first part in promoting the best interests of all merchants named in said subscribers' book." The nature of the trading stamp business, and the elements which compose it, are fully set forth in the record, and it appears that three distinct factors co-operate to produce the business: (1) The trading stamp company; (2) the retail merchant; and (3) the stamp collector.

The stamp company maintains a store in which is kept a large number of articles commonly used as necessities and adornments for the house and kitchen. These articles are matters of general commerce. Their sale is not prohibited by the state, nor do they affect the public health or safety. They are not sold by the stamp company. The stamp company issues small books, which contain a directory of the merchants who give its stamps, with the address of the merchant and the character of his stock. These books contain a sufficient number of blank pages in which are pasted the stamps as collected by the retail purchaser. A book is completed when it contains 990 of the stamps. Canvassers are sent out into the city by the stamp company, who invite the proposed retail purchaser to visit the store and inspect the stock of goods carried by the company. When he does this, it is explained to him that, by paying cash for his purchases from any of the merchants whose names are in the book, he will be given a stamp for each 10 cents, 10 stamps for $1, and so on. He is informed that in order to obtain the stamps he will pay no more for the article actually purchased than he would pay if he purchased either on credit, or the same article from a merchant who did not give the stamp; the cash purchase, with a request for the stamp, does not increase the price paid for the article which is the subject-matter of the sale. He is told to paste his stamps in the book given him, and when he has accumulated 990 stamps he will then be free to select any article he may desire in the store of the company. The company explains to the merchant that it will sell him the pad of stamps for $5; that by using the stamps he will increase his cash trade; his business will be advertised by the stamp company through its canvassers, by its books, and by it in the newspapers. He contracts to give the stamps at the ratio of one for each 10 cents only upon cash purchases. He stipulates that he will not give the stamps for credit purchases, nor will he sell the stamp by itself.

Briefly stated, the company sells to the merchant a pad of stamps, and, in return, advertises his business. The merchant gives the stamps to his customers for cash purchases. The customer, when he obtains a book, presents it to the trading stamp company, and takes away the article selected by him. There are advantages derived by each of the three parties to this transaction. The pad of stamps cost the company but little for the printing. They are upon common paper, with mucilage applied to the back. From a mere sale of the stamp it derives a large gross profit. Its expenses consist of taxes, license fee, clerk hire, canvassers, salaries, insurance, and the price paid for the articles with which it redeems the book. The merchant, by getting cash, is enabled to discount his own bills by the payment of cash. He is saved the losses which are incident to a credit business, such as failure, expense of litigation incurred in the attempt to collect accounts, bookkeeper's hire, stationery, and so on. But the chief benefit derived by the merchant is the novel way in which his business is advertised. In place of paying a high price for an advertisement in the newspaper, which is read by but a few of the total subscribers, and followed up by a still less number, he pays, by using the trading stamps, only for an advertisement which actually produces a customer with cash. It is a system of advertising which is claimed to involve no waste, and to be direct, effective, and immediate in producing material results. The consumer pays no more for the article purchased when the stamp accompanies it than he does by purchasing the article either for credit, or from a merchant who does not give the stamp. By paying cash he avoids, to a large extent, the evils which are incident to credit purchases. By merely preserving the stamps until his book is completed, he ultimately obtains an article of considerable value. When the cost of conducting the business is deducted, the trading stamp company realizes whatever profit is derived from the sale of the stamps to the merchant. The business is one into which the element of chance does not enter in any of its various steps. The price paid by the merchant to the company is uniform. It is $5 for a book of stamps. The stamps are all alike. None of them possess any inherent value. One is the exact equivalent in every respect of all the others. No chance is injected between the merchant and the collector. The merchant is required to give at the ratio of one stamp for every 10 cents. One hundred dollars spent at separate times in dime purchases will produce exactly the same number as $100 spent in one purchase. No chance appears in the transaction between the collector and the company. When the book is produced and marked "Canceled," the one producing it wanders at will throughout the store of the company, and, when he has determined which article he will take, it is pointed out by him, his address taken, and the article delivered. The article desired by the purchaser is not selected by any turn of dice or cards. His right to any article which he may desire is determined alone by the physical fact of producing a book containing 990 stamps.

The Atlanta Trading Stamp Company opened its store in Atlanta, and a number of merchants bought stamps, and were using the same in their business according to the method outlined in the foregoing summary. In March, 1904, the mayor and general council of Atlanta adopted an ordinance, those portions of which are material to the present case being as follows:

"Section 1. Be it ordained by the mayor and general council that any person, firm or corporation who furnish trading stamps, coupons, gift schemes, rebate checks or punch cards or similar stamps or cards, as a part of or premium upon the sales of goods, wares or merchandise, shall pay an annual license therefor of one hundred ($100) dollars, no license to be issued for less than the sum named for one year.

"Sec. 2. Be it further ordained that the furnishing of the stamps, coupons, etc., named in section one (1) of this ordinance is hereby classified as a separate business, and the above license is fixed thereon for the furnishing of said articles, alone or in connection with another business and provided further that this ordinance shall not be enforced until on and after July 1, 1904."

This ordinance was attacked in the petition upon numerous grounds, and the bill of exceptions assigns error upon the refusal of the judge to grant an injunction upon each of the grounds upon which the ordinance is attacked. The assignments of error which are referred to in the opinion are as follows:

"Because the mere gift of the stamp was not a business, trade, calling, avocation, or profession, and could not be classified as such by the city of Atlanta, nor could said city, under its charter, require the license in question, or any other license, for the furnishing of such stamps by the merchant."

"Because the furnishing of stamps by the merchant was a mere incident or method of conducting the business, and no power was conferred upon the city of Atlanta to require a license for the incidents of a business, or the methods or means by which it was carried on."

"Because, under the charter of said city, the power of the city to require a license for a business which paid an ad valorem tax was limited to $50."

"Because the attempted classification by said ordinance was purely arbitrary and fanciful, and neither just nor proper."

Rosser & Brandon and John L. Hopkins & Sons, for plaintiffs in error. J. L. Mayson and W. P. Hill, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The legality of the trading stamp business has been the subject of numerous decisions. It has been held in a number of cases that there is nothing in the business which subjects it to the control of the state or its subordinate public corporations under the police power. While the question has never been before this court, rulings in other states seem with practical, even if not entire, unanimity to concur in the conclusion not only that the business is legitimate, but that the right to engage in it without undue interference from states and municipalities is guarantied by the Constitution of the United States to the same extent, and subject only to the same restrictions, that can be placed around a person engaged in any lawful business not within the range of the police power. Among the numerous cases that might be cited on this question, we call attention to the following: City of Winston v. Beeson (N. C.) 47 S. E. 457, 65 L. R. A. 167; State v. Dodge (Vt.) 56 Atl. 983; State v. Ramseyer (N. H.) 53 Atl. 958; State v. Shugart (Ala.) 35 South. 28; Long v. State (Md.) 22 Atl. 4, 12 L. R. A. 425, 28 Am. St. Rep. 268; Com. v. Sisson (Mass.) 60 N. E. 385; People v. Gillson (N. Y.) 17 N. E. 343, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465; Young v. Com. (Va.) 45 S. E. 327. See, also, 57 Cent. Law J. 421. But the legality of the trading stamp business is not involved in this case. The city of Atlanta has not proceeded under the police power. It has by its ordinance treated the furnishing of stamps by merchants as a business, and attempted to tax it as such; the ordinance attempting to place it as a business upon exactly the same footing with other classes of business not within the range of legislation under the police power delegated to the city. While the tax levied is referred to in the ordinance as a license, the ordinance, taken as a whole, shows that it is not to be treated as a license, in the strict sense of that term, but simply as a business tax imposed upon the merchants, just as similar taxes are imposed upon others engaged in pursuits and avocations which are not regulated by the city under its police power.

The city of Atlanta has authority under its charter to impose a tax upon any person carrying on "any trade, business, calling, or avocation, or profession" within the city, not to exceed $200 in any case, and not exceeding $50 where the person also pays an ad valorem tax on merchandise or materials. It has also power "to classify business, and arrange the various business, trades, and professions carried on in said city into such classes of subjects for taxation as may be just and proper," and also "to make a just and proper classification of business for taxation." See Anderson's Code of Atlanta (1899) §§ 64, 65, 250. The ordinance treats the furnishing of trading stamps by a seller of merchandise to his customers as a business, and taxes it as such. It is therefore unnecessary to determine whether one thus engaged in furnishing trading stamps is carrying on a "trade, calling, or avocation, or profession"; the authorities seeking to proceed against the merchants under their power to tax business, and not having sought to classify the furnishing of stamps under any of the other occupations referred to. The questions to be determined, as the case is now presented, are whether the retail merchant, who furnishes trading stamps to his customers under a contract with the trading stamp company, as set forth in the statement of facts, is engaged in a business, within the meaning of the charter of the city authorizing a tax to be imposed upon persons engaged in business, and whether the business is of such a character that it can be disconnected and isolated from the other business of the retail merchant in such a way as to make the retail merchant a member of two classes for the purposes of taxation; that is, a merchant and a furnisher of trading stamps. It is conceded that the trading stamp company is engaged in a business, and the record discloses that it has been taxed, and has paid the tax imposed upon it. But is a merchant who simply furnishes the stamps purchased by him from the trading stamp company, and delivers them according to the contract into which he has entered (that is, to cash customers), in so doing, engaged in a business at all; and, if so, is that business one actually separate and distinct, and legally severable from his business as a merchant, within the meaning of the charter of Atlanta, conferring power and authority to classify businesses for taxation? If the delivery of the trading stamps to a cash customer is purely voluntary as between the merchant and his customer, the transaction being without consideration—a mere gift—then we suppose no one would contend that, in delivering the stamps under such circumstances, the merchant was engaged in a business at all. While the word "business," as used colloquially, carries with it a very broad meaning, still, as used in its legal and commercial sense, it applies only to that in which one engages for the purpose of livelihood, profit, or the like. This idea of business runs through all of the definitions contained in the dictionaries. This interpretation of the word "business" was recognized in the case of Brush Electric Light Company v. Wells, 110 Ga. 198, 35 S. E. 365. If the furnishing of stamps by a retail merchant to his customers is therefore a mere gift, it cannot be a business, within the ordinary and usual meaning of that term as used in the commercial world. Laws and ordinances imposing taxes are strictly construed, and authority to tax a business will not, in such legislation, be construed to authorize the taxing of one engaged in transactions from which he cannot possibly derive any profit, which cannot be the means of a livelihood, and which cannot be carried on without inevitable loss; persons so engaged not being engaged in any business, within the ordinary meaning of that term, nor within the meaning in which it must have been used in laws authorizing or imposing taxes. But it is said that the furnishing of the trading stamps is not a gift; that, when the merchant holds out to the world that he will furnish trading stamps to cash customers, such purchasers are entitled to demand the delivery of the stamps, and therefore a cash transaction involves both a sale of the article of merchandise as well as of the stamp; that, while the stamp has no intrinsic value, it is a symbol of that which has value; that the title to the article finally delivered by the stamp company to the stamp collector is really sold by the merchant when the stamp is delivered; and that the merchant would then be practically engaged in selling every character of article which it is possible for the stamp collector to obtain from the stamp company upon the presentation of the stampbook. If the stamp is sold with the article with which it is delivered, of course the title to the stamp passes immediately upon delivery, and this would also be true if the furnishing of the stamp were a mere gift. The cash purchaser owns the stamp from the time it is delivered into his possession. But can it be properly said that the title to that which is finally purchased with the stamps passes to the customer of the retail merchant at the time the stamp is delivered? Suppose 100 stamps represent 100 different transactions with 100 different merchants, none of whom are engaged in the furniture business, and upon presentation of the stamps to the stamp company a chair is delivered. Could it be contended that each of these 100 merchants is subject to classification as a dealer in furniture on account of the delivery of this chair; and, if not, would they all be taxable as joint sellers of some character? We do not think the contention is sound that the title to the article finally selected by the stamp collector passes at the time of the delivery of the stamp, though the title to the stamp does pass, and whatever that is worth—whatever its purchasing power—is the property of the stamp collector. The stamp simply represents the contract of the stamp company that, when a given number are presented, the holder of the stamps can select an article from the stock of the company in exchange for the stamps. The stamps, in certain quantities, have a purchasing power with the trading stamp company, and their value is simply the result of this purchasing power; and, if the merchant is to be treated as the seller of the stamps at all, he simply sells the right to demand of the stamp company what it has agreed to furnish, and does not sell the article which the trading stamp company actually furnishes to the collector when the book is delivered. The transaction does not differ in essential particulars from one where a merchant, in consideration of a $100 purchase, returns to the purchaser $5 in gold. The title to the $5 vests in the purchaser upon delivery, with the right to use it to purchase any article that it will buy; but certainly the title to the article subsequently purchased was never in the merchant, and cannot pass with the delivery to the customer of the $5. The result would be the same if, instead of giving $5, the merchant gave the purchaser an order on another merchant for an article worth $5. And this would be the same as if the purchaser were given 50 different orders at different times. We do not think that, even treating the furnishing of the trading stamps as a sale, it is a sale of the article finally procured from the stamp company, so as to make the merchant furnishing the stamp one engaged in the business of selling that particular article, whatever it may be. If the transaction partakes of the nature of a sale at all, it is simply a sale of the stamp.

Treating the furnishing of the trading stamps as a sale and a sale of the trading stamps, is it a business which can be carried on for a livelihood, profit, or the like, when disconnected from every other business? When coupled with another business, it may result in profit flowing to the owner of that business. Standing alone, it cannot be made the subject of profit, even if it can be carried on at all. Under the contract between the stamp company and the merchant, and under the plan, scheme, or device—whatever it may be properly characterized—such a thing as a person engaged in the furnishing of trading stamps, and doing nothing else, does not come within the remotest range of the contract, or the scheme therein provided for. Attached to a business, the furnishing of stamps thrives, and profits result. Detached from the business, it instantly dies; and it dies, not by withering gradually away, but its death is instantaneous. The business of the merchant can live without the sale of trading stamps, but the furnishing of trading stamps cannot live unless there is a business to which it can fasten, and from which it can draw its life blood. What has been said is applicable, no matter what the business to which the furnishing of trading stamps is attached—whether it be that of a merchant, or of one who follows a trade or profession.

If an occupation is so made up as to include two or more separate and distinct classes of business, each of which could be maintained as a separate business—that is, a business in the sense in which that term is above used—then, under the power to classify subjects of business for taxation, the municipal authorities might be empowered to impose a separate tax upon each class of business embraced within this occupation. The department store is a familiar illustration of different classes of business going to make up one occupation. So it is with the hotel keeper, who, in addition to furnishing lodging and meals, sells cigars, liquors, newspapers, operates a barber shop, etc. So where a merchant undertakes himself to deliver his goods to his customers, and operates in connection therewith the business of delivering goods by wagon. See Johnson v. Macon, 114 Ga. 426, 40 S. E. 322 (2). In Macon Sash Co. v. Macon, 96 Ga. 23, 23 S. E. 120, a tax was imposed upon a wagon which was used by one engaged in the business of contracting and selling builders' supplies; and it was held that the owner of the wagon was liable to the tax, notwithstanding he also paid a tax imposed upon him as a contractor or builder. In Mayor of Savannah

v. Dehoney, 55 Ga. 33, it was held that where the city of Savannah had imposed a tax upon the owners or lessees of public stables, and in the same ordinance there was a provision imposing a tax upon every person engaged in the business of transporting passengers by omnibuses, it was a question of fact whether the use of omnibuses was an incident to the business of one who was the owner of a public stable, and, if so, such owner would not be liable to a second tax because he used an omnibus in connection with the business in which he had been taxed. See, also, Mayor of Savannah v. Feeley, 66 Ga. 34. But where the business is made up of different elements, and there is only one business, a municipal corporation, under a power to classify businesses, cannot separate this business into its different elements, and call that a business, for taxation which from its nature is dependent for its existence not upon anything inherent in itself, but upon its connection with the business which is itself subject to taxation. In other words, the power of a municipal corporation to tax mere incidents of business is not conferred by a charter which authorizes it to tax a business. In Rogers v. Sandersville, 120 Ga. 192, 47 S. E. 557, it was held that, where one engaged in the sale of soda posted bills advertising the sale of his goods, he was not engaged in business as a billposter, but, was simply engaged in performing what was an incident to his business as a seller of soda, and was not liable to a tax under an ordinance imposing a tax upon all persons engaged in the business of a billposter. In the opinion Mr. Justice Lamar used the following language, which is appropriate to the present case: "What he did was for the purpose of making or increasing sales, and the various steps leading to that end were part and parcel of the business of selling." It may be that the General Assembly would have authority to divide an occupation into its various elements, and to tax each, and also tax every incident of every business; but certain it is that a municipal corporation which is simply given the right to tax a business and classify business has not had conferred upon it authority either to divide a business into its elements for the taxation of each, or to tax that which is merely an incident of a business, and which could not alone, from its very nature, constitute a separate and distinct business.

In the cases above cited the furnishing of trading stamps by a merchant to his customers is sometimes referred to as a business, but a careful reading of the opinions will show that this term is used by the writers in its broad and colloquial sense, and that no question similar to the one now before us was under consideration in any of the cases. There are a few cases where the question of taxing the use of trading stamps by merchants has been the subject of decision. In Humes v. Ft. Smith (C. C.) 93 Fed. 857, an ordinance which had the effect to impose a tax upon the use of trading stamps by merchants was upheld; but this tax was levied under an act of the Legislature of Arkansas authorizing cities of certain classes to license, tax, and regulate gift enterprises, and the act defined the term "gift enterprises" so as to include the use of trading stamps by merchants. This was also true of Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 56 Alb. Law J. 488, where the tax was imposed upon gift enterprises under an act of Congress which defined this expression in such a way as to include the use of trading stamps by merchants. In Fleetwood v. Read (Wash.) 58 Pac. 665, 47 L. R. A. 205, the Supreme Court of Washington held that, under an act which authorized a city to grant licenses for any "lawful purpose," a license tax for the purpose of revenue could be imposed upon merchants who used trading stamps. The question as to whether the furnishing of trading stamps by merchants was in itself a business, so as to be thus classified for the purposes of taxation, was not involved in that case. In Ex parte McKenna, 126 Cal. 429, 58 Pac. 916, the Supreme Court of California held that a tax on merchants using trading stamps could not be justified as a tax on a lottery, since a lottery was unlawful and could not be licensed, and that the mere use by one merchant of trading stamps, when other merchants did not engage in their use, was not a sufficient reason for passing an ordinance imposing a tax burdensome in amount, if not prohibitory, on all merchants issuing trading stamps, and that such an ordinance was discriminating in its nature, unreasonable, and void, as in restraint of trade. Mr. McQuillin, in his treatise on Municipal Ordinances (page 659), in enumerating the cases in which a tax upon trades, occupations, avocations, etc., had been sustained, mentions gift enterprises, and in a note says the term "gift enterprise" includes trading stamps and similar schemes; the authorities cited by him to sustain this being the Humes and Fleetwood Cases, supra; and these cases, as has been shown, dealt with legislative acts defining gift enterprises. In its ultimate analysis, the use of trading stamps by a merchant is simply a unique and attractive form of advertising, resorted to for the purpose of increasing trade. In the strict commercial sense of the term "business," it is not a business at all. It is simply a mode or manner of business—an instrumentality or incident of a business. When resorted to for the purpose of increasing the business to which it is annexed, it occupies the same relation to that business as newspaper advertising, circulars, dodgers, and the like; and, if the city of Atlanta can classify as a business advertising through the medium of the trading stamp, it can also classify as a business advertising through the journals of the city, or through the medium of a person employed to walk the streets with the sandwich upon which the goods, wares, and merchandise of a merchant are advertised, or the employment of a dwarf who carries upon his shoulder a barrel upon which the wares of a merchant are advertised, and who stops at every street corner and seats himself upon it. These and other methods equally unique have been resorted to, but no one has ever pretended that the merchant, in thus attempting to increase his profits from the sale of his goods, was engaging in a new business, and not simply carrying on the business of selling goods. In the case of Keely v. Atlanta, 69 Ga. 583, in which the provisions of the charter of Atlanta above referred to were under consideration, it was held that these provisions conferred power upon the municipal authorities to divide a general merchandise business into specific classes, such as dry goods, boots and shoes, and the like, and to levy a tax upon each of such classes. There is nothing in that decision which would authorize the taxing of the mere incidents of a business, which in themselves could not exist without the business to which they were annexed. We think that the classification in the ordinance under consideration was unreasonable and arbitrary, and could in no sense be declared just and proper, as the General Assembly has determined must be the case with all classifications for taxation made by the city of Atlanta.

2. It is contended, though, that, even if the judge erred in his conclusion as to the validity of the ordinance, the demurrer was properly sustained, for the reason that there was a misjoinder of parties; that the application for injunction could not properly be made jointly by the trading stamp company and one or more merchants who were its customers. The trading stamp company was not a necessary party, but it seems to us that it was a proper party. While it had paid its tax, and was not affected by the ordinance so far as further taxation upon its business was concerned, the effect of the ordinance was to embarrass and hamper those who dealt with it, and diminish its business, even if it did not have the effect to entirely destroy it. If the city of Atlanta were to impose a business tax upon a merchant, and then impose a tax upon every customer who entered his door, it would be at once apparent that the merchant was vitally and peculiarly interested in the question as to whether his customers should be burdened with this tax. In such a case it would seem that the court would entertain a joint application by the merchant and his customers to restrain the enforcement of the tax attempted to be collected without authority of law upon the customers, when the effect of the collection would be to interfere with the customer by imposing a burden upon his right to buy, and to interfere with the merchant by impairing or destroying his right to sell.

3. It is also contended that injunction was not the remedy; that the parties should have paid the tax under protest, and then have brought suit against the tax officer for damages. If a lawful tax had been levied, and the question was whether the individual came within the description of persons subject to the tax, a question of fact would have been raised, and equity would not interfere, but would remit the party to his action at law. But where there is no law authorizing the collection of the tax, it is no tax, and equity will enjoin the attempt to collect it by any one at the instance of the person who is about to be made the subject of the illegal exaction. Decker v. McGowan, 59 Ga. 805; Vanover v. Davis, 27 Ga. 354. The ordinance was void. There was hence no law authorizing the imposition of the tax. It was no tax; it was nothing; and the one attempting to enforce its collection was a wrongdoer; and those against whom the exaction was sought to be made could properly unite in an application to a court of equity to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance, and would not be driven to their separate actions of trespass against the wrongdoer, who, under the guise of a tax officer, was attempting to collect that for which there was no authority.

COLLINS v. COCHRAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

PARTITION FENCES—AGREEMENT TO MAINTAIN—TRESPASSING ANIMALS—ARBITRATION.

1. Coterminous landowners may by agreement assume an obligation to maintain a partition fence, each agreeing to keep up a designated part; and, if the hogs of one enter the land of the other through a defect negligently left in that part of the fence which the first was bound to repair, he is liable for the damages done by such hogs.

2. The validity of the obligation of the coterminous owners to maintain a sufficient fence against their stock is not affected by the fact that they do not contemplate maintaining, and do not in fact maintain, a fence of such character and height as to constitute a lawful fence, under the statute. By agreement they can take their fence, relatively to the rights of each against the other, from under the operation of the statute.

3. Where in such case the owner of the hogs agreed that the amount of the damages should be submitted to arbitration, and that certain of the hogs should be retained by the party injured as pledge for the payment of the damages assessed, and subsequently the owner of the hogs refused to make a submission to arbitration, the pledgee could recover the reasonable expense in the meantime incurred by him in feeding such hogs.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; I. A. Bush, Judge pro hac.

Action by J. A. Cochran against D. B. B. Collins. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jesse W. Walters and R. J. Bacon, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Sam S. Bennett, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Suit was brought by Cochran against Collins. From the petition and the evidence of the plaintiff, it appeared that the plaintiff and defendant owned and occupied adjoining farms. For more than 20 years there had been between these farms a line fence, which, though not built and maintained in such way as to make it a lawful fence under the statute, was sufficient to keep stock from passing from one farm to the other. The occupants of the farm now owned by plaintiff had kept up the north end of the fence; the occupants of the other farm, the south end. After the plaintiff and defendant had become the owners of the farms, they entered into an agreement to keep up and repair the line fence; the plaintiff undertaking to maintain the north end, and the defendant undertaking to maintain the south end as his predecessors in title had done. The defendant neglected to keep up the south end of the fence, and suffered it to get out of repair, by reason of which a large drove of his hogs broke through into plaintiff's land and destroyed a portion of his crops. The plaintiff drove them out, and gave defendant notice that they had broken through. Still defendant neglected to repair the fence, and his hogs twice again, within the next two days, went upon plaintiff's farm, through the defective south end of the fence, and destroyed a part of plaintiff's crops. The plaintiff impounded some of the hogs, afterward releasing all except a few. These he retained, under an agreement with the defendant, as a pledge, until the amount of the damage could be determined by arbitration. Subsequently defendant refused to submit the matter to arbitration, and plaintiff then brought suit for damages for the breach of the contract as to the maintenance of the fence. He prayed damages for the value of the property destroyed by the defendant's hogs, and also prayed judgment for the cost of feeding the hogs pending the effort to arbitrate. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant moved for a new trial. The motion was overruled by the trial judge, and the movant excepted.

1, 2. Coterminous landowners may by agreement or by prescription assume an obligation to maintain a partition or line fence, each agreeing to keep up a designated part. 12 A. & E. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1047. The validity of this obligation is not affected by the fact that they did not contemplate maintaining and do not in fact maintain a fence of such character as to constitute a lawful fence under our statutes on the subject of fences. Albright v. Bruner, 14 Ill. App. 319. By agreement they can take their fence, relatively to the rights of each against the other, from under the operation of the statute. D'Arcy v. Miller, 86 Ill. 102, 29 Am. Rep. 11. As to the other, each party was bound to maintain his portion of the fence agreed upon, without regard to the character of fence prescribed by the statute. When the defendant violated his contract by failing to repair the portion of the fence which he had agreed to maintain, and his stock, because of such failure to repair, entered through this portion of the fence into the farm of the plaintiff, and damaged the crops, the defendant was liable for the damage so done. The provisions of our Code which relate to fences have no application to the present case. This is not an action for the statutory penalty for failing to maintain a statutory fence, but is a suit for a failure to keep up and maintain a fence under a private contract which, relatively to the parties, took the fence entirely out of the statutory provisions. For this reason the authorities cited by the plaintiff in error have no application. Nor does it matter that the plaintiff below was not shown to have so maintained his portion of the fence as to make it comply with the statutory requirements as to statutory fences. It was enough that he kept up his portion of the fence in accordance with his agreement, and in such manner that stock could not get through it. The defendant made a valid and binding contract with plaintiff. He violated this contract, and, as a direct consequence of this violation, the plaintiff's property was injured. Defendant was therefore liable to respond in damages for the injuries so inflicted.

3. Under the facts in the present case, the plaintiff could recover not only the value of the crops destroyed, but also the cost of feeding those of the hogs which he kept while endeavoring to arrange a submission of the matter to arbitration. The defendant had agreed that the amount of the damage should be submitted to arbitration, and that the plaintiff should in the meantime keep these hogs as a pledge for the payment of the amount assessed as damages. Defendant subsequently refused to make the submission, and should be held liable for the expense of feeding his hogs from the time of his agreement to arbitrate to the time when he finally refused to make the submission.

The motion for new trial complained that the verdict was without evidence to support it, and also that the court erred in charging substantially in accord with what is laid down herein. There was no error in overruling this motion and refusing a new trial.

NEIL v. HARRIS.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CREDITS—REPAIRS.

1. The rulings, instructions, and judgment brought under review by this writ of error were not in accordance with the judgment and direction of this court when the case was formerly here (45 S. E. 387, 117 Ga. 733); the direction then given having been misconstrued by the trial judge.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by Z. H. Neil against W. H. Harris, executor. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

John P. Ross, for plaintiff in error. A. L. Miller and L. L. Brown, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. Mrs. Neil brought an action against W. H. Harris, as executor of the will of her father, H. C. Harris, and Mrs. Walker, in which she prayed, as against the executor, the specific performance of a parol gift of a house and lot in the town of Ft. Valley, which she alleged had been given to her by her father during his lifetime. She further alleged that, in pursuance of the gift, she had gone into possession of the property during her father's life, and had ever since held it adversely, and, upon the faith of the gift, had made improvements thereon of a permanent nature, both during her father's lifetime and since. The executor, in his answer, denied the gift, and that Mrs. Neil had ever been in adverse possession of the property, but alleged that she had never held it otherwise than permissibly. He further set up in his answer that since the death of his testator he, at the request of Mrs. Neil, and believing that the property belonged to the estate of the testator, had paid out for repairs and improvements on the premises in dispute a given sum from the estate of his testator; and he prayed that, if it should be determined that the title to the property was in Mrs. Neil, it should be made subject to the amount which he had so paid, and that a special lien or charge against it for such sum should be declared in his favor, as executor. Mrs. Neil, by way of replication to the answer of the executor, alleged that the executor paid for the repairs and improvements he claimed to have made on the premises out of her distributive share in her father's estate, in accordance with an agreement between her and the executor at the time. Upon the trial, evidence was submitted in behalf of both Mrs. Neil and the executor upon this issue. The trial resulted in a verdict for Mrs. Neil. The executor moved for a new trial on many grounds, in one of which it was alleged that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested by him, that if the jury should find in favor of the gift, and "if it be shown that the executor, acting in the belief that the property in question was the property of the estate, at the request of the plaintiff, or with her knowledge and consent, put improvements on the property to preserve it as an asset of the estate, then [the jury] should direct that the value of such improvements, with seven per cent. interest thereon since they were made, be set up as a charge against the property superior to the claim of the plaintiff." In another ground of the motion it was alleged that the court erred in failing to submit to the jury the question as to the amount expended by the executor for repairs and improvements on the property. A new trial was refused, and the case was brought to this court, and is reported in 117 Ga. 733-749, 45 S. E. 387. This court there held that the request to charge in reference to the executor's right to recover the amount which he, at the request of the plaintiff, had spent in improving the property, if it had stood alone, would have been a proper and pertinent charge; but as it was made in connection with and as a part of another request, which was not legal and appropriate, it was not incumbent upon the court to separate the good from the bad, and therefore there was no error in refusing to give the charge as requested. It is obvious that when this court there held that a charge that if the jury found for the plaintiff, and further found "that the executor, acting in the belief that the property in question was the property of the estate, at the request of the plaintiff, or with her knowledge and consent, put improvements on the property to preserve it as an asset of the estate, then [the jury] should direct that the value of such improvements, with seven per cent. interest thereon since they were made, be set up as a charge against the property superior to the claim of the plaintiff," would have been a proper and pertinent charge, it, of course, held that the right of the executor to recover for money expended in improving property belonging to the plaintiff depended upon the existence of such a state of facts. Clearly, then, the executor could not lawfully reimburse himself out of the plaintiff's property for money expended by him for improvements thereon, if her contention was true—that he had paid for improvements upon property which he recognized to be hers, as an advance payment to her upon her distributive share in the estate of her father. In other words, if the legal effect of the transaction was that she, through him, paid for the repairs and improvements upon the property with money which he merely advanced to her upon and against her distributive share in the estate of her father, he could not recover the money from her. But if she did not thus, through him, pay for the repairs and improvements, but he, at her request, or with her knowledge and consent, paid for them, not for her, but for the estate, believing that the property belonged to the estate, he could reimburse himself, as executor, from the property for the money so paid by him. Such was the intention of this court when it further held, in ruling upon another ground of the motion for a new trial, that, "under the pleadings and the evidence, the court did err in failing to instruct the jury to find the amount which the executor had expended for repairs and improvements on the property, as he was under no obligation to repair or improve the premises for the plaintiff, and, if he did so, he was entitled to be reimbursed for the money so paid out by him." While this language, standing alone, may not have been sufficiently guarded and qualified to clearly express the court's intention and meaning, yet, construed in the light of the issue made by the contentions of the parties in reference to the claim of the executor for money expended for repairs and improvements upon the property, and of the ruling of this court upon the executor's request to charge, its meaning was and is that the trial court, in framing and submitting to the jury questions of fact to be determined by them as a basis for the court's decree, should have instructed the jury to find the amount, if any, which the executor had expended for repairs and improvements upon the property in the belief that it belonged to the estate of his testator. Such, too, was the meaning of the language with which the present writer, speaking for the court, concluded the opinion, and gave direction for the new trial which was granted, when it was said: "As the judgment of the court below is reversed solely upon the ground that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury to find what amount, if any, the executor had, at the request or with the consent of the plaintiff, expended for repairs and improvements upon the premises in dispute, a new trial is ordered upon this question alone, with direction that in all other respects the decree rendered in favor of the plaintiff be allowed to stand; and, if there should be a finding in favor of the executor upon the question indicated, then the said decree shall be so amended as to provide that the land recovered by the plaintiff be subjected to the repayment to the executor of the amount so expended by him, with lawful interest thereon." The sole question here, referred to, upon which the new trial was ordered, was necessarily a question made by the pleadings in the case; and that question, as made by the pleadings, was what amount, if any, the executor had, at the request or with the consent of Mrs. Neil, expended for the estate in repairing and improving the property in controversy, and not what amount he had so spent for her in part payment of her distributive share in the estate of her father. The parties were not at issue as to whether the executor had paid for any repairs and improvements upon the property, but they were at issue upon the question whether he paid for them for the estate, believing the property belonged to it, or paid for them for Mrs. Neil, knowing the property belonged to her, as an advance to her upon her distributive interest in the estate. By her pleadings she admitted that the executor had paid for them, but alleged that "they were made by, said executor upon the distinct agreement that they were to be charged against the distributive share of petitioner," and averred, "upon information furnished her by said executor himself, that they were in fact so charged." When the case came on for another trial in the superior court, the judge construed the direction given by this court as a "mandate" that the single issue to be tried by the jury should be "what amount, if any, the executor, W. H. Harris, had, at the request or with the consent of the plaintiff, expended for repairs and improvements on the premises in dispute," and so instructed the jury. Mrs. Neil offered evidence tending to show that the executor, at the time that he paid for the repairs and improvements made on the premises in dispute, knew that the property belonged to her, and that he, as executor, made such payments out of funds belonging to the estate of his testator as a part of her distributive share in such estate. The executor admitted that the estate had always been solvent. The court rejected this evidence offered by Mrs. Neil. The former decision of this court and the direction therein given were misconstrued by the learned trial judge, and he therefore erred in refusing to permit Mrs. Neil to introduce evidence in support of her contention as to the payments made by the executor for repairs and improvements, and also erred in his instructions to the jury limiting the issue to be tried as above indicated. It certainly was not the intention of this court, in the decision heretofore rendered and the direction then given, to eliminate from the case the issue made by the pleadings as to the payments made by the executor for repairs and improvements on the property in controversy; and, in view of the pleadings then, and what was said in the opinion rendered by this court, we do not think the construction placed by our learned Brother of the superior court upon the direction given by this court was required, though the language used by the writer may not have been as clear and unambiguous as it should have been. In justice to him, however, it may be said that, while he was clearly of the opinion that the construction which he placed upon the language of this court was correct and required, his charge clearly indicates that he thought the instruction given by this court, as he interpreted it, was too limited as to the issue to be submitted to the jury upon the new trial, and that he ruled upon the admission of evidence and instructed the jury as he did simply because he felt that the ruling of this court compelled him to do so.

SHARPE & DRAKE v. HODGES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

ADMINISTRATOR—ACTION BY—EVIDENCE—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. There was no error in admitting in evidence a paper purporting to be letters of administration issued to the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendants that the paper on its face did not show whether it was an original or a copy.

2. A judgment of a court of ordinary appointing an administrator cannot be collaterally attacked by testimony contradicting the recitals contained in the letters of administration issued upon such judgment.

3. Irrespective of the right of the defendants to collaterally attack such judgment on the ground of fraud in its procurement, the court properly instructed the jury to find against the defendants on this issue, as there was no evidence of fraud.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; A. G. Powell, Judge pro hac.

Action by C. S. Hodges, administrator of Alley Huguley, against Sharpe & Drake. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Donalson & Donalson and T. S. Hawes, for plaintiffs in error. Albert H. Russell and B. B. Bower, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. This was a proceeding brought by C. S. Hodges, as administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of Alley Huguley, against Sharpe & Drake, a partnership, to recover possession of a certain tract of land and damages for trespasses already committed thereon, and to obtain an injunction to restrain further trespasses. The defendants denied the title of the plaintiff, and averred that they had a prima facie title to the land, and that the appointment of the plaintiff as administrator amounted to a legal fraud upon them, he having procured the appointment for the sole purpose of recovering possession of the land for his own private benefit and profit, and not for the benefit of any heir or creditor of the estate of Alley Huguley. On the trial the plaintiff showed the loss of the original grant from the state to Alley Huguley, and introduced a certified copy thereof. He also introduced a paper purporting to be letters of administration de bonis non cum testamento annexo granted to him on the estate of Alley Huguley, and proved damages to the freehold committed by the defendants. The defendants offered no evidence, and the jury, following the instructions given them by the court, returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the premises in dispute and $500 damages. The defendants, by direct bill of exceptions, complain of various rulings made by the trial court.

1. Objection was made to the introduction of the paper purporting to be letters of administration on the ground that it did not appear on its face whether it was an original or a copy. There is nothing in the record indicating that the paper was a copy. It was submitted to the presiding judge, and he inspected it, and allowed it in evidence. The paper was regular on its face, and the court evidently assumed it to be the original letters of administration granted by the ordinary. If the paper was not in fact a genuine document, as it purported on its face to be, the defendants were at liberty to so show by evidence. There was no merit in the objection made to its introduction.

2. The appointment of an administrator by the court of ordinary is a judgment by a court of general jurisdiction with respect to this subject-matter. Its judgments import verity, and are not open to attack in any other forum. The letters of administration recited every essential jurisdictional fact, and it is to be presumed, until they are set aside in the proper court, that the recitals are true. The defendants undertook to collaterally assail the letters of administration by showing, on the cross-examination of the plaintiff, that he had not taken oath as administrator before the ordinary who had issued the letters of administration. So far as the record discloses, the defendants were trespassers, and were in no wise interested in the Huguley estate. A person not interested in the assets of an estate has no right to raise any question as to the legality of a judgment, regular on its face, appointing an administrator. Jones v. Smith, 120 Ga. 642, 48 S. E. 134. His only concern is that, if the plaintiff shows such title in the estate as will authorize a recovery against him, he will not be subjected to suits by any other person as heir at law or as administrator of the same estate. If the administrator relies for his authority to bring the suit upon letters of administration issued by the proper court, and regular on their face, a judgment in that suit would protect the defendants against further suit by any other representative of the estate, or any person claiming an interest therein. It follows, therefore, that the court properly overruled the motion of the defendants to rule out the letters of administration on the ground that it appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff that the letters of administration were illegally issued, in that he did not take oath or execute bond before the ordinary who had issued them.

3. It appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff that at one time Hodges & Powell, a firm of which the administrator was a member, claimed title to the land by virtue of a purchase from some person holding adversely to the Huguley estate, and had brought suit against Sharpe & Drake to restrain a trespass upon the identical land now in controversy, which suit was still pending. The plaintiff admitted that his original purpose was to get the land, but he discovered that the title was in the Huguley estate, had opened up correspondence with the heirs of that estate, and as a result of the correspondence had procured the appointment as administrator, and sought to recover the land for the purposes of administration. He denied that the suit was for his private benefit, but stated that in the event of a recovery he would like, if able to make a satisfactory trade with the persons entitled to the land, to buy it from them. He insisted, however, that the suit was for the benefit of the estate. The court held that this testimony was insufficient to show any fraudulent purpose on the part of the plaintiff, and refused to submit the issue of fraud to the jury. As has already been pointed out, the appointment of the administrator and his letters were regular on their face, and were not open to collateral attack, and the evidence could very properly have been excluded by the court. However, no objection seems to have been made to the introduction of this evidence, and the court merely held, as matter of law, that the issue of fraud set up in the defendants' answer was not sustained, and directed the jury not to consider this issue, but to confine their investigation to the question of title and to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff. The court committed no error in so doing. The evidence relied on to establish the plea of fraud, even if that plea could properly be set up in defense to the action, was insufficient to establish the alleged fraudulent purpose of the plaintiff, and a finding in favor of the defendants on that issue would have been unwarranted either by law or the evidence.

MORGAN COUNTY v. WALTON COUNTY
et al.

TAXATION—PERSONAL PROPERTY—SITUS—MANUFACTURING PROPERTY.

1. Under the undisputed evidence, it was proper for the court to direct a verdict. The verdict directed, while in the main correct, was not so in every particular. The judgment will therefore be affirmed, with direction that the court below so amend the verdict and judgment as to make them conform to the principles of law announced in the accompanying opinion.

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; R. B. Russell, Judge.

Action by the county of Morgan against the county of Walton and others. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Judgment on bill of exceptions of the county of Morgan affirmed, with directions. The other appeal affirmed.

E. H. George and Saml. H. Sibley, for Morgan county. Henry D. McDaniel and J. W. Arnold, Sr., for Walton county, et al.

CANDLER, J. This case was before this court at the March term, 1904, and a full statement of the facts out of which it arose will be found in the opinion rendered by Mr. Justice LAMAR in Walton County v. Morgan County, 120 Ga. 548, 48 S. E. 243. See, also, Morgan County v. Walton County, 120 Ga. 1028, 48 S. E. 409. Neither of the parties was satisfied with the result of the last trial, at the conclusion of which a verdict was directed by the court, and both the plaintiff and the defendants filed bills of exceptions. On the return of the remittitur from this court in the case of County of Walton v. County of Morgan, 120 Ga. 548, 48 S. E. 243, the defendants amended their answer, and for the first time claimed that if the part of the tax act of 1902, under the terms of which the tax in question was sought to be recovered from the county of Walton by the county of Morgan, was constitutional, it was not applicable to the machinery and other personal property used in connection with the manufacturing plant. On the former hearing the county of Walton insisted that the act, if constitutional, only applied to the real estate and to the personal property that might be in or connected with the buildings containing the machinery, and not to personal property outside and not connected with said buildings, or the machinery in the buildings. On the return of the remittitur this position was changed, and it offered an amendment claiming that the personal property and the machinery in the mill were not taxable. The following, taken from the amendment offered, clearly states the contention: "The defendant avers that the machinery in the mill buildings * * * is personal property, and not part of the realty, and was returned as such personalty, as provided by law. The various machines, attachments, appliances, implements, and tools for preparing, picking, carding, spinning, warping, dyeing, weaving, finishing, and baling, which comprise the machinery employed to convert cotton into thread and cloth in the High Shoals manufacturing plant, can be removed from the mill buildings without essential injury thereto or to the freehold, or to such machines and other articles in question; not being actually attached to the realty, but movable at pleasure. The return of the company for 1903 embraced, in the item, 'Machinery, $67,000.00,' all the numerous small articles, attachments, appliances, implements, tools, furnishings, and supplies used in running the machinery, not being parts of the machines and not permanently attached thereto, as well as supplies, such as bobbins, spools, shuttles, harness, roving cans, and other findings, but not including such supplies as dyestuffs, oil, sizing, and similar arti-cies which are consumed in the manufacturing process, and which were returned in the item, 'Raw material, $34,000.00'; the value of the articles so embraced in the item, 'Machinery, $67,000.00,' relatively to the whole valuation, being $3,000 to $4,000, or approximately five per cent. of $67,000." On the trial it appeared that some of the machinery located in the main building, which was clearly shown to have been in Morgan county, was not permanently attached to the building, and that all of it could be removed without detriment to the building; that some of the appliances were not only movable in fact, but were actually moved from one place to another in the mill; that the machines not screwed down were worth about $4,000; that the dyestuffs and things actually used in the making of the goods were worth from $4,000 to $6,000; and that, without knowing exactly how much cotton was in the mill on the 15th of March, some of it was actually in the mill, being manufactured. The witness would say that perhaps $20,000 worth of it was actually in the mill, in the process of manufacture. He thought as much as a half of it was at High Shoals the day the return was made. The court held that the item of machinery was all taxable in Morgan county, except the machines not screwed down, and that the personalty used with the machinery, such as roving cans, bobbins, shuttles, etc., worth $4,000, was not liable for taxation in Morgan county; thus reducing the amount returned under the head of machinery from $67,000 to $59,000. The remainder of the property embraced in the return was held to be taxable in Walton county. Morgan county excepted, and assigns error especially upon the ruling depriving it of the tax on $4,000 worth of machinery not screwed down; $4,000 of cans and machinery necessary to the operation of the plant, and actually used therein; $1,000 for horses and wagons used in the operation of the plant; $4,000 to $6,000 worth of dyestuffs actually used in the operation of the plant; the cotton actually in the mill, and used in the operation of the mill, estimated at one-half of the return under the head of "material on hand." Walton county and the High Shoals Manufacturing Company excepted to the refusal of the court to give certain charges requested in writing, and also to the direction of a verdict against them; claiming that there were issues of fact in the case which should have been passed upon by a jury.

In view of the able opinion of Mr. Justice LAMAR, delivered when this case was formerly before this court, it is entirely unnecessary to discuss many of the questions made by the records now before us. Under the undisputed evidence in the case, the court below should have directed a verdict, and, in the main, the verdict directed was proper. Prima facie, personal property is returnable where the owner resides. Under the Constitution, the Legislature may fix a different situs for all personal property. It may likewise make a classification which is not arbitrary, and provide that certain classes of personal property, because of their relation to real estate, and the uses made thereof on the real estate, may be taxed therewith, and treated as a part thereof for purposes of taxation. This is wholly independent of the question as to whether the personal property has lost its character as personalty, and, by becoming a fixture, is to be treated as a part of the realty. Where the classification is general, and based upon the fact that the personalty is used in connection with the operation of the realty, the Legislature, by general law, may, under the Constitution, require such property to be returned along with and as a part of the real estate with which it is thus intimately associated by use. It was therefore ruled when the case was here before that "the General Assembly may provide that fixtures, machinery, or improvements in manufacturing plants, or personal property attached thereto or in actual use therein, shall be returned and taxed with the real estate." In the opinion rendered at that time (Walton County v. Morgan County, 120 Ga. 557, 48 S. E. 247) it was said: "But in view of the provision of the Constitution that taxes must be collected under a general law, [the General Assembly] could not provide that cotton or merchandise, or other personal property dis severed from real estate, belonging to individuals, should be taxed in one county, and the same class of property belonging to a corporation should be taxed in another county. * * * Nor was the question as to where such personalty should be returned in any way affected by the fact that the goods had been manufactured by the company, nor by the use to which the cotton might be put after March 15, 1903. The source and intended uses of the property did not put it into a class by itself, but left it to be returned in the same way as similar property would be returned by other taxpayers." Consequently it was decided that merchandise in the store, cotton, vehicles, and live stock were to be returned in Walton county, where the manufacturing company had its corporate residence. The record in the case now before the court raises the question, however, as to where cotton and raw material in process of manufacture should be returned. Confessedly, it is on the dividing line. It is not machinery; it is not a part of the plant; and yet it was actually in the mill on the day of the assessment of taxes. But clearly it was not taxable in Morgan county as cotton. After it was manufactured it was not taxable in Morgan county as goods. During the transition period it did not, however, come within the letter or the spirit of the rule under which the machinery and the appurtenances could be classified as fixtures physically attached to the land, or appurtenances which were either parts of the machine or necessarily used in connection therewith. The raw material was dis severed from the plant. It was only temporarily in the mill, and was as much taxable in Walton county as though the company had shipped it to a distant state, there to be converted into cloth. We think the court properly held that material, raw, manufactured, and in process of manufacture, was taxable in Walton county; that the live stock and vehicles were likewise there taxable; but that all the machinery, whether attached to the building, or consisting of appliances used in connection with the machinery, were, when properly classified, a part of the plant, and taxable in Morgan county.

In view of the fact that the conclusion reached by the court below was, in the main, correct, and as it is desirable to put an end to this protracted litigation, we affirm the judgment on the bill of exceptions brought by Morgan county, but direct that the court below so amend the verdict directed on the trial as to require the county of Walton to pay to the county of Morgan the tax on all the machinery, whether attached to the building or not, and upon all the appliances used in connection with the machinery; the whole amounting, in value, according to the return, to $8,000. The judgment on the bill of exceptions brought by the county of Walton and the High Shoals Manufacturing Company is affirmed.

Judgment on bill of exceptions filed by the county of Morgan affirmed, with directions; on the other bill, affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WALL v. MOUNT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

STATUTORY BOND—ESTOPPEL—EXECUTION—CLAIMANT'S BOND—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—APPEAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

1. An instrument void as a statutory bond may yet be good as a common-law obligation.

2. Where the obligors have secured an advantage arising from the instrument being treated as valid, they are not entitled to the additional advantage of having it treated as invalid.

3. Where, therefore, instead of making the instrument payable to the levying officer, as required by statute, the claimant made the same payable to the plaintiff in fi. fa., and agreed to produce the property in the event it was found subject on a trial of the claim case, the obligors would be liable to the plaintiff on proof that the officer had surrendered the property to the claimant by virtue of the bond, and that thereafter the same had been found subject on the trial of the claim case.

4. The plaintiff was entitled to the allowance of the amendment setting up the facts entitling him to recover on the instrument as a voluntary bond.

5. The right to appeal is governed by the pleadings, and in a suit on a bond in the penal sum of $100, with no allegation that the damages were $50 or less, the court properly refused to sustain the motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground "that the original summons and cause of action did not show that the amount involved exceeded $50.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Terrell County; H. C. Sheffield, Judge.

Action by A. T. Wall against William Mount and another. Judgment for defendant Mount, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Wall obtained a judgment against Hucksby. The execution was placed in the hands of Watson, special constable, who it is alleged was not familiar with the duties of the office. He levied the fi. fa. on certain cotton which was claimed by Hillsman. The latter, with Mount as security, gave a bond in the sum of $100, payable to Andrew Wall, plaintiff in fi. fa., reciting the levy, and conditioned that, "if the principal shall well and truly deliver said property to said officer [Watson] on the day and place of sale, provided such said property shall be found subject to said fi. fa., this bond to be void." On this instrument was indorsed, "Bond approved. J. W. Simmons, N. P. & Ex. J. P." There were several trials of the claim case, and it appears that during the litigation Hillsman left the county, and the property was afterwards found subject. Thereupon Wall brought suit in the justice's court against Hillsman, principal, and Mount, security. The summons required the defendants "to answer the complaint of A. T. Wall in an action upon a bond, a copy of which said bond is annexed to this summons." There was a return of "non est" as to Hillsman. Mount alone was served, and he alone defended. He denied any indebtedness, and alleged that the bond was void; that it was not a forthcoming bond; that it had never been delivered to or accepted by the levying officer, nor had it been properly approved. In the justice's court the judgment was in favor of the plaintiff. Mount appealed. Wall moved to dismiss the appeal because the original summons and cause of action did not show that the amount involved exceeded $50. He excepted to the court's refusal to sustain his motion. During the trial it appeared that the bale of cotton weighed 575 pounds, that at the time of the levy it was worth 10½ cents per pound, and that at the time the bond was given it was worth 9%. The plaintiff offered interrogatories of a justice of the peace who presided in one of the trials of the claim case. He testified that on the trial there was in court a forthcoming bond for the cotton; that after the trial Hillsman, the claimant, took the case by certiorari to the superior court; and that in answering the certiorari the justice returned the forthcoming bond, with all the other papers, to the clerk of the superior court. It was admitted that the bond sued on was the same as that returned by the justice to the clerk. Wall, the plaintiff, testified that in one of the trials in which the cotton was involved Mount swore "that he gave bond for the bale of cotton, took possession of it, sold it, and kept the money, and was holding the proceeds to await the result of the litigation." The court refused to allow the plaintiff to introduce in evidence the bond sued on, holding that both the evidence and the face of the bond failed to show that it had been accepted and approved by the levying officer, to which ruling Wall excepted. Wall then offered what was called an "equitable amendment," setting up, among other things, the fact that the defendant, by reason of the invalid bond, had got possession of the property levied on, sold the cotton, and was now in possession of the proceeds; and that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment against the defendant for its value. This amendment was disallowed, and the plaintiff excepted. The bond having been excluded from the evidence, the court, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, directed a verdict for the defendant.

W. H. Gurr, for plaintiff in error. H. A. Wilkinson, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1-3. The cotton was under levy. Presumptively it would have been sold, and the proceeds turned over to the plaintiff in fi. fa. The sale was prevented by the claimant giving a bond, in which he bound himself to return the property in the event it was found subject to the execution on the trial of the claim case. This bond was improperly made payable to Wall, the plaintiff in fi. fa., instead of to Watson, the levying officer, as required by Civ. Code 1895, § 4615. It was therefore defective as a forthcoming bond. But if it was the means by which the possession was changed from the constable to the claimant, if it served the purpose for which it was given, if it injured the plaintiff and benefited the principal, it was not void, but effective as a common-law bond. The obligors, having secured the advantage arising from the instrument treated as valid, ought not to be relieved from liability by securing the additional advantage of having it treated as invalid. And there are many cases in our Reports where, though bonds failed to comply with the order or statute under which they were given, the principals and their sureties were held liable thereon by virtue of a common-law liability. The benefit secured was sufficient consideration to support the cause of action thereon, irrespective of any question depending upon the fact that the instrument had a seal. It was error to exclude the bond when it was offered in evidence. Farmers' Co. v. Middle Georgia Co., 94 Ga. 673, 20 S. E. 117; Ware v. Laird, 93 Ga. 342, 20 S. E. 635; White v. Spillers, 85 Ga. 555, 11 S. E. 616; Everett v. Westmoreland, 92 Ga. 671, 19 S. E. 37 (4); Anderson v. Blair, 118 Ga. 212, 45 S. E. 28; Stephens v. Crawford, 1 Ga. 574, 44 Am. Dec. 680; Justices v. Sloan, 7 Ga. 34; Stephens v. Crawford, 8 Ga. 499; Dennard v. State,

2 Ga. 137; Park v. State, 4 Ga. 329; Jones v. Gordon, 82 Ga. 570, 9 S. E. 782; Justices v. Ennis, 5 Ga. 571; Colley v. Morgan, 5 Ga. 178; Faircloth v. Freeman, 10 Ga. 251; Bowden v. Taylor, 81 Ga. 199, 6 S. E. 277 (2).

5. Even if the contention of plaintiff is correct, this was not a suit upon a forthcoming bond, and there was no presumption that it was given for exactly twice the value of the property levied on, and nothing to indicate that the recovery could be limited to $50. Besides, the right to appeal is fixed by the pleadings. This being an action on a bond in the penal sum of $100, the court properly refused to dismiss the appeal on the ground "that the original summons and cause of action did not show that the amount involved exceeded $50." But, for the reasons stated on the other branch of the case, there should be a new trial.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. BAGLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 23, 1905.)
RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—PETITION—OWNERSHIP—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An allegation in a petition by two plaintiffs that certain personalty therein described is "the property of petitioners" is, in effect, an averment that they are joint owners thereof; there being nothing in the petition to indicate several ownership by one or the other in any portion of the property.

2. That portion of the petition which contained the averment of negligence was sufficient as against the demurrer filed thereto.

3. The assignments of error on the admission of evidence were not well taken.

4. The fact that a witness is an employé of one of the parties is a proper matter to be considered by the jury in passing upon his credibility.

5. The extracts from the charge which were assigned as error were not subject to the objections made thereto. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by S. E. Bagley and others against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

See 48 S. E. 179.

The plaintiffs brought suit against the defendant for damages alleged to have arisen from the killing of two mules and a horse by one of the defendant's trains, the petition alleging that the animals were "the property of petitioners." The allegations of negligence set out were as follows: "Petitioners show that the negligence in running said train consisted of the facts that the engine pulling said train was not properly sounded, and the engineer did not keep a proper lookout ahead of the engine, and did not blow the whistle and ring the bell, and did not try to stop the train when petitioners' mules were discovered on the track in front of the train, but ran the train in a very fast and reckless manner, thereby injuring and damaging petitioners as aforesaid." The defendant demurred on the ground that the petition did not allege whether the plaintiffs owned the animals jointly or as partners, or whether each owned one or more of the animals, and that the allegations of negligence were insufficient, in that it was not alleged that after the mules came on the track the engineer had any time to do any of the acts the failure to do which is alleged to be negligence, or that he had any time to do these acts after the mules were discovered on the track. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted pendentie lite. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. It complains of the judgments overruling the demurrer and the motion for a new trial.

Wm. D. Kiddoo, for plaintiff in error.
Shipp & Sheppard, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. 1. It is well settled that allegations that the plaintiff "is owner of" the property involved, or that it "belongs" to him, or he is "seised," and the like, are allegations of an ultimate fact, and not of a mere conclusion of law. See 21 Enc. P. & P. 718, and citations. The demurrer seems to concede this, and avers that an allegation that the animals were "the property of petitioners" does not sufficiently show the character of ownership. The necessary inference to be drawn from this averment is joint ownership in each of the animals referred to in the petition. It is certainly not to be inferred that one of the plaintiffs owned one animal, and the other two.

2. The allegations of negligence in the petition were sufficient. The plaintiffs relied on certain omissions of duty which they claimed constituted negligence. These omissions were subject to explanation by the defendant. It could show that, relatively to the plaintiffs' property, the omissions did not constitute negligence, because the animals could not have been seen earlier, and that after they were seen the engineer did not have time to stop the train before striking the animals. These were, however, matters of defense, and need not have been alleged in the petition.

3. It is complained in the motion for a new trial that the court refused to allow the engineer to answer the following question: "Now, then, was it possible for you to do anything else besides what you did to prevent the injury?" The court allowed the witness to testify that after seeing the animals he did everything in his power to stop the train. In two other grounds of the motion, complaint is made of the court's refusal to allow similar questions to be answered by the engineer. We think the court went quite far enough in allowing the witness to testify that he did everything in his power to stop the train. The evidence sought was a conclusion of the witness, resting largely upon his mere opinion. This kind of evidence is usually inadmissible. In a case like the present it is better for the engineer to state what he did, and leave to the jury the determination of the question whether, in doing the things detailed, he did everything to prevent the injury which he ought to have done. The engineer not only could but did actually state what he did. See Mayor of Milledgeville v. Wood, 114 Ga. 370, 40 S. E. 239 (2); So. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hudson, 115 Ga. 639, 42 S. E. 60 (2).

4. It is also complained that the court, after charging the jury that the fact that witnesses were employes of the defendant was no reason for disbelieving their testimony, added, "except in determining what weight and credit you will give to the testimony of the witnesses." The court stated the rule with absolute correctness. The fact that a witness is an employe of a party to a case is a matter bearing upon the interest of the witness, which the jury may consider in passing upon his credibility, and it was not error to instruct the jury to this effect.

5. Error was assigned upon the following charge: "Now, I charge you, gentlemen, that when stock has been shown to have been killed by the locomotive, cars, or other machinery, that the law presumes negligence on the part of the railroad; that that makes out a prima facie case for the plaintiff; that is, nothing else appearing, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. I charge you that the defendant may come in and overcome that presumption. That, like all presumption, is a matter that can be overcome by proof. I charge you that presumption may be overcome by showing that the defendant used all ordinary diligence and care to prevent the accident; to prevent the killing." The objection to this charge was that it should have been qualified "so as to apply only to the peculiar facts of negligence alleged in the petition." The argument upon this assignment of error was that, as the plaintiffs could not recover except upon the negligence alleged, the court should have qualified the charge by saying that the presumption simply went to this extent. It is now settled that the presumption arising upon proof of the injury establishes only the negligence alleged, and, if it is shown by uncontradicted evidence that there was no negligence as alleged, the presumption is overcome, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, although the proof may show other acts of negligence. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Weathers, 120 Ga. 475, 47 S. E. 956. The portion of the charge complained of is absolutely correct in every particular. It simply says that, upon proof of the injury alleged, there is a presumption of negligence, and that, nothing else appearing, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, but that this presumption may be overcome by proof showing that the defendant exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence. These are simply the general principles of law applicable to such a case, and giving them without qualification was not of itself error. As to the propositions of law contained in the charge, they require no qualification to make them sound, and the assignment of error is subject to the criticism that complaint is made of a correct instruction because some other sound proposition was not given in the same connection. See Atlantic Coast Line Rd. Co. v. Williams, 120 Ga. 1042, 48 S. E. 404 (1).

It was further complained that the judge erred in stating the contentions of the parties, this assignment of error being an effort to raise the same question as was sought to be raised by that which has just been considered. The judge, in a general way, stated the contentions of both parties; and, if a more elaborate statement of the contentions had been desired, an appropriate written request should have been made in due time.

The charge was not as full as it might have been, but it contained the general principles of law applicable to the case, and, if amplification had been desired, appropriate requests should have been made. See, in this connection, Smith v. Mfg. Co., 112 Ga. 680, 37 S. E. 861 (2).

The evidence was conflicting, but there was evidence from which the jury could find that the presumption against the company had not been rebutted, and the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial will not be interfered with.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MURDER—INDICTMENT—ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

1. An indictment for murder need not specifically allege that the deceased was a human being. That such was the fact is sufficiently implied from setting out the name of the deceased. 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 146, and cases cited.

2. An indictment found in July, 1904, charged that the accused on June 4, 1904, with malice aforethought, "did kill and murder [one James Broner] by shooting the said James Broner with a certain pistol which [the accused] then and there held, and giving to the said James Broner then and there a mortal wound, of which mortal wound the said James Broner died." Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by the Confederate Publishing Company against H. E. Allen, executor of J. H. Allen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Confederate Publishing Company, a corporation, brought suit against H. E. Allen, as executor of the will of J. H. Allen, upon a written contract, of which the following is a copy: "Americus, Ga., Dec. 8th, 1900. Confederate Publishing Co. Please deliver to me the 12 volumes of your Confederate History, for which I will pay you or order on demand, the sum of $60.00, and the books shall be shipped to me or left at my residence or place of business. I understand no definite time can be promised for delivery. I waive all right to countermand this order, basing my subscription solely on the representations on the back hereof. [Signed] H. J. H. Allen." On the back of this contract appeared a statement, signed by the Confederate Publishing Company, setting forth the character, scope, and design of the work, which statement, taken as a whole, constituted an undertaking on the part of the plaintiff to publish and deliver the books referred to in the foregoing order. It was alleged that the books were delivered to the defendant, and that he refused to pay for the same. The defendant filed an answer in which he alleged that, for want of sufficient information, he could neither admit nor deny the allegations in reference to the making of the contract, but denied that the books were ever delivered to him. He specially pleaded that no attempt was made to fulfill the contract until after the death of the testator; that the books were of peculiar value to the testator, but of no value to his heirs; and that therefore his death terminated the contract. The defendant further pleaded that the estate of J. H. Allen had been duly administered, and that plaintiff had not filed with the defendant a notice of its claim within 12 months from the date of his qualification, as required by law. These special pleas were stricken on demurrer, and error is assigned on this judgment. By amendment the defendant pleaded that the contract had been rescinded, and that the question of the liability of the estate on the contract was, by agreement with an agent of the plaintiff, submitted to the decision of an attorney at law—such agent agreeing that the attorney's decision should be final—and that the decision of such attorney was that there was no liability, and that the defendant had never accepted the books, and, while they were in his possession, they had ever been subject to the plaintiff's order. At the conclusion of the evidence, the judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and error is assigned upon this judgment.

Lane & Maynard and W. P. Wallis, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Ansley and Shipp & Sheppard, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. 1. The contract was executory, but it was not unilateral. J. H. Allen agreed to pay for the books when delivered, and the writing upon the back of the contract which was signed by the plaintiff was, in effect, an agreement on its part to deliver the books therein described in accordance with the terms of the contract. There was a promise on the part of the plaintiff to publish and deliver the books, and a promise on the part of the deceased to pay for the same when delivered. Each promise was a sufficient consideration for the other. But even if the contract be treated as unilateral, it was binding upon J. H. Allen during his lifetime, and his legal representative after his death, until there was a withdrawal communicated to the plaintiff before its promise was executed either in whole or in part. Allen did not attempt to withdraw during his lifetime, and his executor made no effort to withdraw until after the books were published and offered to him in compliance with the undertaking of the plaintiff. The death of J. H. Allen did not terminate the contract. Civ. Code 1895, § 3438. A mere notice to the plaintiff that Allen had died would not amount to a withdrawal on the part of the executor, even if he was at liberty to withdraw at the time this notice was given. Under either view of the case, the executor was bound to comply with the undertaking of his testator as set forth in the writing sued on. See, in this connection, Brown v. Bowman, 119 Ga. 153, 46 S. E. 410, and citations.

2. The plea of plene administravit did not allege that the estate had been fully administered without notice of the plaintiff's claim, and was therefore defective and properly stricken on demurrer. McIntosh v. Hambelton, 35 Ga. 95, 89 Am. Dec. 276 (3). While it is alleged that the plaintiff had not filed its claim within 12 months from the date of administration, it did not allege that the defendant did not know of the existence of this claim when he administered the estate.

3. The evidence, at most, showed the agent with whom the defendant dealt to be an agent to collect and settle. While an agent of this character is allowed some discretion in the matter of settlements, the discretion allowed is personal, and cannot be delegated to another; and hence a submission to arbitration is not within the scope of his authority. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1031; Mechem on Agency, § 405.

MINNESOTA LUMBER CO. v. HOBBS & LIVINGSTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

PETITION—MOTION TO DISMISS—SPECIAL DEMURRER—RES JUDICATA—PLEADING—CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—POWERS OF SUPERINTENDENT—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

1. Defects in a petition, such as may be cured by appropriate amendment, cannot properly be made the subject-matter of a motion to dismiss made at the trial term of a case, but can only be taken advantage of by way of special demurrer to the petition filed at the appearance term. A petition capable of withstanding a general demurrer, as was the petition filed in the present case, should not be dismissed on motion made at the trial term.

2. That a plaintiff cannot maintain a pending action because of a recovery in a former suit is a defense which must be set up by a special plea, unless the facts on which it is based appear on the face of the petition, and cannot be urged by way of a motion to dismiss predicated on evidence admitted without objection, or on an admission by the plaintiff as to such former recovery.

3. To enter into a contract in behalf of a corporation chartered for the purpose of manufacturing lumber, under which the other party is to haul logs to be sawn into lumber by the company, is within the apparent scope of the authority of its superintendent or other managing official; and in the absence of any charter limitation on their powers it is to be presumed that they likewise have authority to act for the company in the matter of determining whether or not it will live up to the terms of the contract or repudiate the same in whole or in part.

4. The best evidence of the contents of a writing is the writing itself when the contents thereof are sought to be proved; but the writing itself is not the best evidence of what a given individual told another were its contents.

5. Save as to the finding of attorney's fees, the verdict of the jury was warranted by the evidence, and should be upheld if the plaintiff will voluntarily write off the amount recovered as attorney's fees.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. A. Covington, Judge.

Action by Hobbs & Livingston against the Minnesota Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition.

W. S. Humphreys, John Murrow, and J. A. Humphreys, for plaintiff in error. Shipp & Kline, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. The firm of Hobbs & Livingston, in a petition filed in the city court of Moultrie, complained that it had been damaged by the Minnesota Lumber Company because of the breach of a contract set forth in the petition. The defendant corporation filed a demurrer, and also a plea denying all substantial averments of the petition. The case was submitted to a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,820, together with $180 attorney's fees. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant, but was overruled by the court. Within 30 days of the trial the defendant sued out a bill of exceptions, therein complaining of certain rulings made during the progress of the case, and assigning error on the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

1. Upon the call of the case the defendant moved to dismiss the suit on the ground that no cause of action was set forth in the petition, because the plaintiffs failed to allege any steps taken to make the loss of the defendant as little as possible, and because the petition did not allege what the actual loss to the plaintiffs was, or what amount of actual profits the plaintiffs would have realized in the event the contract had been performed. So far as these special objections to the petition are concerned, the court was clearly right in refusing to sustain the motion to dismiss. If the defendant desired to specially demur to any portion of the plaintiffs' petition, a proper special demurrer should have been filed at the appearance term of the case. A motion to dismiss is the equivalent of a general demurrer, and may be made at the trial term, if the petition is fatally defective; but such a motion cannot reach mere defects in pleading such as may be cured by appropriate amendment. As against a general demurrer, the petition in the present case stated a cause of action, and accordingly the motion to dismiss was properly overruled.

The defendant also urged the court to require the plaintiffs to elect "which they would sue for—the profits that they were entitled to on the business under the contract, or for damages sustained on account of the breach" thereof alleged in the petition. The court declined so to do. If the petition was open to attack on the ground of vagueness or duplicity, the point should have been made by special demurrer filed at the appearance term. The petition set forth a contract, and alleged a breach thereof, and a recovery was asked for damages arising from such breach, to be measured, in part, by the loss of profits which the plaintiffs had sustained. There was nothing in the petition which justified the defendant in calling on the court to compel the plaintiffs to elect between two remedies, or to pursue one course rather than another in making out the case.

2. Before the introduction of any evidence it was admitted that a suit between the same parties, based on the same contract, for an amount claimed as due upon a part performance thereof by the plaintiffs, had been tried at the same term of the court, and had resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs. Upon this admission the defendant moved to dismiss the pending suit on the ground that the judgment in the former suit was a bar to any subsequent action for any breach of the contract occurring prior to the commencement of such initial suit. The court overruled the motion, and error is assigned on this ruling, both in the bill of exceptions and in the motion for a new trial. There was no plea of former recovery filed by the defendant. The only defense relied on was a general denial of the various paragraphs of the plaintiffs' petition. The defendant corporation, if desirous of availing itself of the defense that the contract for a breach of which damages were claimed was an entire and indivisible one, and that the former suit was exhaustive of the plaintiffs' right to sue, should have filed an appropriate plea specially urging this defense. Williams v. Rawlins, 33 Ga. 117 (10); Tommey v. Finney, 45 Ga. 158; Central Railroad v. Coleman, 88 Ga. 294, 14 S. E. 382, and cases cited. As the pleadings stood, the admission was wholly irrelevant to any issue in the case, and afforded no cause for dismissing the plaintiffs' action. The pleadings set forth the mutual altercations between the parties, and evidence which neither tends to establish or disprove any allegation made therein is inadmissible. If irrelevant evidence be admitted without objection, it can have no probative value in the determination of the case, which the court and jury are called on to decide upon the issues raised by the pleadings of the respective parties. It was not the right of the defendant, at the trial term of the case, to interpose any such defense without making affidavit that "at the time of filing the original plea or answer [the defendant] did not omit the new facts or defense * * * for the purpose of delay, and that" such defense was not then "offered for delay," unless, in the discretion of the court, the circumstances of the case or substantial justice between the parties required that the defendant should be permitted to amend without attaching such affidavit. No offer to amend the defendant's answer was made, or affidavit presented, nor was the court called on to exercise any discretion in the premises. The requirements of the act of December 21, 1897, with regard to tardily presenting a new and distinct defense, were wholly disregarded by the defendant, and the court was asked to dispense with proper pleadings, ignore that act (Acts 1897, p. 85), and dismiss the action on mere motion of the defendant based on an admission of the plaintiffs which the defendant regarded as fatal to a recovery in the pending suit. The question of law involved was not one which could be properly presented by a motion to dismiss, the petition, which, on its face, disclosed nothing of which the defendant could take advantage as matter of defense. Killen v. Compton, 57 Ga. 63; Kennon v. Petty, 59 Ga. 175. Accordingly, the court rightly declined to grant the motion to dismiss.

3. The contract alleged by the plaintiff was that the defendant corporation employed the plaintiffs to haul logs from a certain lot of land to defendant's tramroad, about a mile and a quarter distant, at $4.50 per thousand feet, the dimension of the logs to be computed by their mean diameter. It was alleged that the contract was to continue of force till the 7th day of April, 1903, and that, after plaintiffs had entered upon a performance of the contract, the officers and agents of the defendant corporation notified plaintiffs that they would not pay for the hauling of the logs in accordance with the terms of the contract, whereupon plaintiffs were forced to suspend operations, and sustained the damages alleged in the petition. The defendant denied entering into any such contract, or committing any breach thereof. On the trial one of the members of the plaintiff firm testified that the contract alleged was made by him with two named persons who were the president and superintendent, respectively, of the defendant corporation. Objection was made to this testimony on the ground that it did not appear that these officers of the corporation had authority to make in its behalf such a contract. The defendant was a corporation duly chartered and engaged in the business of manufacturing lumber. A necessary incident of the business was to provide the logs which were to be sawn into lumber. In an enterprise of this character the superintendent of the corporation has power to contract in behalf of the corporation with reference to matters proper and usual in the ordinary conduct of the corporate business. He may employ labor, contract for the hauling of logs, and do any act relating to the actual operation of the mill. As a general rule, a president has no inherent power to contract for the corporation; and, unless his powers are enlarged by the charter or by-laws, his duties are confined to presiding and voting as a director. 2 Cook, Corp. § 716. The contract was alleged to have been made with both the president and the superintendent of the corporation. The plaintiff had the right to assume, in the absence of any limitation in the charter or by-laws, that the superintendent had authority to contract in behalf of the corporation with regard to the carrying on of the business for which it was chartered.

What is said above also applies to the contention of the defendant that the court erred in admitting over a similar objection evidence to the effect that the person whom the witness just referred to had testified was the superintendent of the defendant said to a member of the plaintiff firm that unless he consented to a different basis of measurement than that which had been agreed on he could take the plaintiffs' teams out of the woods. Whether or not this person was the superintendent of the defendant corporation was, under the evidence submitted, a question of fact for the jury. If he was so in fact, then he was acting within the apparent scope of his authority in notifying the plaintiffs that the corporation he represented would no longer live up to its agreement with respect to the manner in which the logs were to be measured, and the plaintiffs had a right to treat this declaration as a breach of the contract, and to act accordingly.

4. In the course of the trial testimony was admitted tending to show that pending the negotiations which led up to the making of the contract the president of the defendant corporation stated that it held a lease covering the land from which he desired the timber cut and hauled, which lease would expire on April 7, 1903. Objection was made to this testimony on the ground that the written lease was the highest and best evidence. The plaintiffs were not undertaking to prove that there was, in point of fact, a lease, but only to prove that the defendant's president had said there was, and had stated, as a reason for wanting the logs hauled before April 7th, that the lease expired on that date. Nor was it necessary to a recovery by the plaintiffs that it be shown that any such lease had ever been executed. The plaintiffs did allege and prove that the contract was not to remain of force longer than a given period, which expired on April 7th. The best evidence of what the defendant's president stated was his reason for wanting the contract performed by that date was proof of what he said was his reason. The plaintiffs proposed to show nothing more. The testimony objected to might have been wholly irrelevant, but it was not inadmissible for the reason assigned by the defendant.

5. No exception is taken to the amount of the verdict other than a general assignment that the verdict was without evidence to support it. The plaintiffs' evidence tended to show that they were to be compensated for hauling the logs at the rate of $4.50 per thousand feet, the logs to be measured in accordance with a certain rule prescribed in Scribner's Lumber and Log Book for ascertaining the mean diameter; that within the contract period the plaintiffs could have hauled a certain number of logs, if permitted to do so, which, at the contract price, would have entitled them to payment of a sum in excess of the amount of damages assessed by the jury; and that by reason of the defendant's repudiation of the contract the plaintiffs had been endamaged in that sum. We cannot, therefore, say that the verdict was without evidence to support it, so far as this item of damages is concerned. The jury included in their verdict $180 as attorney's fees. There was no evidence before them authorizing the recovery of any amount as attorney's fees, so this part of their finding cannot be upheld. Accordingly, we have given direction that if, within 10 days after the filing of the remittitur in the court below, the plaintiffs will voluntarily write off the recovery of attorney's fees, the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial shall stand affirmed; otherwise a new trial be had.

MORRIS v. GLOVER et al.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—COUNTY TREASURER—ABOLITION OF OFFICE—CONTEST OF ELECTION—MANDAMUS—RECANVASS OF VOTES.

1. The local act approved February 29, 1876 (Acts 1876, p. 322), providing for the consolidation of the office of county treasurer of Cobb county with the office of clerk of the superior court of that county, making the clerk ex officio treasurer and fixing his fees, is unconstitutional and wholly inoperative, in that, under the Constitution of 1868, the General Assembly was without power to expressly abolish the office of county treasurer, or to accomplish the same result by indirection, by depriving the treasurer of the emoluments of that office, and transferring the duties thereof to the clerk of the superior court. Decision in Massenberg v. Commissioners, 23 S. E. 998, 96 Ga. 614, approved and followed. Dictum in Hall v. Burks, 24 S. E. 349, 96 Ga. 622, disapproved.

2. Mandamus, and not a proceeding to contest an election, is the remedy of one who was the sole candidate for a particular office, but who was ignored by the board of canvassers, the members of which refused to consolidate the votes cast in his favor, or to declare any result, so far as that office was concerned.

3. Where a board of canvassers has dissolved before properly performing its functions, its members may, by mandamus, be compelled to reconvene and recanvass the votes in accordance with the direction of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Mandamus, § 154.]

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Application by J. G. Morris for a writ of mandamus to J. B. Glover and others. From an order denying the writ, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This was a mandamus proceeding instituted by J. Gid Morris, who claims to have been duly elected treasurer of the county of Cobb at an election for county officers held in that county on October 5, 1904. The purpose of the proceeding was to compel the superintendents of that election, who were named in the plaintiff's petition as defendants, to consolidate the votes cast in his favor as county treasurer, for which office he was the only candidate, and to certify the result, and make proper return thereof. The defendants filed a demurrer to the petition, in which they set forth their contention that "there is no such office as treasurer of Cobb county, separate, apart, and distinct from the office of the clerk of the superior court of said county"; the office of treasurer having been consolidated with that of clerk of the superior court by an act of the Legislature approved February 29, 1876, "whereby all the duties required to be performed by the treasurer of said county were devolved upon the clerk of the superior court of said county, and whereby said clerk became ex officio treasurer of said county." On the hearing of the demurrer, the court sustained this contention of the defendants; holding that the local act relied on by them was not, for any of the reasons urged by the plaintiff, inoperative and of no effect. To the judgment dismissing his petition on demurrer, the plaintiff duly excepted. The main attack made on this local act is that it is unconstitutional, in that the Legislature sought by indirection to abolish one of the county offices recognized by the Constitution of 1868, by devolving the duties of the office of treasurer upon the clerk of the superior court, and styling him ex officio treasurer, which it was not within the power of the General Assembly to do.

N. A. Morris and Rosser & Brandon, for plaintiff in error. J. Z. Foster, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The controlling question is the constitutionality of the act approved February 29, 1876 (Acts 1876, p. 322), consolidating the office of county treasurer of the county of Cobb with the office of clerk of the superior court of that county, making the clerk ex officio treasurer, and fixing his fees. The act is alleged to be violative of article 9, § 1, of the Constitution of 1868, in force at the time of its passage. This article and section of the Constitution provides that: "The county officers recognized as existing by the laws of this state, and not abolished by this Constitution, shall, where not otherwise provided for in this Constitution, be elected by the qualified voters of their respective counties or districts, and shall hold their offices for two years. They shall be removable, on conviction, for malpractice in office, or on the address of two-thirds of the Senate." This clause of the Constitution was construed in Massenburg v. Commissioners of Bibb County, 96 Ga. 614, 23 S. E. 998, and it was there ruled that: "The office of county treasurer having been, under the law existing previous to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, recognized as a county office, and that office not having been abolished, but, on the contrary, recognized, by that Constitution, it became and was thereby established as a constitutional office, and could not thereafter, while that Constitution was of force, be abolished by an act of the Legislature." The contention of the plaintiff in error is that the local act (Acts 1876, p. 322) consolidating the office of county treasurer with the office of clerk of the superior court is, in effect, the abolition of the office of county treasurer, and is therefore void.

It was expressly held in Massenberg v. Commissioners, supra, that it is incompetent for the Legislature to directly abolish a constitutional office. Can the Legislature by indirection accomplish what it is restrained from doing by the organic law of the land? Among the incidents of public office are the discharge of its duties and the enjoyment of its emoluments by the individual entitled to the office. At the time of the ratification of the Constitution, the duties of the office of county treasurer were discharged by an individual elected by the people for a definite term, invested by law with all the rights and duties appertaining to this office. He was styled the county treasurer, and was included among the county officers embraced in the section of the Constitution which provided for the future election and prescribed the tenure of service of certain county officials whose offices had theretofore been lawfully created. The county treasurer held a separate and distinct office, expressly recognized by the Constitution. He was an officer declared by that instrument to be a county official who was to be elected by the people for a term of two years. If the duties and emoluments of his office be transferred to another officer, then there would exist the anomalous condition of an officer recognized by the Constitution, without duties or emoluments. The duties and emoluments are of the substance of the office; its name, but the semblance. If the Legislature may consolidate the office of treasurer with that of the clerk of the court, why should not the authority be extended to consolidating the other county offices, so that the clerk might, ex officio, discharge the duties of all county officers? There is no more reason why the clerk, with legislative sanction, should be ex officio treasurer, than there is that he should also be, at the will of the General Assembly, ex officio tax receiver, tax collector, and sheriff. It cannot be seriously contended that the framers of the Constitution, by express recognition of separate and distinct offices, with separate and distinct functions, contemplated that the Legislature might devolve the duties of two or more offices upon one functionary. In those governments where the lawmaking power is not fettered by a written Constitution limiting its authority, offices may be created, consolidated, or abolished at legislative will. Likewise, an office created by statute, but not defined in or recognized by the Constitution, may be abrogated by statute. But where an office is created or guarded by express constitutional provision, its scope cannot be enlarged or lessened by statute, nor can the office be filled in any manner other than that prescribed by the Constitution. People v. Bollam (Ill.) 54 N. E. 1032. When the Legislature assumed to transfer to the clerk of the superior court all the duties and emoluments which belonged to the office of treasurer, it practically abolished the office of treasurer. There is no recognition in the statute of such an official as a county treasurer. The functions of his office are to be discharged by the clerk, virtute officii. It has been held that the taking away of the salary amounts to the abolition of the office. Reid v. Smolter (Pa.) 18 Atl. 445, 5 L. R. A. 517. If the withdrawal of the emoluments will accomplish this result, a fortiori the transfer of both compensation and duties to another official would have the same effect. See Throop on Pub. Off. § 20.

The clerk of the court, by this local act, is either treasurer of the county of Cobb, or the office of treasurer is extinct. If the clerk is the treasurer, and should be guilty of malpractice in the administration of the functions pertaining to the office of treasurer, could he be removed from the office of clerk of the superior court for such malpractice? Would it not be a good reply for the clerk to say, "I have faithfully discharged my duties as clerk, and my malfeasance as treasurer cannot forfeit my office as clerk"? The act declares that the clerk is ex officio treasurer. If this means that his office is that of "clerk," and that his duties comprehend both the duties of clerk and those of county treasurer, then he is not the treasurer, and no such office as county treasurer longer exists. If he is both clerk and treasurer, a malfeasance in the office of treasurer would not justify his expulsion from the office of clerk. Yet the Constitution declares that a county officer is "removable, on conviction, for malpractice in office." Therefore, should the clerk embezzle funds received as county treasurer, he might escape the constitutional penalty of removal from office.

The Constitution of 1868 bears internal evidence of the construction that each constitutional office should be filled by a separate individual. Article 3, § 1, par. 4, provides that no person holding a military commission, or other appointment or office having any emolument or compensation annexed thereto, under this state or the United States, or either of them, except justices of the peace and officers of the militia, shall have a seat in either house of the General Assembly. The office of justice of the peace is a constitutional office, and, to entitle the holder of that office to a seat in the General Assembly, the framers of the Constitution deemed it necessary to make an express exception.

The case of Hall v. Burks, 93 Ga. 622, 24

S. E. 849, is apparently antagonistic to the conclusion we have reached in this case. In that case it was said that it "was, under the Constitution of 1868, competent and constitutional for the General Assembly to pass an act 'consolidating' the offices of clerk of the superior court and treasurer of a given county, to the extent of devolving the duties of the treasurer upon the clerk, and making the latter ex officio treasurer." This dictum of the court was clearly obiter, as will be seen from an examination of the report of the case, as well as from the transcript of the record on file in the office of the clerk of this court. The assignment of error was that the trial judge erred in not sustaining the contention of the plaintiff that the act of February 28, 1876 (Acts 1876, p. 325), "abolishing the office of county treasurer, and vesting the clerk of the superior court with the duties of treasurer, was and is unconstitutional and illegal, and cannot have the effect of depriving him of said office, because both the Constitution of 1868 and 1877 provides for the uniformity of the laws and offices of the state, and this local act destroys that uniformity by abolishing the office of treasurer in Dougherty county, and not in the whole state, and because, at the time of the passage of said local act, and now, the general law of the state provided that no other officer should be county treasurer, and this local act is in variance with said general law, and is therefore unconstitutional and illegal. Sections 5027, 5228, Const. 1877, and Code 1882, §§ 542, 546; Const. 1868, §§ 5018, 5140; and Code 1873, §§ 542, 546." The attack made on this local act was that it was violative of a constitutional provision requiring that all laws affecting public office should have uniform operation throughout the state, and that it was special legislation upon a subject-matter for which provision had been made by an existing general law. Such was the meaning placed on the assignment of error by this court at the time, as will appear from the statement of the case in the official report, and this interpretation of the assignment of error was correct. The local act was not unconstitutional for the reasons assigned, because the Constitution of 1868 contained no inhibition against special legislation in given cases, as does the Constitution now of force. Civ. Code 1895, § 5732. The court very properly held that the local law was not unconstitutional because of the objections then urged against it, but the unguarded statement that it was, under the Constitution of 1868, competent for the General Assembly to pass an act of this kind, consolidating two county offices, was altogether too broad. "This court has no authority to decide any question on any writ of error, unless there are in the bill of exceptions 'plainly and specifically set forth the errors alleged to have been committed,' and a 'special assignment of error' raising the question." Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 874, 43 S. E. 280 (9). The ruling announced in Hall v. Burks cannot be extended beyond the adjudication of the questions made by the above-quoted assignment of error, and the proposition stated in the first headnote to that case is, so far as it concerns the question now presented for decision, mere obiter dictum, and not a binding adjudication thereof.

2. The plaintiff's petition was demurred to on the further ground that, if he had sustained any wrong, he had "a complete and adequate remedy by a proceeding to contest said election." The allegations of the petition disclose that the plaintiff was the only candidate for the office of treasurer, and that he received 193 votes. While some of the votes cast for the candidate who was running for the office of clerk read, "For clerk and county treasurer," no ballots were cast for him "as treasurer," and he was not a candidate for the office of treasurer. Clearly, therefore, a contest was out of the question. The plaintiff sought by mandamus merely to require the managers of the election to properly consolidate the returns and declare the result. This was the remedy to be pursued. Tanner v. Deen, 108 Ga. 95, 33 S. E. 832.

3. The defendants also made the point that, as disclosed by the petition, the managers of the election had met, consolidated the returns, and adjourned sine die, long before the bringing of the present proceeding, and could not be reassembled at the instance of petitioner for the purpose of consolidating the returns in accordance with any order which the court might pass. Though the power of a court to compel by mandamus a board of canvassers to reconvene and canvass the votes in accordance with its directions has been called into question, the weight of authority is that this may be done. See 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 808, and cases cited. This court, in Tanner v. Deen, supra, held that the remedy of mandamus could not be defeated simply because the returning board had dissolved before properly performing its functions.

SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO. v. DUKES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—PETITION—AMENDMENT—
APPLIANCES—INSPECTION BY SERVANT—CON-TRACT OF INFANT—RATIFICATION—CLAIM FOR DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. When, in an action for personal injuries, the original petition alleges certain acts of negligence, and by amendment additional acts of negligence are alleged, and the plaintiff, in open court, abandons all right to recover on the acts of negligence alleged in the original petition, it is not error to submit the case to the jury entirely upon the issues made by the amendment; making no reference to the issues of negligence raised by the original petition.

2. As a general rule, a servant is under no obligation to inspect the appliances about which he works, or that part of the plant by which his safety may be affected, for the purpose of discovering concealed dangers which would not be disclosed by superficial observation.

3. When machinery, though not perfect in all respects, can be and has been used with safety under given circumstances, a servant using such machinery is warranted in acting upon the assumption that the master has fulfilled and will continue to fulfill his duty to see that the circumstances are such that the machinery can be used with safety, unless it is apparent to the servant that the master has failed to fulfill his duty in this respect, or such failure can be ascertained by the servant's using that degree of care which the law imposes upon him.

4. One seeking to hold an infant bound upon a contract, for the reason that the consideration of the contract was retained after arrival of the infant at majority, has imposed upon him the burden of showing possession of the consideration after majority, and retention for a sufficient length of time that a ratification of the contract is to be inferred.

5. If the infant "has lost, expended, or squandered the consideration during his minority, this is nothing more than the law anticipates of him, and he cannot be required to purchase the right of reclaiming his own by still further abstractions from his estate."

6. A "linter" in an oilmill, who is an infant, is not engaged in a profession, trade, or business, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 3650, so as to make him bound by a contract made with his employer in reference to a claim for damages for personal injuries sustained in the course of his employment.

7. The fact that an infant is receiving the proceeds of his own labor is not alone sufficient to establish that permission on the part of his parent has been given to engage in the business in which the amounts secured by him are earned.

8. The charge was not subject to any of the criticisms made in the assignments of error. The evidence authorized the verdict, and no reason appears for reversing the judgment.

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by A. P. Dukes against the Southern Cotton Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dukes brought suit against the Southern Cotton Oil Company for personal injuries sustained while working as an employé of the defendant in an oilmill. The negligence alleged in the original petition was the failure of the defendant to furnish machinery equal in kind to that in general use, and ordinarily safe for those who operate it with proper care; the specific act of negligence alleged being that the defendant furnished a seed shaker which was connected by a belt with the main shafting in a building in which the seed shaker was so arranged that it became choked up, and would not run; that the belt connecting the shaker with the main shafting was pieced, spliced, and otherwise defective, so that when the plaintiff, in the performance of his duty, went to place in position the belt connecting the seed shaker with the main shafting, additional tension was put on the belt on account of the choked condition of the shaker, and the belt broke, throwing the plaintiff into a pulley, and thereby injuring him seriously and permanently. By amendment the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was negligent in failing to furnish a reasonably safe place for the plaintiff to work, of which fact the defendant had knowledge, or had reasonable opportunity to have had knowledge, and of which the plaintiff had no knowledge, and could not have known by ordinary care; that the place in which plaintiff was ordered to work by the superintendent in charge of the mill was especially dangerous at the particular time of the injury, by reason of the fact that the seed shaker mentioned above, which, with the other machinery and belting to which it was attached, was ordinarily and reasonably safe at other times, had, upon the Saturday night before (the plaintiff's injuries having been sustained on Monday), become unsafe and dangerous by reason of the fact that it had become choked with cotton seed and other obstructions, which fact the defendant knew, or could by the exercise of ordinary care have known, and the plaintiff did not know, and could not, by the exercise of reasonable care, have informed himself; and that by reason of these facts the risk of his employment was unusually and unreasonably increased. The defendant, in its answer, admitted that the plaintiff was an employé, and was injured while attempting to place the belt upon the shafting, but, upon various grounds, denied any liability. It was alleged that the plaintiff was employed as a "linterman," and not as a seed-shaker man, and that, when he was engaged in putting the belt upon the shafting, he was outside the line of his duty; that he did not exercise ordinary care while engaged in placing the belt upon the shafting; that the machinery was of good quality, not defective, reasonably adapted to the use intended, and could be, had been, and was being used with safety to the employé; that it was inspected and tested, and always kept in a safe condition for use in a proper manner; that the seed shaker was not choked; that the belt was not unserviceable, and that the injury was caused solely by the plaintiff's unskillfulness and careless handling of the belt; that the defendant had settled with the plaintiff for all wages and damages sustained, and that he had executed and delivered to it, under his own hand, a written release from all claims resulting from the occurrence alleged in the petition; that he had been instructed and informed as to the dangers incident to the work in which he was engaged; that he well knew the dangers, and had taken the risk incident thereto. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,500. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and it excepted.

J. J. Beck and King, Spalding & Little, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Sheffield and A. G. Powell, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. 1. It appeared from the plaintiff's evidence that the belt was in a defective condition, and that its condition was well known to him; and thereupon, in open court, plaintiff's counsel announced that he would not contend for a recovery upon the allegations of negligence alleged in the original petition, which related to the defective character of the machinery furnished, but would rely entirely upon the averments of negligence contained in the amendment. The court, in its charge to the jury, did not submit any issue growing out of the acts of negligence alleged in the original petition, but submitted the case upon the issues made by the amendment and the answer. Error is assigned upon the failure of the judge to submit the issues involved in the original petition and answer. We do not think there was any error in this action of the court. The effect of the announcement in open court was the same as if the plaintiff had stricken from his petition the allegations of negligence contained in the original petition. They were thereafter not necessary to be considered, and the court did not err in not submitting to the jury the issues made by the original petition.

2, 3. When a master furnishes for the use of a servant machinery which is defective, or not properly adapted to the work which the servant is employed to perform, and the use of such machinery subjects the servant to dangers which may result in injury, and the servant either knows, or could by the exercise of reasonable diligence discover, that the machinery is defective and not adapted to the work in which he is engaged, the master is not generally responsible to the servant for an injury received as the result of the use of such machinery. But the mere fact that machinery is not perfect and not adapted to use under all circumstances will not necessarily prevent a recovery by the servant, resulting from the use of such machinery. If the machinery, though defective, can be safely used for certain purposes and under certain circumstances, and the servant has reason to believe that it will not be used except for such purposes and under such circumstances, he has a right to recover for injuries which he might sustain as the result of the master permitting the use of the machinery for other purposes and under other circumstances; such purposes and circumstances not being brought to the knowledge of the servant, and he not being able to inform himself of them by the use of ordinary care. It was admitted that the belt was not perfect. It was therefore defective in that sense. It was, however, not a belt that was so defective as not to be proper for use under any circumstances. See Eagle & Phenix Mills v. Herron, 119 Ga. 389, 48 S. E. 405.

The seed shaker and sand screens, which were in a room other than the one in which the plaintiff was hurt, were not perfect in all respects. The seed shaker would become choked, and the evidence shows that it had become choked on previous occasions. When not in a choked condition, it could be safely used; and the belt, though defective in some particulars, could be used with safety when the seed shaker was not in a choked condition. So long as the seed shaker was not choked, it was proper for the master to allow the belt to be used in connection therewith, and the servant would not be at fault in using the machinery consisting in part of the defective belt and the imperfect seed shaker. Whether the shaker was in a condition to be properly used with the belt furnished was a matter that could be ascertained, and it was the duty of the master to cause inspections to be made for this purpose at proper times, and the failure to make proper inspections at proper times would be negligence on his part. If the servant was also bound to inspect the shaker before using the belt, then he would be negligent if he used the belt without making such inspection. But was he bound to make such inspection? When he reported for work at the proper time and at the proper place, did not the servant have a right to assume that the master had performed his duty by making the inspection necessary, and that the machinery was in such condition that it was safe for operation; the choked condition of the seed shaker not being apparent to the servant at the time? The condition of the shaker being discoverable only by inspection, and the duty of inspection not being within the scope of the work for which he was employed, he had a right to rest upon the assumption that the master had performed his duty to see that the machinery was in proper condition for work; that is, that the seed shaker was not choked. See Duke v. Bibb Mfg. Co., 120 Ga. 1074, 48 S. E. 408. In McDonnell's Case, 118 Ga. 86, 92, 44 S. E. 840, it was held that a machinist who was employed to repair the pop valve upon an engine was not bound to inspect the boiler of the locomotive upon which he was at work, and that therefore his widow was entitled to recover from his employer for his homicide, resulting from an explosion of the boiler, notwithstanding the boiler was in a dangerous and defective condition at the time he was at work, and that this fact could have been easily ascertained by an inspection of the boiler. See, also, Austin v. Appling, 88 Ga. 54, 13 S. E. 955 (2). The defect in the seed shaker not being patent and apparent to the servant at the time he attempted to place the belt in position, and there being no duty imposed upon him to make an inspection for defects which were not apparent, he was not at fault in attempting to do that which, under ordinary circumstances, could have been done with safety. See 1 La Batt on Master & Servant, § 408.

4, 5. The plaintiff was a minor at the time of the injury, as well as at the time of the alleged settlement relied upon by the defendant as an accord and satisfaction. It does not appear from the evidence that the plaintiff had in his possession at the time he arrived at majority any of the money which was paid to him under the settlement. If when he arrived at majority he had in his possession the whole amount paid to him, or possibly if he had any substantial part thereof, the retention of the same by him after arrival at majority might have amounted to a ratification. See McKamy v. Cooper, 81 Ga. 679, 8 S. E. 812. But there is nothing in the evidence to bring the case within this rule, and the burden was on the defendant to show a ratification resulting from possession and retention of the proceeds by the plaintiff after his arrival at majority. If an infant has "lost, expended, or squandered the consideration during his minority, this is nothing more than the law anticipates of him, and he cannot be required to purchase the right of reclaiming his own by still further abstractions from his estate. Otherwise the rule would practically strike down the shield which the law, by reason of his inexperience and youth, throws around him." Field on Infants, § 15. See, also, Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) p. 173. In Shuford v. Alexander, 74 Ga. 293, which was an action at law, it was held that one who entered into a contract during infancy might, upon arriving at majority, disaffirm the contract, and recover property parted with by him, or its value, or damages for fraud practiced upon him in such transaction, without offering to rescind the contract or to return the consideration. The rule might be different if the infant was compelled to resort to a court of equity. See Thomason v. Phillips, 73 Ga. 140.

6, 7. An infant who, by permission of his parent or guardian, or by permission of the law, practices a profession or trade, or engages in any business as an adult, is bound by all contracts connected with the occupation in which he is engaged. Civ. Code 1895, § 3850. One engaged as a "linter" in an oilmill is not engaged in a profession or trade, within the meaning of this section. In Howard v. Simpkins, 70 Ga. 322, 325, a mere clerk was held not to be engaged in a profession or trade, and the same reasoning would exclude from the operation of this section one occupying the position of a linter in an oilmill. While such a person is, in a sense, engaged in a business, he is not engaged in a business within the meaning of this section of the Code, which applies only where the infant is carrying on a business of his own. But even if the plaintiff could be properly considered as carrying on a business, there is no evidence that he was doing so with the permission of his parent. The mere fact that an infant is working and collecting the proceeds of his labor does not show permission by his parent for him to receive for his own that which, in law, belongs to the parent. Evidence that the parent knew that he was receiving the proceeds of his own labor might be sufficient to authorize an inference that permission had been granted for him to engage in the occupation, and receive for his own use the proceeds of his labor.

8. The motion for a new trial contains numerous grounds assigning error upon the failure of the judge to charge certain propositions of law claimed to be relevant to the case; the assignments of error in some cases being upon specific extracts from the charge, and a complaint that other propositions were not charged in connection therewith. Such assignments cannot be considered.* See Roberts v. State, 114 Ga. 450, 40 S. E. 297. Many, if not all, of these assignments seek, however, to raise questions that are fully covered by the foregoing discussion, and which was rendered necessary under the general grounds of the motion. The evidence was conflicting on many material points, but there was evidence authorizing a finding that the master had failed in his duty to furnish the servant a safe place to work—that is, the place at which he was working was not safe when the seed shaker, which was a part of the machinery, and in another room, was allowed to become choked—and a recovery was therefore authorized under the amendment to the petition. There was no error in failing to submit to the jury the question as to whether the plaintiff was a volunteer in attempting to place the belt upon the shafting. He testified positively that he did this under the instruction of Graves, the defendant's superintendent; and Graves admitted that he had authority to order the plaintiff to do this work, if he had seen fit to exercise it, but testified that he did not remember whether he gave this order. A careful examination of his evidence shows that there is nothing in it which could be construed as a denial of what plaintiff testified. The charge, as a whole, appears to have fairly submitted to the jury all of the controlling issues in the case; and, if any amplification had been desired on any of the points involved, they should have been made the subject of timely written requests. We see no reason for reversing the judgment. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MACON & B. RY. CO. v. ANDERSON.

NEW TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—CONTINUANCE.

1. The ruling announced in Americus R. Co. v. Luckie, 13 S. E. 105, 87 Ga. 6, does not require the grant of a new trial because the court read to the jury Civ. Code 1895, § 2322, as a whole, thus giving in immediate connection each principle contained therein.

2. Though the negligence charged was the premature announcement of the station, it was proper for the jury to consider whether the plaintiff knew, when he went on the lower step, that the point for alighting had not been reached.

3. It was therefore proper to instruct the jury that, along with the other circumstances of the transaction, they might consider whether there was any light at the place.

4. Where it appears that the absent witness is the only disinterested person by whom the material fact can be proved, the motion for a continuance is not defective because of the failure to allege that such material fact cannot be proved by any one else.

5. In the present case, however, the showing was defective under Civ. Code 1895, § 5129 (Cobb v. State, 35 S. E. 178, 110 Ga. 314), and also because it appeared that the movant did not know what the witness would testify, and there was no affidavit from the informant or other showing that the witness did have knowledge of any fact material to the issue.

Error from Superior Court, Monroe County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by W. H. Anderson against the Macon & Birmingham Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson brought suit against the plaintiff in error for damages occasioned by a sudden start of the train while he was standing on the bottom step of the platform, claiming that he had been induced to put himself in this position by reason of the negligent and improper announcement of the station before the train reached the usual stopping place. The verdict was for the plaintiff. There was a motion for a new trial on several grounds, and, among others, that the court refused to grant a continuance on account of the absence of a witness who was on the train at the time of the occurrence, and who, the movant was informed, would testify as to certain facts material to the company's defense stated in the motion. It was stated that the only other witnesses by whom these facts could be proved were officers and employees, who were therefore in a position where it might be contended that they were not disinterested. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Cabaniss & Willingham, for plaintiff in error. Persons & Persons, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1. While it may be necessary in the same case to give in charge the principle contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 2322, and that set forth in section 3830, it would be because of the different theories raised by the evidence, and not because the defenses under the two sections are identical. Section 2322 treats of an active plaintiff who himself caused the injury. Section 3830 deals with a plaintiff who may have been passive, and may therefore not have caused, but might have avoided, the injury. Neither section is exhaustive of defenses which may be made. But relating, as they do, to different conditions, the two sections should not be charged in immediate connection one with the other, but separate and apart. The instructions on each should be adjusted to the particular issue arising from the testimony. While there is no conflict between them, to read them together is misleading, though to jurors who have not the opportunity to analyze and compare they appear to be contradictory. To say that the plaintiff cannot recover if he caused the injury (section 2322) is very clear. But to connect that with the immediate statement that the plaintiff could not recover if he could have avoided the injury, "but in other cases the defendant is not relieved, although the plaintiff may have in some way contributed to the injury" (section 3830), is calculated to make the jury think that "causing the injury" (section 2322) might be one of the "other cases" (section 3830) against which the defendant is not absolutely relieved if it appeared that, though he originally caused the injury, he might at the same time, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences. Again, to tell the jury that, if the plaintiff could have avoided the injury, he cannot recover (section 3830), and in the same breath to say that, if "both parties were at fault (section 2322), plaintiff's damages may be diminished," is likewise misleading. Ry. Co. v. Hatcher, 118 Ga. 273, 45 S. E. 239. The rule to this effect announced in Americus R. Co. v. Luckie, 87 Ga. 6, 13 S. E. 105, has several times required the grant of a new trial, where the two sections were read to the jury in immediate connection, and without proper explanation. But no case has ruled that to read the whole of either section by itself was improper. Nor, on principle, is there any reason for such a holding. Section 2322 states a principle, and then furnishes its own qualification or exception. If the charge does not cover the issues involved in the case, that is ground for other and specific assignment of error, setting out what it improperly omitted. But the assignment that "he read section 2322 as a whole, and stated in immediate connection with each other, without proper explanation, two distinct rules of law, thus qualifying the former by the latter," furnishes no reason for the grant of a new trial.

2, 3. The announcement of the station was at night. The only negligence assigned was that it was made before the regular stopping place had been reached. The motion alleges that, while the charge was abstractly correct, it was error for the court, in enumerating the circumstances to be weighed by the jury, to instruct them to consider whether there were any lights at the place. If the theory of the plaintiff was correct, it was proper for the jury to consider whether he knew of that fact when he put himself on the bottom step, and in a position where he might be injured if there was any sudden motion of the train. On this issue the question of light or no light was important.

4. The motion for a continuance may not have been defective because it failed to show that the defendant had no witness other than the one served with a subpoena, by whom the material facts stated in the motion for continuance could be established. It did appear that he was the only disinterested witness by whom it could prove these facts vitally essential to its defense. This was an important element in passing upon the sufficiency of the showing. Compare Maynard v. Cleveland, 76 Ga. 53 (3); Compton v. State, 108 Ga. 747, 32 S. E. 843; Salmons v. State, 118 Ga. 763, 45 S. E. 611.

5. In the motion for a continuance it was stated that, while the counsel for the defendant had not talked with the witness, they had had other parties to do so, and had been informed that the witness would swear to the material facts stated in the motion. In order to make a legal showing under these circumstances, it was ruled in Thompson v. State, 24 Ga. 297, that it must appear that the absent person is in fact a witness to some matter necessary to be shown, and if the movant knows of this from information only he ought to submit the affidavit of his informant. The motion was defective also in failing to meet the requirement in Civ. Code 1895, § 5129, it not being alleged that the application was not made for the purpose of delay. Cobb v. State, 110 Ga. 314, 35 S. E. 178.

The evidence was conflicting, but was sufficient to support the finding for the plaintiff. No error of law appears. The verdict was approved by the presiding judge, and this court will not interfere with his refusal to grant a new trial.

(121 Ga. 567)

FITTS v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 26, 1905.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — PUBLIC MEETINGS — REGULATION — TITLE OF ACT — CRIMINAL LAW — CONTINUANCE — CERTIORARI — ANSWER — SENTENCE.

1. The ordinance of the city of Atlanta (Municipal Code, § 1841), declaring it unlawful to hold public meetings in the streets of that city without the consent of the municipal authorities, is not unconstitutional, either because it curtails or restricts the liberty of speech, or makes an arbitrary discrimination in favor of some persons against others, or because the city had no legal power to enact it; nor is such ordinance void upon the ground that it is an unreasonable and oppressive exercise of police power.

2. The act approved December 19, 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 173), entitled "An act to amend the charter of the city of Atlanta, to wit: The act incorporating the city of Atlanta, approved February 28th, 1874," etc., and empowering the mayor and general council of such city to provide by ordinance for the regulation of public meetings and public speaking in its streets by preventing the obstruction of the same or the gathering of disorderly crowds thereon, is not violative of that provision of the Constitution which prohibits the passage of any statute containing matter different from that which is expressed in the title thereof. Sayer v. Brown, 43 S. E. 649, 119 Ga. 539, and cases cited.

3. Where it appeared that the accused violated a municipal ordinance for the previously announced purpose of testing its constitutionality, it was not error to refuse to continue the case made against him merely to give his counsel time to investigate the constitutional questions claimed to be involved therein.

4. The allegations in the petition for certiorari as to the circumstances which it was claimed disqualified the mayor, as acting recorder, to try the petitioner, were not only not verified by the answer, but were expressly denied therein. Neither did the answer verify the statements made in the petition in reference to the petitioner being required, under the sentence imposed, to work upon the public works. "Points made in a petition for certiorari, not verified by the answer of the trial judge, present nothing for determination either by the superior or the supreme court."

5. When the penalty is left by the statute to the discretion of the trial judge, within certain fixed limits, his judgment will not be disturbed upon the ground that the sentence was excessive, if the penalty imposed does not exceed the limit provided.

6. Where complaint was made in a petition for certiorari that the trial court overruled objections to the testimony of named witnesses upon designated subjects, without setting forth, either literally or in substance, the testimony to which the objections were made, an assignment of error that the court erred in overruling such objections was not well taken.

7. The certiorari was properly overruled.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

J. L. Fitts was convicted of violating a city ordinance. From an order of the superior court overruling certiorari, he brings error. Affirmed.

Alonzo Field and A. M. Brand, for plaintiff in error. James L. Mayson and W. P. Hill, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. J. L. Fitts was adjudged guilty, in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta, of violating a certain municipal ordinance, and sentence imposed on him therefor. He took the case by certiorari to the superior court, where, upon the hearing, the certiorari was overruled. Thereupon he sued out a writ of error to this court. Our learned Brother Lumpkin, who presided in the superior court, rendered an opinion in the case, which comes up in the record, and which is as follows:

"This case presents a contest of strength between 'Prof.' Fitts and a municipal ordinance of the city of Atlanta. The two are diametrically opposed to each other, and one must yield. There is no halfway ground. If the ordinance was a legal and valid ordinance, Prof. Fitts' conduct was illegal. If the professor is right, the ordinance is illegal. The ordinance is contained in the Municipal Code of 1899, and reads as follows: 'Sec. 1841. The president, chairman, or other officer, or committee of men, or any persons who desire or intend to call a public meeting of the citizens of Atlanta, for political purposes, shall notify the mayor, or chief of police, of such desire or intent, and of the time and place of meeting, before said meeting is called, and upon failure to do so, upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding fifty dollars and cost, or be imprisoned in the calaboose of the city not exceeding thirty days, in the discretion of the recorder's court; and upon receiving such notice it shall be the duty of the mayor or chief of police to attend such meeting with a sufficient police force to preserve peace and order: provided, it shall not be lawful to hold any such meeting in any of the public streets of the city of Atlanta without the consent of the mayor and council, or the mayor and chairman of the board of police commissioners of the city of Atlanta; and any person calling or holding any public meeting, in any of the streets of the city of Atlanta, without such consent, shall, upon conviction thereof in the recorder's court of said city, be fined in a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding thirty days, in the discretion of the court.' The plaintiff in certiorari appears to have made two or three speeches on the streets of Atlanta under permit or consent from the mayor and chairman of the board of police commissioners, but his permit was withdrawn. Afterwards he determined to speak on the streets either with or without a permit or consent, and, failing to obtain one, he proceeded in defiance of the ordinance and in spite of it. Handbills were issued and scattered, of which the following is a copy: 'Great Sensation! Testing a City Ordinance. Free Street Lecture on Socialism by Prof. J. L. Fitts of South Carolina. Monday, August 17th, 8 p. m., corner of Broad and Marietta streets. Prof. Fitts has been refused a permit. He will speak under the right guaranteed by the 1st Amendment to the United States Constitution, which was proposed by Jefferson and approved by Washington. If interrupted, the case will be carried to the United States Supreme Court. Shall we, who built the streets, be deprived of their use for lawfully assembling to discuss our condition and needs? Come and see. Be early and get a good place. Don't Block Sidewalks or Streets. The Committee.' The petition states that this was admitted in evidence over objection, on the ground that there was no evidence that said Fitts had it printed or circulated, and it was irrelevant; but there is no assignment of error on any such grounds, nor does the mayor verify this statement in his answer to the writ of certiorari. The answer states that, 'as part of its evidence, the city introduced the poster which Fitts scattered over the city, as set forth in paragraph 10 of the writ of certiorari.' Having gathered his crowd in a public street in the very heart of the business portion of the city, he proceeded to make his test of the ordinance, and speak without any permit or consent. At the appointed time, among those who answered his invitation were members of the police force; and, as he had announced a desire to make a test of the law, they accommodated him by arresting him when he refused to desist from speaking on the street; and on his trial in the recorder's court, the mayor, presiding, adjudged him guilty. He brings the case to this court by writ of certiorari. The assignments of error are numerous, but the leading ground of his attack upon the ordinance is, in substance, that the Constitution of the United States and of the state guaranty freedom of speech, and that under this guaranty he had a constitutional right to hold meetings and make speeches in the streets of Atlanta, and the ordinance which prevented his doing so without a permit or consent of the municipal officers was invalid. In several respects the answer of the mayor to the writ of certiorari does not agree with the petition, and, not being traversed, it must control. The petition is only taken as correct where verified by the answer. Childs v. Moran, 114 Ga. 320, 40 S. E. 271. For instance, the answer contains the following: 'On the night of the arrest of Fitts the permit had been withdrawn, but Fitts spoke in defiance of the authorities of the city, and went out into Marietta street, gathered a crowd around him, and began his speech. The sidewalk was not blocked, but the crowd gathered around Fitts in the street. The language used by Fitts was not obscene or vulgar, but on the night of his arrest he had no permit to speak, issued either from the mayor or any one else. He took a box, and placed same out upon the roadway, and, standing thereon, undertook to gather a crowd around him, and undertook to make a speech.' In the evidence of the chief of police occurred the following: 'The sidewalk was not blocked, but people had gathered around Fitts out in the street. The people in the street, of course, obstructed the street where they stood.' Another witness states that: 'The language of Fitts was not obscene, but was that calculated to arouse strife and discord and cause revolution. He represented the socialists, and seemed to be trying to convert the people to his way of thinking by a text [attacks] upon the government, legislature, capital, etc.' Further on in the answer it is stated that: 'The people gathered around him out in the street, and when they undertook to arrest Fitts a number of his sympathizers became very much excited, and it was necessary to arrest them in order to disperse the assembly.'

"The primary object of streets is for public passage. They should be kept open and unobstructed for that purpose. If damage accrues to passers by reason of improperly allowing them to be used for other purposes, the city may become liable. The streets of the city are peculiarly within the police control for the purpose of preserving and protecting their use by the public as thoroughfares. A man has many constitutional and legal rights which he cannot lawfully exercise in the streets of a city. Thus, every citizen has a right to lawfully acquire and hold personal property; but he has no right, constitutional or otherwise, to insist on storing his possessions in the street. Every man has the inalienable right to sleep and eat (if he has the edibles), but he has no constitutional right to make his bed or set his table in the street. Every man has not only the right to, but he should, bathe and cleanse himself, and change his raiment, if he has a change. This is a duty imposed by his individual constitution, if not by that of his country. But there is no constitutional right on his part to perform his ablutions or exercise the most necessary demands of his nature in the public streets. At proper times and in proper places one may make loud noises, or shoot a gun, or test his lung power vocally to a considerable extent, without offending against any law; but there is no right, inherent or constitutional, to make vociferous outcries or practice gunnery in the street. If Prof. Fitts' idea of constitutional law were correct, I see no reason why every citizen should not claim a right to use the public streets for the exercise of his trade, calling, or profession, which may be much more essential to his welfare and that of the public than speechmaking by the plaintiff in certiorari, however eloquent, and regardless of the soundness or unsoundness of his argument.

"If the Constitution, state or federal, guarantees to Prof. Fitts the right to make public speeches on the streets of Atlanta, why does it not also guaranty the same right to every lecturer who may not desire to hire a hall, and to every showman who wishes to exhibit on the highway, or to every mechanic, artisan, merchant, or other citizen the right to ply his lawful vocation in the public thoroughfare? The constitutional right to exercise one's lawful vocation is quite as sacred, and often more important, than the right to make speeches; but the exercise of either right must yield to the municipal power properly exercised over the streets for the primary objects for which they were established. If every one who has some constitutional right has also the constitutional right to exercise it in the streets of a city regardless of municipal regulations, these thoroughfares may soon become a gathering place of a numerous clan rivaling those adjuncts of modern exhibitions which, since the term was used during the Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893, have come to be distinguished by the name of 'Midway Plaisance.' The right of the public in regard to the streets is to use them for passage as public highways, provided they are used lawfully for that purpose. But even the right of passage is subject to reasonable legislative regulations for the general good. Thus, idling and loitering in the public streets has generally been prohibited, and no one has yet doubted the constitutionality of such legislation.

"In the handbill above referred to, the question is asked, 'Shall we, who built the streets, be deprived of their use for lawfully assembling to discuss our conditions and needs?' Who comprise the 'committee' signing this handbill, or whether Prof. Fitts was a part of it or all of it, does not appear. But as it is shown that he was from another state, and, so far as disclosed, neither a citizen, taxpayer, property owner, nor resident of Atlanta, it is not quite clear how this question has any relevancy, or how he was one of the 'we' who built the streets of the city or how he derived any peculiar right to use them as a forum or lecture hall because they have cost the municipality or the taxpayers or the abutting property owners money to pave or repair or keep in order for public travel. I fear that Prof. Fitts has confused in his mind the constitutional right of freedom of speech with an imaginary, though nonexistent, right to hold public meetings and make speeches in the public streets regardless of municipal law or regulations. It is true that under an ordinance prohibiting speaking on the streets without a permit, and a charge that he violated such ordinance, the defendant could not be convicted of the offense of obstructing the streets arising under another ordinance, although he might be guilty of both offenses; but in considering the reasonableness or propriety of the ordinance on the subject of speaking on the public streets, and the necessity of police regulation and control of that subject, the liability to cause obstructions in the streets interfering with public passage and causing disorder is a matter for consideration. Neither the prohibition placed on Congress by the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States, whereby it was declared that 'Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech,' nor the provision of the Constitution of this state which declares that no law shall be passed curtailing or restraining the liberty of speech, confers any constitutional right to gather crowds and make public orations in the streets of a city regardless of the municipal control over them.

"If, then, the plaintiff in certiorari (the defendant in the recorder's court) had no absolute or constitutional right to use the public streets of Atlanta as a place to gather an audience and speak, is the ordinance void on the ground that it makes an arbitrary discrimination in favor of some against others, because it requires a permit or consent to be obtained, and prohibits holding public meetings on the streets without one? Under the general powers usually conferred on cities, or what is sometimes spoken of as the 'general welfare clause' in municipal charters, the corporate authorities could pass reasonable regulations for the preservation and keeping of their streets open and unobstructed for travel and preventing disorder upon them. Not content with this general power, the city of Atlanta obtained an amendment to its charter in 1893, which contains the following language: "The mayor and general council of said city of Atlanta is empowered to provide by ordinance, for the regulation of public meetings and public speaking in the streets of said city of Atlanta by preventing the obstruction of the streets of said city or the gathering of disorderly crowds in said streets." City Code of 1899, 48. The ordinance quoted above does not, on its face, make any discrimination, or say that certain persons, or persons of certain classes, might speak on the streets and certain others should not do so. It says that none shall do so without a permit or consent from certain officers. By its own terms it is not discriminative. Is it invalid because it requires a permit or consent before any person shall be allowed to speak on the streets, or because it provides for the granting of such permit by the mayor and chairman of the board of police commissioners? Counsel for plaintiff in certiorari have cited but one case on this subject—that of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356-374, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, 1065, 30 L. Ed. 220. In that case an ordinance was passed which contained the following provision: "Section 1. It shall be unlawful, from and after the passage of this ordinance, for any person or persons to establish, maintain or carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the city or county of San Francisco, without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone." Other sections of the ordinance prohibited the erection or maintaining of any scaffolding on any building without obtaining written permission of the board of supervisors, and provided punishment for a violation of the ordinance. Yick Wo and others were imprisoned for violating this ordinance. The case arose on the application for a writ of habeas corpus. On the return of the writ and the hearing then had the evidence plainly showed that the great majority of the laundries in the city were operated by Chinamen in wooden buildings; that the board of supervisors arbitrarily refused to consent for them to continue to do business in these wooden buildings, although a similar right was granted to Caucasians. Yick Wo showed that he had a city license which had not expired; that he had been engaged in the laundry business in the same premises and building for twenty-two years previously; that he had a license from the board of fire wardens, which showed that they had inspected the premises, and found all proper arrangements for carrying on the business; that the stove, washing and drying apparatus, etc., were in good condition, and their use not dangerous to the surrounding property from fire; and that all proper precautions had been taken to comply with the provisions of the ordinance in respect to the fire limits and making regulations concerning the erecting and use of buildings in the city; and also that he had a certificate from the health officer showing that the premises had been inspected by him, and found to be sufficiently and properly drained, and that all proper arrangements for carrying on the business of a laundry without injury to the sanitary conditions of the neighborhood had been complied with. Under the facts disclosed, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the ordinance and its administration were evidently intended to discriminate against the Chinese on account of their race, and that it was an arbitrary effort to drive them out of business in favor of their Caucasian rivals. The following extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Matthews will serve to indicate the real basis of the decision: "It appears that both petitioners have complied with every requisite deemed by the law or the public officers charged with its administration necessary for the protection of neighboring property from fire, or as a precaution against injury to the public health. No reason whatever, except the will of the supervisors, is assigned why they should not be permitted to carry on, in the accustomed manner, their harmless and useful occupation, on which they depend for a livelihood. And while this consent of the supervisors is withheld from them and from two hundred others, who have also petitioned, all of whom happen to be Chinese subjects, eighty others, not Chinese subjects, are permitted to carry on the same business under similar conditions. The fact of this discrimination is admitted. No reason for it is shown, and the conclusion cannot be resisted that no reason for it exists except hostility to the race and nationality to which petitioners belonged, and which, in the eye of the law, is not justified." That imprisonment under an ordinance, the object of which was to drive out of business and prevent from exercising a legitimate and useful calling a number of persons, merely because they were Chinese, in the interest of competitors of another race, was illegal, presents a very different question from that involved in the present case; nor does the ruling that, although the ordinance involved may have been fair and impartial in appearance, yet, if it was administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances material to their rights, imprisonment so brought about was illegal, control the present case. Here no business or useful occupation, established or to be established, was involved. The right of a man to ply his trade or business occupying property owned or rented by him, by which he serves the public and earns an honest livelihood, is very different from the alleged right contended for in this case to hold meetings and make public speeches in the public streets of the city. The municipal authorities did not prohibit Prof. Fitts from speaking altogether, but prohibited him from holding public meetings and speaking in the streets without a permit or consent, and he was convicted when he did so with the express purpose of violating the municipal ordinance and asserting an alleged right which he did not have. One who gathers a crowd in a public street under the invitation expressed in a handbill, announces an intention to violate and test a police regulation, mounts a box, and insists on speaking, though requested to desist by the authorities, can hardly claim to be in the same category with those who pursue lawful and useful occupations, and who desire to use property owned or rented by them in the conduct of their legitimate business.

"In Massachusetts v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 19 N. E. 224, 2 L. R. A. 142, 12 Am. St. Rep. 566, a rule was passed by the board of police forbidding singing or playing or performing on instruments in the streets without the license of the board of police. A member of the Salvation Army, playing on a musical instrument, contested the rule, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court. In the decision it was held that 'it is not an unconstitutional delegation of power for the Legislature to authorize a city council to empower the city board of police to make rules and regulations with reference to itinerant musicians'; and that the constitutional right of freedom of worship did not prevent the adoption of reasonable rules for the use of the streets. In the case of City of Centralia v. Smith, 77 S. W. 488 (Court of Appeals of Kansas City), it was held that a city ordinance prohibiting the explosion of firecrackers without the written consent of the mayor is within the police power of the city. 'A city ordinance prohibiting the explosion of firecrackers without the written consent of the mayor is not void as a delegation of legislative power to the mayor.' * * * Without discussing this fully, it may be said that, of course, if the statute itself were unconstitutional, or the administration of the law were in excess of the authority, or in violation of the Constitution, the ruling might be otherwise. See, also, Kansas City v. Martin (Mo. Sup.) 9 Mun. Corp. Cas. 882, 68 S. W. 1037; Kennedy v. Mayor (R. I.) 9 Mun. Corp. Cas. 871, 53 Atl. 317; Broadbent v. Revere (Mass.) 10 Mun. Corp. Cas. 452, 66 N. E. 607.

"There was nothing on the face of this ordinance to stamp it as unconstitutional. When a case of capricious, malicious, or arbitrary action arises, the courts will deal with it as the law requires; but I do not think that this is one of them. The answer of the mayor to the writ of certiorari shows that there was ample room for the legitimate exercise of discretion in refusing a permit to the plaintiff in certiorari; and the manner in which he proceeded to get up his crowd in the street, and the disorder which the answer of the mayor shows followed when the police sought to cause him to desist, indicate that there may have been good grounds for the way in which the discretion was exercised. While he may have been guilty of no actual acts of disorder himself, yet the gathering of the crowd in the street for the express purpose of violating the municipal ordinance, the practical dare to the municipal authorities to interfere with him, and the disorder occurring when they did so, as well as the other evidence in the case, indicate that the exercise of the discretion on the part of the mayor and chairman of the board in refusing the permit was not so arbitrary or capricious as to warrant a finding that either the ordinance or the administration of it was unconstitutional. In Montross v. State, 72 Ga. 261 (5), 53 Am. Rep. 840, it is said: 'Every person is presumed to intend the natural and legal consequence of his conduct; and where the agent of a newspaper, knowing of the law of this state against circulating obscene literature, violated it for the express purpose of making a test case or of vindicating the character of his paper, and to insure a prosecution sought the chief of police, and gave him copies of the paper, he cannot complain that he succeeded in obtaining a prosecution, or that the court, in its charge, did him injustice as to the intent with which he committed the act, although the result of his experiment was different from that which he anticipated.' In the present case not only were the handbills referred to scattered, but the plaintiff in certiorari gave written notice to the mayor of his intention to speak on the streets of Atlanta, in spite of the fact that he had no permit or consent. I hold that no constitutional right of the plaintiff in certiorari has been violated.

"There was no error in refusing the motion for a continuance under the facts set out in the mayor's answer. Nor was there any error on the part of the mayor in holding that he was not disqualified to preside, under the statements in the answer. The ordinance was not void for any of the reasons assigned, nor was the sentence so excessive as to be illegal under the facts of the case. Whitten v. State, 47 Ga. 297. Nor does the answer of the mayor verify the statements of the plaintiff as to the sentence. Childs v. Moran, 114 Ga. 320 (2), 40 S. E. 271.

"The assignment of error in regard to the admission of evidence concerning the former speeches and conduct of the plaintiff in certiorari might be disregarded on the ground that it is too vague and general, and lacking in specification. But if it be considered that he sought to attack the conduct of the mayor and the chairman of the board of police commissioners on the ground that in denying him a permit they acted arbitrarily and capriciously, it was legitimate to show his previous conduct and language, and the circumstances under which the municipal authorities exercised the authority vested in them.

"Upon the whole case I am of opinion that the certiorari should be overruled, and the judgment of the mayor allowed to stand; and an order will be entered accordingly."

In our opinion, the reasoning and authorities cited in the foregoing opinion clearly establish the conclusions therein stated, and the certiorari was properly overruled.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

PARTIES—ACTION BY USE—NONSUIT—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—AMENDMENT.

1. The rule in actions ex contractu by which the name of the original plaintiff may be stricken, and the cause allowed to proceed in the name of the usee, if the latter has a legal right to maintain the suit (Wilson v. Church, 58 Ga. 554), does not apply to actions ex delicto. Willis v. Burch, 42 S. E. 718, 116 Ga. 375.

2. This being an action in tort by M. & Co., for the use of E. & M., and there being no proof that the original plaintiffs had been damaged, the court properly granted a nonsuit.

3. There was no error in refusing to permit an amendment striking the name of M. & Co., and substituting the names of E. & M. as plaintiffs.

CITY OF ALBANY v. CAMERON & BARKLEY CO.

PLEADING—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONTRACT OF GUARANTY.

1. The character of an action is determined by the facts recited in the petition, and the nature of the relief prayed, and not by the particular phraseology employed by the pleader; and, where a petition sets out substantially a cause of action of a given kind, a new and distinct cause of action is not added by an amendment striking out words which inaccurately describe the transaction declared on.

2. A contractor was under contract with the city of Albany to bore for it an artesian well. In order to obtain materials necessary to the completion of his contract, he requested the municipal authorities to pay to a dealer in such materials a portion of the amount that would be due him on the completion of his contract, up to a certain amount. This sum was in payment for materials already bought, but not paid for, as well as for materials subsequently to be purchased. The city agreed to do this, and so notified the dealer, who furnished the materials on the faith of this agreement. There was no obligation on the part of the city to pay any money unless the contract was fulfilled, and it was distinctly understood that the money to be paid was only a part of that which would be due to the contractor. Held, that the agreement of the city was not a contract of guaranty or suretyship, and was not in contravention of article 7, § 6, par. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1895, § 5891), and that a demurrer to a petition containing such allegations was properly overruled.

Error from Superior Court, Dougherty County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by the Cameron & Barkley Company against the city of Albany. From an order overruling the demurrer to the petition, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

D. F. Crossland, for plaintiff in error. Wooten & Hofmayer, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This case comes up on exceptions to the overruling of a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, and to the allowance of an amendment over the objection of the defendant that it set up a new and distinct cause of action. The petition makes substantially the following case: Joyce had contracted to bore an artesian well for the city of Albany, and, as an incident to the fulfillment of his contract, had become indebted to the Cameron & Barkley Company, a South Carolina corporation, on account of material used in the well. After having bored several hundred feet without obtaining a flow of water, it became necessary to change the casing, as that being used was too large to permit of further penetration of the soil, and the contract between the city and Joyce was amended accordingly. Joyce then sought to obtain further supplies from the Cameron & Barkley Company, but that company refused to furnish him any more material unless the city of Albany would agree to protect it against loss on the material that it had already furnished Joyce, as well as on whatever other material he might obtain from it to be used in the construction of the well. Joyce then communicated with the city authorities in writing as follows: "The Cameron & Barkley Company, of Charleston, S. C., furnished me with a lot of 10" drive pipe now in the well in your city; and as I am negotiating with them for the purchase of 7½ well casing necessary to complete the well, and in order to secure them for a balance still due them on the 10" pipe, as well as for the 7½ casing I now need, I wish to make the following arrangement with you in reference to payments which you have for [me] in the future. The amount that I will owe them, including this old balance, as well as for the casing to be ordered, will not be less than $1,500; and I desire that on all future payments that you have for me on account of this well, that you will make over to them half of said amounts; for instance, when the next payment becomes due, you may settle with me for 65%, whatever that amounts to, and send them half of it. In other words, you are to protect them to the extent of $1,500 for material they are to furnish, provided, of course, that I fulfill my agreement with you, and that said amounts are coming to me. Please write them to the above extent and under the above condition." This communication was submitted to the city council, and, from a certified copy of an extract from the minutes of that body attached to the petition, it appears that on motion it was "agreed to, provided the pipe weighed not less than 20 lbs. to foot, and the clerk instructed to notify the Cameron & Barkley Co." The plaintiff was duly notified of the action of the city authorities, and, upon the faith of that action, furnished Joyce with materials as ordered, until he became indebted to it in a sum stated in the petition. Joyce has completed his contract, having obtained a flowing well, and the city has paid him $4,806.74, leaving a balance due of $1,443.26—more than enough to pay the amount due the plaintiff. Joyce is insolvent, a bankrupt, and a nonresident; and the plaintiff sues the city to recover the purchase price of the materials ordered by him, and used in the construction of the well.

In one paragraph of the petition it was alleged that the city, "wishing to have the aforesaid well completed, and knowing that said Joyce was unable to purchase the aforesaid material without its guaranty, agreed to the terms of the communication from said Joyce," etc. The amendment, the allowance of which is assigned as error, substituted for the word "guaranty" the words "agreement hereinafter stated"; the objection being that the amendment changed the suit from one on a guaranty to one based on an undertaking by the city to be bound by an assignment to the plaintiff by Joyce of certain amounts thereafter to become due him. The demurrer was upon the grounds (1) that the petition set forth no cause of action; and (2, 3) that the suit was one upon a contract of guaranty, which was illegal, void, ultra vires, and in contravention of article 7, § 6, par. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1895, § 5891).

If, in reality, the agreement relied upon by the plaintiff as the basis of a recovery was not a contract of guaranty, the mere incidental use of that word in describing the transaction would not make the petition a suit upon such a contract, and the allowance of the amendment was not erroneous. In other words, the transaction speaks for itself, regardless of the terminology employed by the pleader; and as he is not bound in his petition to classify his action (McNorrill v. Daniel, 121 Ga. —, 48 S. E. 681), he will be allowed to amend his pleading in order to correct any looseness of phraseology that it may contain. And we are decidedly of the opinion that the contract declared on was not one of suretyship or guaranty, but was merely an agreement on the part of the city to be bound by an assignment by Joyce of money that might afterwards become due him. A guaranty is an obligation to pay the debt of another on consideration of a benefit flowing to the guarantor. 6 Enc. Dig. 811, citing Civ. Code 1895, § 2966; Manry v. Waxelbaum, 108 Ga. 17, 33 S. E. 701. Except incidentally, there was no obligation on the part of the city in this case to pay the plaintiff any debt due it by Joyce. Until Joyce fulfilled his contract, and the city became indebted to him, it could under no circumstances become liable to the plaintiff. It undertook to pay not a dollar in addition to the sum for which it would be bound in any event. It merely agreed, with the consent of the contractor, and at his request, to divert a part of the amount which it would be due him upon the fulfillment of his contract, and pay it to the plaintiff. We cannot see that it makes any difference that the sum sued for was made up partly of money that Joyce already owed the plaintiff at the time the agreement was made by the city, and partly of an indebtedness that arose subsequently thereto. We know of no legal obstacle to prevent a municipal corporation from consenting to an assignment by a contractor with whom it has business relations of money that will eventually be due him by the city; and when, on the faith of such consent, money is advanced or property furnished to the contractor, the city is, in law and good conscience, bound to see that the money is returned, or the property paid for, within the amount assigned. The demurrer to the petition was properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

ALLEN v. TAYLOR.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

COVENANT OF WARRANTY—CONSTRUCTION—DEMURRER TO PETITION—NEW TRIAL.

1. In an action on a warranty contained in a deed, it is not a good ground of demurrer that "it appears affirmatively in plaintiff's said petition that the title to the property embraced in the deed from defendant to plaintiff's grantor has been adjudicated adversely to plaintiff upon the ground and theory that it was conveyed by the wife of [a brother of defendant] to this defendant, and by defendant to plaintiff's grantor, in payment of a debt due by said [brother of defendant] to plaintiff's grantor, * * * and was therefore void in law as against said wife": the defendant claiming that by reason of these facts the plaintiff is estopped to sue on the warranty in the deed.

2. A general warranty of title in a deed "includes in itself covenants of a right to sell," and "covers defects in the title, though known to the purchaser at the time of taking the deed." Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3614, 3615; Miller v. Desverges, 75 Ga. 407; Godwin v. Maxwell, 106 Ga. 194, 32 S. E. 114; Founte v. Elder, 109 Ga. 713, 35 S. E. 118; McCall v. Wilkes, 121 Ga. —, 49 S. JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—PAYMENT OF COSTS—
DISMISSAL—CERTIORARI—UNSWORN
PLEA—FINAL JUDGMENT.

1. Where a case is appealed to a jury in a justice's court, the payment of the costs which accrued on the first trial is a matter between the magistrate and the appellant, and does not concern the opposite party. Where the magistrate refuses to dismiss the appeal because such costs have not been paid, this amounts to a waiver of his right to have the costs paid in advance, and the appellee has no right to complain of the refusal to dismiss the appeal. Gibson v. Cook, 43 S. E. 72, 116 Ga. 817.

2. Where, in a suit in a justice's court upon an open account, which was proved by the affidavit of the plaintiff, the defendant's answer had not been verified by affidavit, the judge of the superior court properly held upon certiorari that it was error for the magistrate, over the objection of the plaintiff, to allow the defendant to introduce evidence in support of such unsworn plea. Civ. Code 1895, § 4130.

3. Inasmuch, however, as such plea may be amended by swearing to it (Barnes v. Coker, 37 S. E. 104, 112 Ga. 187), it was error for the judge of the superior court upon certiorari to enter up final judgment for the plaintiff. The case should have been remanded for retrial in the justice's court.

1. The death of a prominent member of the bar shortly before the time for convening a term of a court governed by the same laws and rules of pleading, practice, and procedure as the superior court is not such cause as will legally authorize the judge in vacation to adjourn the term of the court. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4342-4344; Hoyer v. State, 39 Ga. 718.

2. Where a judge in vacation passes an illegal order adjourning the next term of court, and, in accordance with such order, that term was not held at the regular time, in a case in which such term was the appearance term the defendant may file his plea or answer as late as the following term of the court, or at any time prior thereto. Bowden v. Hatcher, 9 S. E. 724, 83 Ga. 78.

3. Where the May term of the court was the appearance term of the case, but was illegally adjourned until June, at which time the defendant filed his answer, the next regular term of the court being in August, such answer is in time. It was therefore erroneous for the court, several terms later, to strike such answer as having been filed too late, and the court properly corrected this error when, on the same day, defendant was allowed to refile his answer.

—AMENDMENT.

1. A bond given for the purpose of appealing a case from the county court to the superior court recited that the appellant "brings G. D. Lovett, and tenders him as security, and they, the said [appellant] as principal, and Gordon Alderman as security, hereby acknowledge themselves bound to the plaintiff * * * for the eventual condemnation money in said case." The bond was signed by the appellant as principal and by Lovett as security, but was not signed by Alderman. Held, that this was a good appeal bond, and Lovett was bound thereon as security, although the name of Alderman appeared in the face of the bond as acknowledging himself bound as security, and was not signed to the bond. Even if this were not so, the bond was amendable, the defect being a mere irregularity. It was therefore error to dismiss the appeal. Kimbrough v. Pitts, 63 Ga. 496; Hendrix v. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS—PARTIES—ABATEMENT—AMENDMENT OF PLEA—LIFE INSURANCE—WAGERING CONTRACT.

1. Though a suit may have been brought by one of two executors against his coexecutor and another alleged to be jointly interested with him in defeating a valid demand of the estate represented by the plaintiff, yet, if it appears from the facts brought out at the trial that the executor named as a defendant really has no personal interest in the outcome of the litigation, he may, upon the death of the plaintiff after the case has come to this court for review, be substituted in his stead as the party entitled to represent the interests of his testator's estate.

2. Where such a suit is brought, the executor alleged to have personal interests inimical to those of the estate should be named as a party defendant in his individual capacity, as he cannot properly be joined as a party plaintiff in his representative capacity.

3. Notwithstanding a defendant may file a plea in abatement at the first term, he cannot, by way of amendment to the plea at the trial term, set up new and distinct grounds why the action should abate, unless the plaintiff has so amended his pleadings as for the first time to make available the matters of defense sought to be urged by an amendment to the defendant's plea.

4. A mistake made in alleging the date on which an instrument was executed may ordinarily be cured by appropriate amendment.

5. Irrespective of whether the holder of a policy of insurance on his own life may legally sell and assign the policy to one having no insurable interest in his life, the policy holder is certainly not at liberty to make the policy the subject-matter of a purely wagering and speculative contract between himself and a person having no interest therein.

6. By express statute in this state, money paid or property delivered up in pursuance of a gaming contract may be recovered from the winner by the loser, if suit therefor be instituted within six months after the loss.

7. The verdict which the court directed the jury to return was demanded under the law and the undisputed evidence, regardless of testimony admitted over the objection of the complaining party; and the testimony which he offered, but which was rejected by the court, was not such as would have authorized any other result.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by one Toll and others against D. D. Quillian. Judgment for plaintiff, and both parties bring error. On the death of Toll, L. M. Johnson was substituted. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and reversed on cross-bill.

Lumpkin & Burnett and F. A. Quillian, for Quillian. S. H. Sibley, Jno. C. Hart, and G. C. Thomas, for Johnson.

EVANS, J. On April 15, 1902, the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company issued to Grigsby E. Thomas, Jr., a policy on his life for $10,000, payable at his death to his executors, administrators, or assigns. On February 11, 1903, Thomas executed a written assignment of the policy, reciting that for value received he assigned all his interest therein to D. D. Quillian, subject to any indebtedness thereon to the company; and on April 27th the secretary of the company indorsed upon this instrument the company's recognition of this assignment of the policy. Thomas died on the date last mentioned, and Quillian subsequently prepared and submitted to the insurance company proofs of death. Neither the policy nor the written assignment thereof was delivered by Thomas to Quillian, but both were placed in the hands of L. M. Johnson, a local agent of the company, in pursuance of the terms of a contemporaneous writing executed by Quillian, of which the following is a copy: "Athens, Ga., February 11th, 1903. Know all men by these presents that whereas Grigsby E. Thomas, Jr., has a policy of insurance on his life, No. 326,547 in the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company of Newark, New Jersey, and a quarterly premium thereon, amounting to $151.52, due January 15th, with 30 days grace allowed by the Company, and whereas the said Thomas has requested Dr. D. D. Quillian to pay said premium for him, in case he does not do so by February 15, 1903, and for valuable considerations has assigned said policy to said Quillian: Now this agreement witnesseth that I, the said Quillian, in the considerations aforesaid, agree to pay said premium on said policy on or before February 15th, 1903, and agree that L. M. Johnson shall hold said assignment for 90 days, and that said Thomas has the privilege of repaying said premium within said specified time; then the assignment is to be returned to him. In the event he fails to pay the said premium within the 90 days, then the policy and the assignment is left to said Quillian, to do as he deems best with it. Should the said Thomas die within the ninety days specified, the said Quillian agrees to pay the minor children of the said Thomas, to-wit: Grigsby E. Thomas, IV, and Marie Virginia Thomas: the sum of $1,000.00 each out of the proceeds of said policy, and further agrees to pay L. M. Johnson the amount due him by said Thomas. Promissory notes given therefor by said Thomas. [Signed] D. D. Quillian. Witness: L. M. Johnson." There was, in point of fact, no consideration for the assignment of the policy other than the promise of Quillian to pay the past-due quarterly premium, which he afterwards fulfilled, and his agreement to pay out of the proceeds of the policy, in the event of the death of Thomas within the 90-day period, $1,000 each to the children named, and his outstanding indebtedness to Johnson, evidenced by promissory notes, amounting to something like $1,300. After Thomas died, Quillian did, on May 7, 1903, pay to Johnson the amount due on these notes. During the last illness of Thomas a futile attempt was made by some of his friends to see Quillian and redeem the policy; and after his death, but still within the ninety-day period named in the above-quoted writing, an effort was made by I. H. Toll, as executor of Thomas, to procure a surrender of the policy by paying Quillian the amount of the quarterly premium he had advanced and such other demands as he might have against the estate of Thomas. Quillian declined to treat with Toll, saying he had purchased the policy from Thomas, and, under the terms of sale agreed on between them, the policy belonged to him (Quillian), and the estate of Thomas had no interest therein.

On May 8, 1903, the widow of Thomas, in behalf of herself and as next friend for two minor children, joined with Toll, his executor, in a petition to the superior court of Clark county, the purpose of which was to prevent Quillian from collecting the proceeds of the policy from the insurance company, and to invoke a decision of the court as to what interest, if any, Quillian had in the policy or its proceeds. The company and two of its agents, Angier and Johnson, were made co-parties defendant with Quillian, the plaintiffs alleging that the company was about to pay the proceeds of the policy to Quillian through these agents, and praying that it and its agents be enjoined from carrying this purpose into effect. The insurance company, after the court had granted the restraining order prayed for, filed an answer in which it offered to pay the amount due on the policy into the registry of the court, to be paid out under its direction to the party entitled thereto, and in which it asked to be discharged upon so doing. By consent of the parties at interest, the insurance company paid this amount over to a banking institution, to be held by it to await the final decree of the court, and an order was taken dismissing the company and its agents as parties defendant. Later, L. M. Johnson was made a party defendant in his individual capacity, and the names of Mrs. Thomas and her children were stricken from the petition, so that the action proceeded in the name of Toll, executor, as sole plaintiff, against Quillian and Johnson. Quillian alone filed pleadings in resistance of the action. A trial was had on the merits, and after the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict as to what disposition should be made of the fund in controversy as between the plaintiff and Quillian, and a judgment in accordance with this verdict was duly entered. Quillian thereupon sued out a bill of exceptions to this court, wherein he complains of the direction of this verdict, and assigns error upon various rulings made by the court during the progress of the trial. The plaintiff below then sued out a cross-bill of exceptions, making complaint of a ruling adverse to him. On the call of the case in this court, his death was suggested of record, and counsel for Quillian asked that an order be passed making the coexecutor of Toll a party in his stead, his coexecutor being L. M. Johnson, who was named as such in the will of Thomas and who had duly qualified. Counsel representing Mrs. Thomas and her minor children appeared and objected to this substitution, on the ground that Johnson was an adverse party in the court below, and his interests were inimical to those of the estate of Thomas, and for this reason counsel asked that Mrs. Thomas, in her own behalf and as next friend of her minor children, be made a party in lieu of Toll, the deceased executor. Upon the question thus presented this court reserved its decision, and counsel for the parties at interest were permitted to argue the case on its merits.

1. The logical party to represent the estate of Thomas in this court is his surviving executor, L. M. Johnson, provided he is in a position where he can, in justice to himself and to that estate, undertake to do so. Upon examination of the brief of the evidence, we find that, before this suit was instituted, Quillian had paid to Johnson the entire amount due on the promissory notes he held against Thomas, and that Johnson is not liable thereon as an indorser, having merely marked the notes "Paid," and surrendered the same to Quillian. Indeed, Quillian testified that there had been a final settlement between himself and Johnson touching the latter's interest in the proceeds of the policy, and that he no longer had any interest whatever in the policy or in the result of this litigation. Johnson did not defend the action, nor, so far as appears, take any active part in the proceedings, other than to appear as a witness. He suffers no personal liability under the judgment rendered, gets no benefit therefrom, nor would he be benefited were it to be set aside. The interest of the estate is that this judgment be affirmed; and, in the event of its affirmance, the litigation will be at an end, and Johnson, in his capacity as surviving executor, will be entitled to receive the fund which, under that judgment, was awarded to Toll, his deceased coexecutor, who was the plaintiff below. Such being the truth of the matter, as disclosed by the record before us, we see no reason why Johnson is disqualified from performing his full duty as executor, relatively to this litigation, and we have accordingly passed an order making him, in that capacity, a party defendant to the main bill of exceptions and a party plaintiff to the cross-bill, in lieu of Toll, who occupied a similar relation to the case at the time it reached this court.

2. At the appearance term of the case, Quillian filed a plea in abatement, therein alleging that L. M. Johnson was a coexecutor of the plaintiff Toll, and, as such, a necessary party plaintiff to the case. This plea was stricken on demurrer, after an amendment had been allowed to the plaintiff's petition, in which amendment the plaintiff charged that Johnson was jointly interested with Quillian, and was acting in concert with him, in claiming the proceeds of the policy under the assignment thereof made by Thomas to Quillian. In view of this contention the trial judge rightly ruled that, because of personal interest, Johnson was not a proper plaintiff as a coexecutor, but was properly made a codefendant in his individual capacity. See McLendon v. Woodward, 25 Ga. 252; Sheehan v. Kennelly, 32 Ga. 145; Lamar v. Lamar, 118 Ga. 691, 45 S. E. 493.

3. At the trial term Quillian offered an amendment to his plea in abatement, whereby he sought for the first time to attack the judgment of the court of ordinary appointing Toll one of the executors of the Thomas estate; the contention being that Toll was a nonresident of Georgia, that he had no such interest in the estate as would authorize his appointment as executor, and that these facts appeared on the face of the record in the ordinary's court, and its judgment was therefore a mere nullity. The plaintiff urged the objection that this amendment came too late, being offered at the second term of the case. The court overruled this objection, but, on demurrer, dismissed the amended plea on the ground that the proceedings in the court of ordinary were regular on their face, and that its judgment was not open to collateral attack. A plea in abatement is essentially a dilatory plea, and must therefore be filed, if at all, at the first term. Civ. Code 1895, § 5058. Entirely new and distinct grounds for abating an action cannot, of course be set up at the trial term under the guise of an amendment to a plea in abatement filed in due time; a party cannot accomplish by indirection what the law declares it is not his privilege to do at all. But counsel for Quillian insist that, as the plaintiff was allowed to amend his petition at the trial term, the petition was thereby opened to either demurrer or plea at that term. Civ. Code 1895, § 5063. This position is not well taken, however, as that section declares that an "immaterial amendment does not so open the petition" to new and distinct defenses, and this court has held that an amendment which does not so change a plaintiff's petition as for the first time to make a particular defense available is not to be regarded "material," within the meaning of the section just cited. O'Connor v. Brucker, 117 Ga. 451, 43 S. E. 731; So. Bell Tel. Co. v. Parker, 119 Ga. 721 (4), 47 S. E. 194. It is true that Quillian demurred to the original petition on the ground that it did not distinctly allege in what capacity Toll brought suit, and the plaintiff without invoking any ruling of the court as to this point, voluntarily amended his petition so as to relieve the matter of all doubt. But this amendment was really needless and useless, for the petition, as originally framed, in terms alleged that Toll was "a duly qualified executor of the will of Grigsby E. Thomas, Jr.," lately deceased. It follows that the amendment to the plea in abatement was improperly allowed. Error is assigned in the cross-bill of exceptions upon its allowance, while in the main bill complaint is made that the court subsequently struck the plea on demurrer. The decision made on the question presented by the cross-bill necessarily controls the question raised by the main bill, so that the latter question need not be specifically dealt with. Monroe v. Lippman Bros., 115 Ga. 164, 41 S. E. 717.

4. In describing the policy of insurance which was the subject-matter of controversy, the plaintiff alleged that it was issued to Thomas in 1901. In point of fact, the policy was dated April 15, 1902. When it was offered in evidence by the plaintiff (it having theretofore been in the custody of the defendants), counsel for Quillian objected to its admission on the ground that it was not the paper referred to in plaintiff's petition. The plaintiff thereupon offered to amend his pleadings by alleging the correct date on which the policy was issued, but Quillian objected to the proposed amendment on the ground that the policy offered in evidence "was a different contract of insurance from that originally sued on," and on the further ground that the plaintiff "was seeking to set forth a new and distinct cause of action." The presiding judge very properly treated these objections as trivial, and permitted the plaintiff to amend his petition and then introduce the policy. The policy being otherwise sufficiently described in the original petition, it was not necessary that the plaintiff should allege the date on which it was issued; and any mistake which he may have made in setting forth its date could be cured by appropriate amendment, either by way of striking from his petition an incorrect statement as to the time when Thomas procured the policy, or by inserting the correct date in lieu of that stated. The policy was not "declared on," but its retention by the defendants under a pretended claim of right was alleged by way of inducement to show the plaintiff's right to the relief for which he prayed.

5. The case turns upon the interpretation to be given the written agreement, set out in full in the foregoing statement of facts, whereby Quillian undertook, upon the conditions therein stated, to advance to Thomas the money with which to pay a past-due quarterly premium on the policy. This agreement and the assignment of the policy were executed contemporaneously, and are to be regarded as evidencing the contract between the respective parties, inasmuch as the written agreement, signed by Quillian, discloses upon what terms the assignment of the policy, signed by Thomas, was executed and delivered to Johnson. It is conceded that Quillian had no insurable interest in the life of Thomas at the time this contract was entered into. The former, however, insists that as the policy was taken out by Thomas on his own life, in which he undoubtedly had an insurable interest, the policy itself did not evidence any wagering contract, and that Thomas had a right to assign it to whomsoever he saw fit, by way of gift or in pursuance of a contract of sale or pledge. In support of this position, the cases of Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 34 S. E. 317, 46 L. R. A. 424, 77 Am. St. Rep. 350, and Ancient Order United Workmen v. Brown, 112 Ga. 545, 37 S. E. 890, are cited and relied on. The decision in neither of these cases was rendered by a full bench. As to the correctness of the doctrine on which these decisions were based, the writer is not committed, nor does he wish to be understood as now expressing any opinion on the subject. Suffice it to say that it does not follow, from the recognition given of that doctrine, that one who holds a policy of insurance on his own life has any legal right to make it the subject-matter of a wagering contract with another person, whether such person has or has not an insurable interest in his life. See Exchange Bank v. Loh, 104 Ga. 446, 81 S. E. 459, 44 L. R. A. 372; Morris v. Georgia Co., 109 Ga. 12, 34 S. E. 378, 46 L. R. A. 506. The court below held that the agreement between Quillian and Thomas was a wagering or speculative contract, pure and simple, and could not for that reason be enforced at the instance of the former. This was, we think, the correct view of the matter, whether the writing be construed by itself or in connection with the oral evidence submitted at the trial, which left the intention of the parties free from all doubt. If Thomas did not die within the 90-day period, he could, but was not bound, to redeem or repurchase the policy by paying to Quillian the amount advanced to pay the quarterly premium. If Thomas elected to redeem on these terms, and actually did so, Quillian would make nothing, but would lose interest on the money advanced by him. If Thomas lived, but declined to redeem, Quillian would lose the amount advanced and interest thereon, while Thomas would forfeit all interest in the policy, if the premiums thereafter falling due were not paid. The "stake" which Thomas put up was the policy; the "stake" put up by Quillian was $151.52 in cash. These stakes were placed in the hands of Johnson; he was, in gambling parlance, the "stakeholder." The uncertain event was the death of Thomas. He bet he would live, while Quillian bet he would die within the time limited without redeeming the policy. Each day which passed lessened the chances of Quillian to win. So long as Thomas delayed taking steps to redeem his stake, he from day to day deliberately took the chance of losing it forever. This stake was of value at the time it was placed in the hands of the stakeholder. It is true that the policy had to be kept in life by the payment of a past-due premium, but it was not for that reason valueless. Had the subject-matter of the game of chance been a horse owned by Thomas, it also would have had to be fed; and if Quillian had agreed to feed it for 90 days, on condition that the animal was to be his if Thomas died within that period without redeeming it by paying its board, the transaction would be neither more nor less than a wager, if the value of the horse was out of all proportion to its feed bill. The game actually played was for high stakes. By risking $151.52, Quillian "stood to win" an amount in the neighborhood of $6,700, after settling with Johnson and paying $1,000 each to two of Thomas' children. By accepting and getting the benefit of this stake of $151.52 in ready cash, Thomas "stood to win" for his estate more than $9,800, if he played the game well, and, anticipating his death in time, redeemed the policy before he died within the 90-day period. On the other hand, both "stood to lose."

We cannot differentiate the agreement into which they entered from an ordinary election bet, which certainly comes under the definition of a wagering contract. McLennan v. Whiddon, 120 Ga. 666, 48 S. E. 201. Election bets are often ingeniously contrived, and more or less cloaked under written agreements touching some perfectly legitimate subject-matter of contract, the real design of them being to make the reciprocal obligations of the contracting parties dependent on the uncertain event of the success or defeat of some popular candidate for office. See collation of cases under the head "Gaming" in Century Edition of American Digest, vol. 24, pp. 1538, 1539, 1543, 1544. In other instances the contract is made dependent on the uncertainty of one of the contracting parties marrying on or before a specified date. Id. 1538, citing Chalfant v. Payton, 91 Ind. 202, 46 Am. Rep. 586, and James v. Jellison, 94 Ind. 292, 48 Am. Rep. 151. Such agreements have uniformly been held to be mere wagers. In the present case the uncertain event was the death of one of the contracting parties; and the agreement was in no sense a legitimate contract of insurance, but a purely speculative and wagering contract.

6. On the argument here, counsel for the plaintiff in error (Quillian) insisted that, even were this true, the verdict returned under the direction of the court should not be permitted to stand, inasmuch as the parties to this illegal contract were in pari delicto; Toll, the complaining executor, stood in the shoes of Thomas, and therefore the court could not lend its aid to either of the parties really interested in the distribution of the proceeds of the policy, but should have left them as it found them. We recognize the correctness of the proposition that, as a general rule, neither a court of law nor a court of equity can lend its aid in enforcing an illegal contract or in distributing the fruits thereof. Garrison v. Burns, 98 Ga. 762, 28 S. E. 471; Exchange Bank v. Loh, 104 Ga. 446 (3), 31 S. E. 459, 44 L. R. A. 372. However, by express statute in this state (Civ. Code 1895, § 3671), "money paid or property delivered up" in pursuance of a gaming contract "may be recovered back from the winner by the loser, if he shall sue for the same in six months after the loss." Thus, money or property lost in betting on a horse race may be recovered, if suit therefor be instituted within the statutory period. Dyer v. Benson, 69 Ga. 609; Doyle v. McIntyre, 71 Ga. 673. And money posted as a wager on the result of an election may be recovered from the stakeholder if, after notice that the bet has been withdrawn, he nevertheless pays it over to the winner without the assent of the retracting party. McLennan v. Whiddon, 120 Ga. 666, 48 S. E. 201. So, also, may money be recovered from an agent by a principal who placed the money in the agent's hands for the illegal purpose of playing the game of "futures." Clarke v. Brown, 77 Ga. 606, 4 Am. St. Rep. 98. In the case now under consideration it is apparent that Thomas, had he lived, could, by proper legal proceedings, have compelled Johnson, the stakeholder, to surrender to him the insurance policy posted in his hands as a stake, or, in the event Johnson had delivered the policy to Quillian, the policy could have been recovered from him. And it is equally apparent that, had Quillian collected the insurance money after the death of Thomas, his executor, Toll, could have compelled Quillian to account to him therefor, in an action at law brought within six months after Thomas died. Instead of instituting such an action, Toll, as executor, at once brought an equitable proceeding to prevent Quillian from collecting the insurance money, alleging that, if he were permitted to collect the money, he might make way with it, and it could not be recovered from him. Toll asserted claim to the policy itself, as the property which had been staked by Thomas, and resorted to a court having equity jurisdiction in order that this claim might not be defeated by a payment of the proceeds of the policy by the insurance company to the winner, Quillian. In other words, Toll relied on his statutory right to recover the property posted and lost by Thomas on the bet he made that he would not die before redeeming his policy, and the suit brought was essentially of statutory parentage, though clothed with the frills of equitable pleadings.

7. It only remains to inquire whether or not the trial court did, as contended by counsel for Quillian, undertake to enforce the terms of the illegal contract and distribute the fruits thereof. The fund in controversy did not arise from the illegal agreement, but was the proceeds of a valid policy of insurance on the life of Thomas. It was kept in life by the payment, in behalf of Thomas, of the past-due quarterly premium; Quillian paid over to Johnson, as the agent of Thomas, the money with which to pay this premium; and the money so advanced by Quillian was parted with by him under the terms of the illegal agreement between him and Thomas. But the money was received by the insurance company as the money of Thomas, which it in fact was at the time the premium was paid; and, though it came from an illegal source, this fact did not operate to vitiate the policy. The insurance company could not successfully so contend, nor can Quillian. He can only insist that he paid over the money on a wager, and has a statutory right to sue and recover the same from Thomas' executor. The court gave him credit for this amount, as though he had brought suit and established his statutory right to recover it. The court also credited him with the aggregate amount he had paid to Johnson on the promissory notes he held against Thomas, the consideration of which was money which Johnson had advanced to Thomas to enable him to keep up with the recurring premiums falling due on the insurance policy. Quillian's purpose in paying off these notes was to comply with the terms of his illegal contract. The court, however, did not allow him credit therefor on the idea that he had to this extent performed his obligations under that contract, but upon the purely equitable theory that these notes represented a valid demand against the estate of Thomas which Quillian had discharged, and though the notes had not been indorsed to him, still he was the equitable owner of them, and was subrogated to all the rights of the payee, Johnson. Thus, Quillian received out of the proceeds of the policy payment of every legal demand he had against the estate represented by the plaintiff. That the court did not undertake to enforce the terms of the illegal contract is evidenced by the further fact that two of the nominated beneficiaries thereunder ("Grigsby E. Thomas, IV, and Marie Virginia Thomas," the minor children of the plaintiff's testator) were entirely ignored, and Quillian was not called on to pay either of them anything. In fact, the court directed the jury to find that the entire fund remaining after the credits to Quillian were allowed should "be paid over to the petitioner, as the executor of the estate of G. E. Thomas, Jr." To this estate it belongs, and is subject to the claims of its creditors and to those of the beneficiaries under the will of the plaintiff's testator. The verdict directed by the court was strictly in accord with the written law, with equity, and with good conscience.

We have not overlooked certain assignments of error touching the admission and rejection of testimony. That admitted over the objection of Quillian related to a conversation between a witness and Thomas, before his death, with respect to his right to redeem the policy; while that rejected was offered by Quillian for the purpose of showing that he did not make a loan to Thomas of the money advanced to pay the overdue premium, but that Thomas sold the policy to him on the conditions named in the written agreement between them. Irrespective of the testimony admitted over the objection of Quillian, a verdict such as that directed by the court was demanded, and the admission of the testimony rejected could not have altered the inevitable result reached. Indeed, as has already been stated, the case turned on the construction to be given the written agreement evidencing the transaction.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed; on cross-bill, reversed.

PATRICK v. COBB.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—PROCEEDING TO EJECT—AMENDMENT—COUNTER AFFIDAVIT.

1. An issue made by the filing of a counter affidavit to a summary proceeding to eject a tenant, under Civ. Code 1895, § 4813 et seq., is tenancy or no tenancy, and the question of the plaintiff's title is not involved.

2. While an equitable amendment might be allowed in such a proceeding, it must relate to matters which are germane to this issue.

3. It follows that a counter affidavit setting up that the deed under which the plaintiff claims to derive title from the defendant is void, and praying for a cancellation of the same, is not allowable.

4. Agency cannot be established by the declarations of the alleged agent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, § 40.]

5. The evidence not being sufficient to establish the relation of landlord and tenant between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was error to refuse a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Lowndes County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by M. H. Cobb against Margaret Patrick. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. E. Thomas and C. L. Smith, for plaintiff in error. Wilcox & Johnson, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was a proceeding, under Civ. Code 1895, § 4813 et seq., to eject a tenant. The defendant filed a counter affidavit, and offered an amendment alleging that the plaintiff claimed title under a sheriff's deed purporting to sell the defendant's property, and that the same was void, and praying for a cancellation of the deed. This amendment was disallowed, and the defendant excepted pendente lite. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant assigns error upon the refusal to allow the amendment to her counter affidavit and upon the refusal to grant her motion for a new trial.

The issue in a proceeding of the character here involved is tenancy or no tenancy, and under our system equitable amendments may be allowed to the pleadings of either party if such amendments set forth facts proper to be considered in the determination of this issue. But, the proceeding being statutory, the defendant cannot by counter affidavit inject into the case an issue which is not germane to that involved in the proceeding.

Johnson v. Stancliff, 113 Ga. 886, 39 S. E. 296. The cases of Ford v. Holloway, 112 Ga. 851, 38 S. E. 373, and Wilkins v. Gibson, 113 Ga. 31, 58, 38 S. E. 374, 84 Am. St. Rep. 204, were claim cases, and the equitable amendments related to matters which were germane to the issue of subject or not subject, which is the only issue in a statutory claim proceeding. There was no error in disallowing the amendment.

The burden was upon the plaintiff to establish the existence of the tenancy. Unless this was done, he was not entitled to pursue the remedy which he was seeking. Henry v. Perry, 110 Ga. 630, 36 S. E. 87, and citations. The only evidence offered to establish the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties was the declaration of a son of the defendant who it is claimed was her agent, and the only evidence of his agency consisted of his own declarations. The court erred in admitting evidence of these declarations, and should have granted a new trial on this ground as well as on the ground that the verdict was without competent evidence to support it.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

COUNCIL v. TEAL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

CONTRACT—PERFORMANCE—ACTION FOR BREACH—EVIDENCE—EXCLUSION—OFFER TO SHOW—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, one who obligates himself by written contract to bore an artesian well for another is at liberty to fulfill his engagement through workmen over whom he places a superintendent to direct how the work shall be done, and is under no obligation to himself perform any of the labor or to give his personal attention to the work.

2. Where the contractor signs the contract in his own name as an individual, he may properly bring suit thereon against the other party to compel payment for the work done, notwithstanding the contractor may have been in partnership with a third person who superintended the boring of the well, and who, under a private understanding between them, was to share in the profits realized from the undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partnership, § 363.]

3. Though the boring of the well was continued after water had been reached, the party for whom it was being drilled cannot complain that work was not then stopped at his request and the water tested, when he deferred to the opinion of the superintendent that the supply was insufficient, and permitted him, without further objection, to carry on the work; and this is true notwithstanding a sufficient supply of water was subsequently obtained at the same depth by boring another well at a point but a short distance away.

4. When error is assigned on the refusal of a trial court to allow a witness to be interrogated touching a given subject, it is incumbent on the excepting party to disclose what facts he sought to elicit from the witness, in order that it may appear whether the testimony rejected was relevant to the issue and would have been beneficial to the party offering the same.

5. When a jury fails to reach a verdict because one of the jurors is wedded to his own opinion concerning the law of the case and refuses to apply to the facts thereof the law as given in charge by the court, it is proper for the trial judge, on being advised as to why the jury are unable to agree, to instruct the jury that they are bound by their oaths as jurors to take the law from the court and from no other source.

(a) For no reason assigned by the plaintiff in error did the court err in the instructions given the jury upon this subject.

6. The evidence warranted the finding in favor of the prevailing party.

Action by H. R. Teal against M. B. Council. Judgment for plaintiff, and both parties bring error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed, and cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

Williams & Harper and Allen Fort & Son, for M. B. Council. E. A. Hawkins, for H. R. Teal.

EVANS, J. On August 30, 1900, H. R. Teal and M. B. Council entered into a written contract under the terms of which the former was to drill an artesian well on the farm of the latter, commencing with casing $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter, and finishing with casing as large as practicable, the work to be commenced as near the 1st of October as practicable, and to be pushed to completion as fast as practical. It was stipulated in this contract that Teal did not guaranty the well "to flow above the surface," but was to be paid "one dollar per foot for all the depth of well drilled," and that Council was to furnish the necessary casing, and was to board three men while doing the work. The well was commenced and partially completed under this contract. On July 3, 1901, Teal instituted an action against Council, alleging that, after the well had been drilled to a depth of 451 feet, the defendant declined to furnish any more casing, and plaintiff was in consequence compelled to abandon the work; that defendant was indebted to him in the sum of \$451 under the contract rate of \$1 per foot for all the depth of well drilled, and also in the sum of \$5.80 for certain material furnished at defendant's request, which amounts the defendant refused to pay. An answer was filed by Council, in which he admitted the execution of the written contract, a copy of which was attached to the plaintiff's petition, but asserted that the writing did not set forth the entire contract, and that he had not committed the alleged breach thereof, nor was he indebted to the plaintiff in any amount save as to the item of \$5.80 for material furnished. The defendant also filed a special plea, wherein he averred that the plaintiff had himself in various particulars violated the contract, that the well had not been drilled in a skillful or workmanlike manner, was totally worthless, and that the plaintiff's failure to perform his obligations under the contract had endamaged him (the defendant) in the sum of \$1,000. A portion of this plea was, on demurrer by the plaintiff, stricken by the court, and the defendant filed exceptions pendente lite to its judgment. Like exceptions were filed by the plaintiff to the refusal of the court to strike other portions of the defendant's plea. The case was then tried on its merits, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. He sued out a bill of exceptions, in which he assigns error on striking part of his special plea, as well as upon the judgment overruling his motion for a new trial. The plaintiff, in a cross-bill of exceptions, complains of the refusal of the court to strike other portions of this plea.

1. The defendant stated in his plea that he "expected and understood" that the plaintiff would give his personal attention to the boring of the well, and that one inducement for making the contract was the reputation of the plaintiff in regard to boring artesian wells; but the plaintiff, instead of giving personal attention to the matter, turned the same over to one Brewer, who was of a disagreeable and arbitrary disposition, and from whom defendant could get no satisfaction in regard to the progress of the work. The court very properly struck this allegation. The defendant did not undertake to aver that the plaintiff had agreed to give personal attention to the work, nor to have it done by an agent whose disposition was irreproachable, and from whom the defendant "could get satisfaction" as to the progress made. The written contract sued on certainly does not so stipulate. The present case does not fall within the rule stated in Tifton, etc., Ry. Co. v. Bedgood, 118 Ga. 945, 43 S. E. 257, that "contract rights coupled with liabilities, or involving a relation of personal confidence between the parties, cannot be transferred to a third person by one of the parties to the contract without the assent of the other." Our Code provides that "whatever one may do himself may be done by an agent, except such personal trusts in which special confidence is placed on the skill, discretion, or judgment of the person called in to act." Civ. Code 1895, § 2999. To contract to drill an artesian well does not involve any personal trust, any more than to contract to dig a ditch or to erect a building; and, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, the contractor may perform his contract obligations through agents, being accountable, of course, for the manner in which they prosecute the work. The "personal trusts" referred to in the above-cited section of our Code are those arising out of a fiduciary relation, such as the relation between principal and agent, and the like; and that section has no application to the contractual relation existing between the parties to an agreement under the terms of which one of them obligates himself to accomplish a given task, not alone or in person, but through workmen in his employ. The written contract declared on in the present case on its face negatives the idea that Teal was to himself perform the labor incident to the boring of the well, and contains no stipulation that he was to personally superintend the work. This being true, Council had no ground on which to base his expectation and understanding that Teal would give his personal attention to the boring of the well. Civ. Code 1895, § 3724.

Other allegations in the defendant's plea were stricken by the court, and exception was taken to its action in so doing; but, in the brief and argument filed in behalf of the plaintiff in error, no insistence is made that the court committed error in striking these allegations, and the assignments of error touching them are therefore to be treated as having been abandoned.

2. After the plaintiff had announced closed, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit on the ground that, "if a case was made out at all and any one was entitled to recover, it was the firm of H. R. Teal, composed of H. R. Teal and M. N. Brewer, and not H. R. Teal in his individual capacity." The contention of the defendant was that the testimony disclosed that, at the time the written contract was executed, Teal and Brewer were partners, and that Brewer was jointly interested with Teal in the fruits of that contract. There was no assignment to Brewer of any interest in the contract, and, it having been executed in the name of Teal as an individual, the suit thereon was properly brought in his name. Relatively to Council, the firm of which Brewer and Teal were members was an entire stranger to the contract, and in undertaking to carry out its terms Brewer acted merely as the agent of Teal, notwithstanding any private understanding between him and Teal that they, as partners, should share the profits realized. The trial judge rightly declined to grant a nonsuit, and very properly instructed the jury as to the relation Brewer bore to Council and Teal while engaged in carrying on the work as the representative of Teal.

3. Complaint is made in the motion for a new trial of the refusal of the court to permit the defendant to testify that "since Brewer had left defendant's place he had another well bored near and in close proximity to the hole bored by Brewer, and that he had an abundant supply of water at the same depth at which he told Brewer to stop." This testimony was offered in support of the defendant's plea of "unskillful management on the part of plaintiff." The evidence discloses that, when "the hole bored by Brewer" had reached a depth of some 200 feet, water had been struck, and the defendant had requested him "to stop and test it," saying he was satisfied that was the water he wanted, but that Brewer had peremptorily replied that defendant "didn't know anything about it," while he (Brewer) "knew all about it." The evidence further shows, however, that the defendant waived the point by deferring to Brewer's judgment in the matter, furnishing additional casing called for by him, and permitting him to continue the boring. This being so, the defendant can take no advantage from the fact that he "tried to get Brewer to stop and test" the water reached. Furthermore, the defendant did not offer to show that this water came from the same stream which had been struck when the well subsequently bored reached a depth of 200 feet. The testimony rejected would not have warranted the inference that such was the truth of the matter, for it is a fact quite universally known that underground streams of water, varying in volume and wholly independent of each other, may exist in close proximity to one another at a given depth beneath the surface.

4. Error is also assigned on the refusal of the court to "allow defendant to show by" certain named witnesses "what a well was." The motion for a new trial does not disclose what facts the defendant expected to elicit from these witnesses, so we are unable to determine the relevancy of the testimony rejected, or whether it would have been beneficial or otherwise to the defendant. Such an indefinite assignment of error cannot be considered. Allen v. Kessler, 120 Ga. 319, 47 S. E. 900.

5. After the jury had retired to make a verdict and had deliberated over the case for about four hours, they sent a request to the court to be recharged as to certain questions of law, with which request the court complied. One of the jurors, who had at one time practiced law, "attempted to argue the matter with the court," saying he knew something of the law. He was suppressed. The jury again retired, but were unable during the ensuing night to agree on a verdict. On the following morning the court sent for the jury, and was advised by the foreman that they stood 11 to 1, and that it was still a question of law that was troubling the jury. On inquiry, the court ascertained that the trouble related to the same matters as to which the jury had been recharged on the night preceding, and, believing one of the jurors was still applying his own legal opinion instead of accepting the law from the court, the presiding judge in positive terms informed the jury that they were bound by their oaths to get the law from the court and from no other source whatever, as they were merely judges of the facts and had nothing to do with the law. Complaint is made that the court so instructed the jury of its own motion, without any request from the jury or from counsel on either side. This complaint is devoid of merit.

It further appears that, after the jury had been instructed as above stated, the foreman asked if the jury had "anything to do with the equity of the case," and that the trial judge replied: "I have charged you as plainly as I know how, as the English words will make it, that you have nothing to do whatever with the law except what I tell you is the law." In the motion for a new trial it is asserted that the court erred in the part it took in so replying to the foreman, "same being contrary to law." This general complaint presents no question on which we can intelligently pass, no reason being assigned by the complaining party as to why he characterizes the action taken by the court as being contrary to law. Roberts v. Keeler, 111 Ga. 181, 38 S. E. 617; Turner v. Alexander, 112 Ga. 820, 38 S. E. 35. We can only in like general terms reply that for no reason pointed out and insisted on by the plaintiff in error did the court commit any error prejudicial to him.

6. As to the general grounds of the motion, in which the verdict is assailed as being contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, suffice it to say that the finding of the jury was fully warranted.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed; cross-bill of exceptions dismissed. All the Justices concur.

SAUSSY & HUXFORD v. WEEKS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

NONNEGOTIABLE NOTE—ACTION—INDORSER—GUARANTOR—VENUE.

1. A., the payee of a nonnegotiable promissory note, sued B. and C., who resided in different counties, in the county of the residence of B. The petition alleged that B. was maker, and C. indorser. On the back of the note the name of C. was signed in blank. A demurrer was filed, averring that C. was not an indorser, but a guarantor, and could not be sued on the note in the county of B.'s residence. Held that, under the allegations of the petition, C. was an indorser, and suable in the same action with B. in the county of the latter's residence, but that the averment in the petition would not preclude C. from pleading and proving that, according to the intention and agreement of the parties, his relation to the paper was not that of indorser.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. S. Humphreys, Judge.

Action by J. S. Weeks against Saussy & Huxford. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Saussy & Saussy, for plaintiffs in error. Shipp & Kline, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Weeks, the payee in a nonnegotiable note payable at the Citizens' Bank, brought a petition in the city court of Moultrie, alleging that Davis & Hatchett, a partnership composed of persons residing in Colquitt county, as makers, and Saussy & Huxford, a partnership composed of persons not residing in Colquitt county, as indorsers, were indebted to him in a stated sum. Davis & Hatchett appear as makers on the note, and the name of the partnership, Saussy & Huxford, appears in blank upon the back of the paper. A demurrer to the petition was filed, averring that the relation of Saussy & Huxford to the paper, on the face thereof, was that of guarantors, and that, as such, they were not suable in the same action with the makers, in the county of the residence of the latter. The demurrer was overruled, and Saussy & Huxford excepted.

Where one who is neither maker nor payee of a nonnegotiable promissory note writes his name on the back of the note, either before or after delivery to the payee, he becomes liable as indorser, guarantor, maker, or surety, according to the intention and agreement of the parties at the time he signs the paper. See 7 Cyc. 673, 674. The decisions are by no means uniform, and some draw a distinction between cases where the signature is placed on the note before and after delivery, but we think the rule above stated the correct one. It seems to grow out of the principle of the decision in Josey v. Rushin, 109 Ga. 319, 34 S. E. 558, 77 Am. St. Rep. 377, where it was held that the payee of a nonnegotiable promissory note does not become liable as indorser merely by writing his name on the back of it, but that proof may be made of the actual agreement under which the signature was placed on the note. See, also, in this connection, National Bank v. Leonard, 91 Ga. 805, 18 S. E. 32. The decision in Cochran v. Strong, 44 Ga. 636, has been cited by some of the law writers as authority for the proposition that, where the payee in a nonnegotiable contract signs a written assignment on the back of the note, he becomes liable neither as indorser nor guarantor, and cannot be sued in the same action with the maker. That was a decision by two judges, and the proposition just stated was announced in the syllabus; but, in the opinion subsequently written, Judge Montgomery expresses doubt as to the correctness of the proposition announced in the syllabus, and cites authorities as supporting a contrary view. The rule as above announced does not differ materially from the rule which prevails in cases of negotiable instruments. In both the real relation of the person whose signature is placed in blank on the back of the instrument is governed by the intention and agreement of the parties. See Benson v. Warehouse Co., 99 Ga. 303, 25 S. E. 645; Booth v. Huff, 116 Ga. 8, 42 S. E. 381, 94 Am. St. Rep. 98; Atkinson v. Bennett, 103 Ga. 508, 30 S. E. 599. In the present case the petition alleges distinctly that Saussy & Huxford were indorsers, and this is, in effect, an allegation that they placed their names upon the back of the note under an agreement and with the intention to become bound in that capacity. If they are indorsers, they can be sued jointly with the makers in the county of the latter's residence. It is immaterial whether the note was payable at a chartered bank or not, for no question is raised by the demurrer as to protest and notice. If the true relation of the plaintiffs in error is not as alleged in the petition, they can plead and prove it at the trial.

BRINSON v. EXLEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1905.)

AGENCY—INSTRUCTIONS—ACTION FOR DECEIT.

1. Under the peculiar facts of the present case the charge to the effect that in determining the question of agency the jury should look to all the past conduct of the defendant was misleading and confusing in its tendency.

2. The fact that the defendant assumed to act as the agent of the plaintiff, if in fact there was no agency, would not entitle the plaintiff to recover in an action of deceit.

3. In an action of deceit based entirely upon the contention that the relation of principal and agent existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was error to charge the jury that, if there were confidential relations between the parties other than that of principal and agent, and the defendant violated the confidence reposed in him to the damage of the plaintiff, the latter would be entitled to recover.

4. While we are not prepared to hold that it was erroneous, as an expression of opinion, for the court, in stating the contentions of the parties, to charge that "the plaintiff * * * has sued * * * to recover damages on account of loss he sustained by the deceitful conduct of his agent, the defendant," the language used was not as guarded as it should have been.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; B. B. Bower, Judge.

Action by F. A. Exley against Simeon Brinson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

T. S. Hawes and A. G. Powell, for plaintiff in error. Donalson & Donalson, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Exley lived in Effingham county, and owned a lot of land in Decatur county. Brinson had formerly been his agent to look after the land and return it for taxes, and according to the allegations of the petition his agency continued until the time of the transaction out of which this suit arose. Exley alleges that Brinson, as his agent, was offered $500 for the land; that he concealed the fact of this offer from him, and by false and deceitful representations as to the value of the land persuaded him to sell it to one Smith for $200; and that Smith immediately afterwards sold it for $750, dividing with Brinson the profit thereby derived. He further alleges that the sale to Smith, which was induced by Brinson, was part of a fraudulent scheme to persuade him to sell the land at far less than its real value, so that it might be resold at a large profit; and he sues Brinson as his agent for $550, the difference between the amount Smith received for the land and what he paid for it. In his answer Brinson denies that he was ever the agent of Exley, except to return the land for taxes, and avers that this was done merely as a matter of accommodation. He avers that he wrote to Exley, and asked him what he would take for the land, and that Exley replied that he would sell it to him or anybody else for $200; that, acting upon this letter, he bargained the lot of land to Smith for $200, subject to the approval of Exley; and that thereupon Exley voluntarily made a deed to the land to Smith. He denies that he made any false representations to Exley, or that he received any benefit whatever from the transaction. On the vital question of agency the evidence at the trial was somewhat in conflict, as was also the case in regard to other issues involved. The jury found for the plaintiff the full amount sued for. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

1. Error is assigned upon the following charge of the court: "In determining the question as to whether he was the agent, look to the testimony, to all of his past conduct of the defendant Mr. Brinson, as to what communications passed between them—between the plaintiff and the defendant—that has been put in evidence here before you." In view of the evidence introduced on the trial, and of the peculiar circumstances of this case, we are of the opinion that this charge, if not erroneous, was at least confusing in its tendency. Brinson admitted having formerly acted as agent for Exley, but contended that whatever agency once existed had terminated several years before the sale of this land, and that in this particular transaction he was in no sense Exley's agent. If this evidence was to be believed, it is clear that the jury would not be authorized to consider "all of the past conduct of the defendant" in determining whether he was at the time under investigation the agent of the plaintiff.

2. Complaint is likewise made of the following charge: "He should act in the matter in perfect good faith towards that principal, if he was his agent; and it would make no difference whether he was the general agent of Exley for a long time ago, or whether he assumed at the time of the sale this relation. If he assumed to act as his agent at the time the sale was gotten up, he would be just as much his agent as if he had been his agent all the time." The gist of an action like the present is the confidential relation of principal and agent. The right of action rests upon the confidence which a principal is bound to repose in his agent in regard to matters peculiarly within the knowledge of the agent, and not known to the principal. If, therefore, one assumes to act as the agent of another when he is not in fact his agent, the other cannot hold him liable in an action of deceit, for there is absent that essential element of confidence abused. For this reason the charge just quoted is also error.

3. The court further erroneously charged the jury that they might look to the evidence to see if, regardless of the question of agency, such confidential relations had been established between the parties as led Exley to trust Brinson in regard to the land, and Brinson had violated that confidence to the damage of Exley, and that, if they so found, their verdict should be for the plaintiff. The plaintiff's petition was grounded upon the theory that Brinson was his agent, and ipso facto bound to divulge any information that he might possess in regard to the subject-matter of the agency. There were no allegations that any confidential relations existed between the parties other than was brought about by the alleged agency, and it was error to give to the jury a charge not warranted by the pleadings.

4. The court charged the jury as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, the plaintiff, Mr. Exley, has sued Mr. Brinson to recover damages on account of loss he sustained by the deceitful conduct of his agent, the defendant, S. Brinson." It is alleged that this charge was erroneous, as containing an expression of opinion as to the two vital questions at issue, viz., agency and deceit. It is apparent that the judge was merely stating the contentions of the parties in giving this charge; and, while this statement was somewhat unhappily expressed, we are not prepared to say that it was sufficiently so to require the grant of a new trial.

The remaining grounds of the motion for a new trial complain of various charges of the court, and of the failure to charge certain legal principles which it is contended were pertinent. While some of the language used in the charges complained of was not altogether apt, we are not prepared to say that any of the grounds except those already noted disclose error of sufficient importance to require the grant of a new trial. There does not appear to have been any written request to charge, the failure to give which is alleged to have been error, and therefore such "failure" will not be held error.

WHIDBY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 26, 1905.)

INCEST—ACCOMPLICE—INSTRUCTIONS— COERCION—EVIDENCE.

1. A woman who consents to an act of sexual intercourse which is incestuous is an accomplice of the man. This rule is not varied where some coercion is used by the man, but not of a character to make the case one of rape.

2. Accordingly, on the trial of one indicted for incestuous adultery, it was error to charge as follows: "If you should find that the will of the party was coerced to that extent where she did not consent, if it did not amount to sufficient force to make it rape, then it is for you to say whether or not she was an accomplice." This charge is also confusing in its tendency, for, if the will of the woman was "coerced to that extent where she did not consent," the case is necessarily one of rape.

3. It is also error, on the trial of such a case, to admit evidence that the accused had frequently administered to the daughter with whom he is charged to have committed incestuous adultery severe whippings with a cowhide, there being nothing in the evidence to connect these whippings with the offense for which the accused is being tried, and their natural tendency being to prejudice the jury against him.

Error from Superior Court, Irwin County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

J. E. Whidby was convicted of incestuous adultery, and brings error. Reversed.

Z. Bass, J. H. Martin, and Warren Grice, for plaintiff in error. J. F. De Lacy and E. D. Graham, Sols. Gen., for the State.

CANDLER, J. The accused was tried upon an indictment charging him with incestuous adultery with his daughter, and was convicted. He moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

1, 2. An act of sexual intercourse must necessarily be either with or without the consent of the female. If it is accomplished forcibly, and without her consent, the act is rape. If it be with her consent, even though some coercion be used to procure that consent, and the intercourse is illegal, the crime is adultery or fornication, as the case may be. Mathews v. State, 101 Ga. 547, 29 S. E. 424; Taylor v. State, 110 Ga. 151, 35 S. E. 161 (6). If the latter, and it is incestuous in character, the woman is an accomplice of the man. Solomon v. State, 113 Ga. 192, 38 S. E. 332; Yother v. State, 120 Ga. 204, 47 S. E. 555. The law recognizes no intermediate degree of force in the accomplishment of an illegal act of sexual intercourse which is sufficient to accomplish the act contrary to the consent of the female, and yet not constitute the crime of rape. For these reasons the charge referred to in the second headnote was erroneous. The peculiar vice of the charge lay in the fact that in this case there was considerable doubt as to whether the case made by the state was one of incestuous adultery or of rape. One of the witnesses, a sister of the woman who it was claimed was a party to the various acts of incestuous adultery, gave evidence which would warrant a conviction of that crime; but, if the woman herself is to be believed, she was the victim of a series of acts of rape covering a period of several years, and the accused should have been acquitted of the offense with which he was charged.

3. It was also error to admit evidence that the accused had repeatedly administered severe whippings to his daughter with a cowhide. The witness who gave this testimony testified that she did not know why the whippings were given, and there was nothing to connect them in any way with the acts of sexual intercourse with which the accused is charged. Such evidence could only have a tendency to prejudice the jury against the accused as an inhuman father, regardless of the facts as to the crime with which he was charged.

The motion for a new trial contains numerous other grounds. Some of them disclose inaccuracies in the charge and in the rulings of the trial judge, but no error requiring the grant of a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ARNOLD et al. v. LIMBURGER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—HUSBAND'S RIGHTS IN WIFE'S PROPERTY—REDUCTION TO POSSESSION—PRESCRIPTION—DISABILITY TO SUE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Prior to the Code of 1863 the marital rights of a husband did not attach to real estate either owned by the wife at the time of the marriage, or acquired by her during coverture, unless she was in possession of the same, or it was reduced to possession by the husband during coverture.

2. Even if the Code of 1863 changed the rule as to property owned at the time of the marriage, it was still necessary, under that Code, before his marital rights would attach, for the husband to reduce to possession property acquired by the wife during coverture.

3. The wife's possession during coverture was the possession of the husband.

4. The right acquired by a husband under a marriage solemnized before the passage of the married woman's act of 1866 (Laws 1866, p. 146) to reduce to possession property of the wife owned at the time of the marriage, or acquired during coverture prior to the passage of that act, was not affected thereby.

5. The interest of an heir at law in an undistributed estate was a mere chose in action, and the fact that a woman who was an heir at law lived with other heirs upon lands of the estate both before and after her marriage did not constitute such possession of any interest in the lands, as that the marital rights of the husband would attach thereto.

6. A female who held a reversionary interest in land, subject to an estate in dower, and who, both before and after her marriage, lived upon the land with the dowress, was not so in possession of the land as that the marital rights of her husband attached thereto during the existence of the dower estate, nor after the termination of that estate, when the reversionary interest was not reduced to possession by him.

7. A deed by a husband, executed after the passage of the married woman's act of 1866 (Laws 1866, p. 146), which purported to convey land to which he claimed his marital rights had attached before the passage of that act, is good, as color of title, notwithstanding that at the time of the conveyance he had not reduced the property to possession.

8. The fraud necessary to defeat prescription is moral fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, § 491.]

9. Where one purchased property in which dower had been assigned, and obtained a conveyance signed by the dowress, by one of the heirs at law, and by the husbands of two heirs at law, who claimed the right to dispose of the land in the exercise of their marital rights, the conveyance purporting to convey the fee in the property, and the purchaser resided with the dowress upon the land at the date of the deed, and continued to reside thereupon after the termination of the dower estate, and the wives had notice before the termination of the dower estate of the existence of the conveyance by their husbands, and that the purchaser, after the death of the dowress, was claiming the exclusive ownership of the property, prescription began to run in favor of the purchaser from the date of the death of the dowress against whatever rights the wives may have had in the land, growing out of the failure of the husbands to reduce the same to possession during coverture; and, if such possession continued for seven or more years, the purchaser had a good prescriptive title against the wives and persons claiming under them, if they were laboring under no disability during that period.

10. The burden of proving disability to sue rests upon the person who alleges it, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the person was laboring under no disability.

11. When, in an action to recover land, the plaintiff's evidence shows a prima facie right to recover, and the evidence of the defendant shows seven years' adverse possession under color of title prior to the beginning of the suit, the burden of proving the existence of a disability to sue, and its continuance for such a length of time as to defeat prescription, rests upon the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Lowndes County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by W. F. Arnold and others against W. J. Limeburger. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

On May 18, 1903, W. F. Arnold, F. M. Parrish, and Barney Arnold filed a petition for partition against W. J. Limeburger. The property described was two lots of land. It was alleged that W. F. Arnold was the owner of a seven-eighths of one-fourth undivided interest, F. M. Parrish the owner of a one-fourth undivided interest, and Barney Arnold the owner of a one-eighth of one-fourth undivided interest, and that the defendant was the owner of the remaining one-half undivided interest. Notice of intention to apply for partition had been served on the 25th day of April. The defendant filed an answer, in which he denied that the plaintiffs had any interest in the land, and alleged that he was the sole owner of the same. The answer did not set forth upon what this claim of sole ownership was based, but there was no demurrer. At the trial the undisputed facts were as follows: Joshua Limeburger died in possession of the land in controversy May 13, 1848. He left surviving him a widow, Salomy Limeburger, and seven children, to wit, Washington, the defendant, Woodbury, Louvinia Seletie, Marion, Jasper, and Newton. The land was assigned to the widow about 1850 as dower. The record not disclosing the exact date Louvinia married Arnold in 1849, but it does not appear distinctly whether the marriage took place before or after dower was assigned. Seletie married Parrish in 1857. At the date of these marriages these two daughters ters were living with their mother on the land in controversy. Mrs. Arnold, after her marriage, moved away from the place, in 1850 or 1851, and never afterwards lived on the land. Mrs. Parrish moved away from the place in 1858, but returned and lived with her mother from 1862 to 1865; her husband, after his return from the army, living on the place with her during the latter part of the year last mentioned. Jasper, Newton, and Marlon died during the Civil War, in 1862, 1863, and 1864, respectively, without issue. On April 1, 1871, C. W. Arnold the husband of Louvinia, and Wiley Parrish, the husband of Seletie, Woodbury Limeburger, and Salomy, widow of Joshua Limeburger, joined in a deed conveying the land in fee simple to W. J. Limeburger, the defendant, for an expressed consideration of $1,800. At the time this deed was executed the defendant was living upon the land with his mother, the tenant in dower, and he has continuously lived upon the land from that date until the present time. Mrs. Arnold and Mrs. Parrish were not parties to this deed, but it appears that they knew of the execution of the deed either at the time or shortly thereafter. The widow of Joshua Limeburger died on December 31, 1886. Mrs. Arnold died September 1, 1888, and Mrs. Parrish is still living. Arnold is dead, but the record does not disclose the date of his death. The case was presented upon the theory that he died before his wife. Mrs. Arnold left, surviving her, eight children, and seven are still in life; the plaintiffs W. F. and Barney Arnold being among that number. Barney Arnold claims a one-eighth interest in the property as an heir of his mother. W. F. Arnold claims a seven-eighths interest—one-eighth as an heir of his mother, five-eighths under conveyances from other children, and one-eighth under a conveyance from James M. Dees and others, who are the children of a deceased daughter of Mrs. Arnold. It appears that Mrs. Dees was the oldest child, but it does not appear when she was born or when she died. One of the Dees children is about 22, another about 24, and the third about 26; one witness stating that each of the three children has been 21 some time. F. M. Parrish claims under a deed from Mrs. Parrish. The deeds under which W. F. Arnold and F. M. Parrish claim were all executed in 1903. The court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs excepted.

G. A. Whitaker, for plaintiffs in error.
W. H. Griffin and Wilcox & Johnson, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. 1-6. The land in controversy was a part of the estate of the father of Mrs. Arnold and Mrs. Parrish. Their husbands had no interest therein except such as they acquired by virtue of their marital rights. The contest is between those claiming under the husbands and those claiming under the wives. The death of the father and the consummation of the marriages occurred before the Code was adopted. Upon the death of the father, each of the daughters became entitled to a one-seventh interest in his estate. Upon the death of the three brothers, each of them became entitled to a further interest in the property as heirs of their brothers. As one of the brothers died before the Code was adopted, and the other two after, the case, so far as it relates to the interest acquired from the father and one of the brothers, is to be determined by the law as it existed prior to the adoption of the Code, and as to the interest acquired from the other two brothers, as laid down in the Code. Prior to the adoption of the Code, the law of Georgia was that, so far as the marital rights of a husband were concerned, realty and personalty were upon the same footing, and that title to property of either class which was in possession of the wife at the time of the marriage immediately vested in the husband; but if the wife was not in possession, the marital rights of the husband did not attach, as against the wife's right of survivorship, and as against her heirs in case of her death, unless the husband had reduced the property to possession during his lifetime if she survived him, and during her lifetime if he survived her.

Under the Code of 1863 it seems that real estate owned by the wife at the time of the marriage vested immediately in the husband, without reference to possession, but property acquired by the wife during coverture did not vest in the husband until reduced to possession by him. Code 1863, §§ 1701, 1702. It has been held that the husband's right to reduce to possession the property of the wife which had been acquired by her prior to 1863 was not affected by the passage of the married woman's act of that year, and that this right might be exercised thereafter. Archer v. Guill, 67 Ga. 195; Grote v. Pace, 71 Ga. 231 (2); De Vaughn v. McLeroy, 82 Ga. 687, 10 S. E. 211 (5). It will therefore be seen that, to determine the question whether the husbands had a right to convey the property in 1871, depended upon whether they had reduced to possession the interests of their wives in the property which they attempted to convey; the old law in reference to real estate owned by the wife at the time of the marriage, and the Code in reference to property acquired during coverture, each providing that the husband's right to convey the wife's property was dependent upon whether he had reduced it to possession. If the wife was at the time of the marriage in possession of the property, or if she acquired possession at any time during coverture, or if property which was acquired during coverture came into her possession, or property of either class came during coverture into the possession of the husband, then the same was reduced to possession, within the meaning of the law, and the husband had a right to convey it. Both Mrs. Arnold and Mrs. Parrish were prior to their marriages actually upon the land, living with their mother, between the time of the death of their father and the time that dower was set apart; but this did not, in law, place them in possession of any interest in the land, their interest being simply a share in an undistributed estate. Hooper v. Howell, 50 Ga. 165; Sterling v. Sims, 72 Ga. 51. After the dower was set apart they were also upon the land, living with their mother; but they were not then in possession of any interest in the land, because the possession was in the mother as tenant in dower, and their actual presence upon the land would not put them in possession of the reversion, which could be reduced to possession only after the termination of the dower estate. So that under no view of the case could their presence upon the land, either before or after dower was set apart, be treated, in law, as a possession of any interest in the land. If the reversion had been sold during the existence of the dower estate, the right to the proceeds of the sale would have been a chose in action surviving to the wife, in the event her husband died before reducing the proceeds to possession. Sterling v. Sims, 72 Ga. 51. The widow of Joshua Limeburger did not die until 1886, and the right of the daughters to take possession of their interests in the land did not accrue until that date. The record not disclosing anything which would establish a possession by the wives at the time of their marriages, or a possession acquired during coverture, the husbands had no right to convey the land in right of their wives in 1871, when the deed relied upon by the defendant was executed. Hudgins v. Chupp, 103 Ga. 484, 30 S. E. 801. In the elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Little in the case just cited there will be found many of the cases decided by this court relating to this subject. In addition to those cases, see Sayre v. Flournoy, 3 Ga. 541; Rogers v. Cunningham, 51 Ga. 40. In Smith v. Atwood, 14 Ga. 402 (7), the court seems to have overlooked the act of 1785 which declared that the husband's marital rights should attach to land only under the same circumstances as they would attach to personal property; that is, only in the event the husband reduced the land to possession.

7-9. The defendant claims that, even if he acquired no title under the deed of 1871, that deed is good as color of title, and that, having been in possession for seven years thereunder, he has a perfect prescriptive title. While the deed was executed in 1871, the prescription would not commence to run until December 31, 1886, when the tenant in dower died. See Buswell on Lim. & Adv. Pos. § 273. The defendant was in possession with his mother at the time the deed was made. He acquired under that deed the dower estate, and, having remained in possession after the death of his mother, claiming under the deed of 1871, of which Mrs. Parrish and Mrs. Arnold had notice, this was sufficient to put them on notice that he was asserting an adverse claim against them; and, although they were co-tenants from the date of their mother's death, he was in adverse possession of the land. There is nothing in the record to authorize an inference that there was any fraud connected with the transaction resulting in the deed of 1871. The fraud required to defeat prescription is moral fraud. Street v. Collier, 118 Ga. 470, 45 S. E. 294 (5). And there is no suggestion in the record of fraud of this character. At the date the suit was brought the defendant had been in possession for more than seven years after the death of his mother, and therefore prescription had ripened in his favor against all persons claiming under his two sisters who were not laboring under a disability to sue. It is clear, therefore, that the defendant has a good prescriptive title as against all the interests in the land claimed by the plaintiffs, unless the interest of the Dees children is saved by their disability.

10-11. The widow of Joshua Limeburger died in 1886, and Mrs. Arnold died in 1888. Consequently at the time of Mrs. Arnold's death prescription had run against her for about two years. Civ. Code 1895, § 3780, provides that if disability to sue arises after the right of action accrues, and is not voluntary on the part of the person claiming it, the limitation shall cease to operate during its continuance. While this section is in the article relating to limitations of actions on contracts, it has been applied to an action for land; and it has been held that, after prescription began to run against a feme sole, her voluntary marriage would not exempt her from the operation of the statute. Sparks v. Roberts, 65 Ga. 571.

The general rule seems to be that, when prescription once begins to run against a person, his subsequent disability will not suspend or defeat the prescription. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 224 et seq. There are some rulings that where prescription has once begun to run, and before the period of prescription is complete the estate is cast upon an infant, the disability of the infant will suspend the prescription, but the weight of authority seems to be against this view. See Buswell on Lim. & Adv. Pos. § 108, note 2. Mrs. Arnold at no time labored under a disability, and the prescription began to run against her. If the minority of her heirs did not suspend or defeat the prescription, then the prescriptive title of the defendant became perfect upon the expiration of seven years from the date of the death of the tenant in dower. If the general rule above referred to is still the law of this state, then the only change made by the section of the Code above cited is to suspend the prescription in favor of one whose disability is not "voluntarily caused or undertaken," and it would seem that the disability referred to in this section would be the disability of a person against whom prescription has once begun to run, and not the disability of a successor. However, upon this question we now make no authoritative ruling, as, under the view of the case which will now be presented, the direction of a verdict for the defendant was proper. It does not appear when Mrs. Dees was born, or when she died. The two years which elapsed between Mrs. Limeburger's death and that of Mrs. Arnold would, in any event, count against Mrs. Dees and those claiming under her. Hence, if Mrs. Dees, before her death, was sui juris for a time which, added to the period just above mentioned, would make the seven-years prescription, then her children would be barred of a recovery, and the defendant would acquire a good title as against them and those claiming under them. Or if the Dees children were laboring under no disability for a time which, added to the two years and whatever time elapsed between Mrs. Arnold's death and that of Mrs. Dees (assuming the latter to have been sui juris), would make the seven-years prescription, then the children would also be barred.

There is no evidence in the record from which this matter can be definitely determined. The case therefore turns on the question upon whom the burden of proof rested. It has been held that, where a party relies on prescription, he must show that the land was owned for the requisite period by persons free from legal disability. City of Austin v. Hall, 93 Tex. 591, 57 S. W. 563. See, also, Saunders v. Simpson, 97 Tenn. 382, 37 S. W. 195. On the other hand, it has been held that the burden is on the party relying upon disability to prove it, and that, where there is no evidence on the subject, absence of disability will be presumed. Palmer v. Wright, 58 Ind. 486; Fankboner v. Corder, 127 Ind. 164, 28 N. E. 766. See, also, 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1212.

Proof of paper title to land makes out a prima facie case for the plaintiff. Proof by the defendant of adverse possession for seven years in good faith under color of title rebuts this prima facie case. If the plaintiff belongs to a class against which prescription would not run for the time in question, it is incumbent upon him to prove it. The general rule is that seven years' adverse possession under color perfects the title. The exception is as to persons laboring under a disability for some reason to sue for and recover the land during the seven years. The defendant makes out his defense by proving the general rule, and the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove that he is within the exception. No exception is to be presumed. It must be shown by affirmative proof. This is, in our opinion, the correct rule. Applying it to the present case, it will be presumed that Mrs. Dees was laboring under no disability in her lifetime. But there is no presumption as to how long she lived, or that she lived a sufficient length of time after her mother's death for prescription to ripen against her. The plaintiffs relied on disability. They should therefore have shown either that Mrs. Dees was within some of the exceptions, or that she died before prescription ripened, and that her children have not been of age a sufficient length of time since her death for prescription to ripen against them. Having failed to offer such proof, their case falls as to the interest of the Dees children, as well as to the interests of Mrs. Parrish and the children of Mrs. Arnold who conveyed their interests to the plaintiff W. F. Arnold. The plaintiffs' right to recover depended on the strength of their own title, and, having failed to introduce sufficient evidence to overcome the case made out by the defendant, there was no error in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

SEABOARD & R. R. CO. et al. v. AMBROSE.

RAILROADS—EMBANKMENTS—NUISANCE—LIABILITY OF LESSEE—NOTICE TO ABATE.

1. Where one railroad company erected a dam amounting to a nuisance on the land of another, and subsequently leased the railroad to other companies, and the evidence is conflicting as to whether the lessees increased the height of the dam, it was error to charge, in a suit against the lessees, that if the lessees maintained the dam they would be liable for damages, and "they were not required to have notice to abate before action for damages" was brought against them.

2. When this case was here before, the judgment granting a nonsuit was reversed, not on the ground that notice was not essential to make the lessees liable, but on the ground that there was evidence from which the jury could have found that the defendants had originally built the dam and had subsequently increased its height, and could under these circumstances be found liable even without notice.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; R. B. Russell, Judge.

Action by T. L. Ambrose against the Seaboard & Roanoke Railroad Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

See 41 S. E. 566.

Erwin & Erwin, T. M. Peebles, and N. L. Hutchins, Jr., for plaintiffs in error. N. L. Hutchins, O. Brown, and O. H. Brand, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Suit for damages was brought by Ambrose against the Seaboard & Roanoke Railroad Company and the Raleigh & Gaston Railway Company, lessees of the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company. Petitioner claimed that the defendants had erected a dam across a stream on his land without his consent, and that by reason of the maintenance of this dam his land was injured and his crops destroyed. He prayed damages for the injury to the land and for the destruction of the crops. On the trial of the case the petitioner's evidence tended to show that the dam had been erected by the defendants, or that, even if originally erected by their lessor, it had been increased in height by defendants since the date of the lease, increasing the damage to petitioner's property. The evidence of the defendants tended to show that the dam had been erected by the lessor company before defendants went in under the lease, and had not been raised or increased in height since that time.

1. The trial judge charged the jury as follows: "I charge you further, if you believe from the evidence that the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company placed a dam in a creek at a point on plaintiff's land (not on the right of way) without the permission of the plaintiff, that the company committed a trespass for which it would be liable to the plaintiff in damages. If you further believe that the defendants, the Seaboard & Roanoke Railway Company and others, lessees of the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railroad, after taking possession of said railroad, used said dam and maintained it without the consent of the plaintiff, they would be likewise liable for any damages committed, and they were not required to have notice to abate before action for damages occasioned by such trespass is brought against them." In the motion for new trial the defendants complained of this charge. The complaint is, we think, well founded. Where the alienee of property on which is situated a nuisance does anything to increase the nuisance, he may be sued without notice to abate. This the judge charged the jury was the law. The further instruction above set forth is not sound. If the alienee of such property has done nothing to increase the nuisance which was erected by his alienor, then he is not liable to suit until after he has received notice to abate and has failed to comply with the same. Middlebrooks v. Mayne, 96 Ga. 449, 23 S. E. 398. The evidence in this case was conflicting upon the vital question as to whether the defendants had merely maintained the dam as they received it from their lessors, or had themselves built or increased it. The erroneous charge of the court was therefore calculated to hurt them. Counsel for the defendant in error contended that the charge was harmless, because the record showed that the defendants had been given notice to abate the nuisance and had failed to comply. The only evidence of notice to the defendants is found in the plaintiff's evidence to the effect that he told an employé of the company that he ought not to maintain the dam; that the employé replied that he had to do it; that from this employé plaintiff got the name of St. John, and wrote him. It does not appear that "St. John" ever received the letter, or that it was sent by mail. Nor does the record show who St. John was, or what connection he had with the defendants—whether he was president or director, or not connected with them at all. The employé to whom plaintiff made his objection was the person who was in charge of the water tank at the dam, but it does not definitely appear at what time the objection was made to him. Whether notice to an employé whose business it is to attend to a pumping station would be a sufficient notice is a question not made by the present record.

2. The trial judge, in his order refusing a new trial, stated that he did so because of the former decision of this court in the same case (115 Ga. 475, 41 S. E. 566), stating that a judgment granting a nonsuit on the ground that there had been no notice given had been reversed. The reversal of the judgment when the case was here before was not because this court deemed notice unnecessary where the lessees had merely maintained the nuisance as it had been turned over to them, but because there was evidence from which the jury could have found that the defendants had originally built the dam, or that they had increased its height after taking possession under the lease, and that these issues ought to have been submitted to the jury. No express ruling was made upon any general question of law, and there was certainly no intention to change a well-established legal principle, one which appears in our Civil Code of 1895 (section 3862).

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

FARMERS' & TRADERS' NAT. BANK OF COVINGTON, KY., v. ALLEN-HOLMES CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—ACTION FOR TRESPASS—DAMAGES.

1. One is liable in an action of trespass for causing an attachment against a debtor to be levied on a consignment of goods in the custody of a common carrier, the title to which was in a third person, to whom a bill of lading covering the shipment had previously been duly assigned by such debtor; and, if the property so levied on was brought to sale under the attachment proceedings, such third person would be entitled to recover damages for such unlawful seizure and sale.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. S. Humphreys, Judge.

Action by the Farmers' & Traders' National Bank of Covington, Ky., against the Allen-Holmes Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Farmers' & Traders' National Bank of Covington, Ky., brought an action against the Allen-Holmes Company, a partnership, alleging that firm was indebted to it in the sum of $686.66, principal, and interest thereon, because of the following facts. On or about the 1st of January, 1902, the Allen-Holmes Company ordered a car load of corn from Henry Helle & Sons, to be paid for on delivery; and, in compliance with the order, Henry Helle & Sons shipped to the Allen-Holmes Company a car load of corn, retaining the bill of lading issued therefor, which was attached to a sight draft drawn in favor of plaintiff for the value of the corn. In due course of trade the plaintiff discounted this draft drawn on the Allen-Holmes Company by Henry Helle & Sons, and acquired possession of the bill of lading attached thereto, which was pledged as security for the sum advanced. When the car of corn arrived at Moultrie, its destination, the Allen-Holmes Company declined to accept the same, and on or about April 2, 1902, had issued from the city court of Moultrie an attachment against Henry Helle & Sons for an alleged indebtedness of $545.15, and had the attachment levied by the sheriff on the car of corn, which was subsequently sold by him by virtue of said attachment. By reason of the transfer and assignment of the bill of lading as aforesaid, the corn was the property of plaintiff. It was, on the date it was ordered, of the value of $686.66, which amount plaintiff would have received, had the defendant accepted the shipment, and not have levied said attachment. Any judgment that may have been entered in the attachment proceeding was illegal and void, because (1) the car load of corn levied on was not the property of the defendant in attachment, but was the property of plaintiff; and (2) the defendant in attachment had no legal notice or service of the pending attachment, did not enter an appearance in that proceeding, and made no waiver of notice thereof. The defendant demurred generally to the plaintiff's petition, and it was dismissed by the trial court. To the judgment sustaining the defendant's demurrer, exception was taken by the plaintiff.

J. D. McKenzie and Shipp & Kline, for plaintiff in error. W. F. Way, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. (after stating the facts). The refined niceties of technical pleading do not obtain in Georgia. The pleader is only required to plainly, fully, and distinctly set forth in the plaintiff's petition his "charge, ground of complaint and demand, and the names of the persons against whom process is prayed." Civ. Code 1895, § 4960. The sufficiency of the facts alleged to constitute a cause of action may be challenged by demurrer, and, when so challenged, it is the duty of the court to analyze the petition, and to ascertain if the plaintiff is legally entitled to any of the relief prayed for under the facts alleged.

It is clear that the pleader who framed the petition filed in the present case did not undertake to set forth any cause of action based on a breach of the contract made for the sale of the corn, for that contract is alleged to have been between the defendant and Henry Helle & Sons, and no privity of contract between the defendant and the plaintiff is averred or appears from the facts recited. Nor is the petition drafted on the theory that there had been a wrongful conversion of the plaintiff's property. The suit sounds in trespass, and is for an unlawful invasion of the property rights of the plaintiff.

The facts alleged in the petition amounted to an actionable trespass. An attachment against a third person was levied at the instance of the defendant upon the plaintiff's property, which was sold thereunder. The attachment was authority to the levying officer to seize the property of the defendant in attachment, but none whatever to seize the property of a third person, though the defendant in attachment had lately sold it to him. Wilson v. Paulsen, 57 Ga. 596. When a fi. fa. issues upon a general judgment, or an attachment issues in ordinary cases, the officer is simply commanded to levy and seize generally property of the defendant, and when he acts he does so at his peril. If he seizes property of a person other than the defendant, and thereby causes injury to an innocent party, he and all parties acting with him in procuring such seizure are liable as joint trespassers. Hasslett v. Rodgers, 107 Ga. 244, 33 S. E. 44; McDougald v. Dougherty, 12 Ga. 613; Holton v. Taylor, 80 Ga. 508, 6 S. E. 15.

The title to the corn was alleged to be in the plaintiff at the time of the levy of the attachment. Helle & Sons had parted with title thereto when that firm transferred the bill of lading to the plaintiff bank. The bill of lading issued by the carrier was assignable, and passed title to the corn into the bank. Civ. Code 1895, § 3554; Commercial Bank v. Armsby Co., 120 Ga. 74, 47 S. E. 589, 65 L. R. A. 443. After the assignment of this bill of lading, the bank had constructive possession of the car load of corn which had been delivered to the carrier for transportation. See Central Georgia Co. v. Exchange Bank, 101 Ga. 353, 28 S. E. 863. Under the very terms of the contract of shipment, the carrier obligated itself to transport the car and hold it subject to the orders of the holder of the bill of lading, whether such holder was the party to whom the bill of lading was originally issued or his assignee. So, at the time the car arrived at its destination, the railroad company's possession of the corn was that of the plaintiff bank, and, as bailee, the company would have been liable to the bank if it had delivered the goods to the consignee without a due surrender to it of the bill of lading held by the bank. Hobbs v. Chicago Pack- ing Co., 98 Ga. 576, 25 S. E. 584, 58 Am. St. Rep. 320. While the corn was thus in the constructive possession of the bank, though in the physical custody of the carrier, the defendant caused an attachment against Helle & Sons to be levied on it, and it was seized and sold under the attachment proceedings. This unlawful invasion of the plaintiff's right of property gave it a cause of action, and if, as alleged, the property was wholly lost because of the illegal levy and sale, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover at least the actual value of the corn. This was alleged to be the price which the defendant agreed to pay Helle & Sons on delivery at destination.

It follows from what is said above that the plaintiff's petition was good as against a general demurrer, and the trial court erred in dismissing the action.

(122 Ga. 82)

ATLANTA, K. & N. RY. CO. v. GARDNER.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

RAILROADS—PERSONAL INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—MORTALITY TABLES—EARNING CAPACITY—EVIDENCE—COMPLAINTS OF PAIN—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A separate count in a petition claiming damages for negligence, which alleged in general terms that the defendant was guilty of negligence, should have been stricken on special demurrer setting up that it failed to set forth the particulars in which the defendant was negligent, unless the defect therein was cured by amendment.

2. On the trial of an action brought by a minor for permanent personal injuries, when no evidence was submitted in reference to the earning capacity of the plaintiff prior to the injuries, there was no measure of damages for such injuries except the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors, guided by the facts and circumstances of the particular case. A charge to this effect was not inapplicable in the present case.

3. There was no expression of opinion upon the facts of the case in charging the jury that "the duty resting by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the danger is impending, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent man would have reason to apprehend its existence." Nor was this charge erroneous because the court failed, in the same connection, to charge that if the plaintiff could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, there could be no recovery.

4. In a suit for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the negligence of the defendant, the law of contributory negligence was not involved, if the person injured did not fail to exercise ordinary care for his safety before the negligence of the defendant was either apparent or should have been apprehended by him, and could not after that time have avoided the consequences of such negligence by the exercise of ordinary care.

5. On the trial of such an action against a railway company, a charge that "failure to exercise ordinary care on the part of the person injured before the negligence complained of is apparent or should be reasonably apprehended would not preclude a recovery, but would authorize a jury to diminish the damages in proportion to the fault of the person injured," did not properly present to the jury the imperative requirement of the Civil Code of 1895 (section 2322) in reference to the diminution of the plaintiff's damages in such a case.

6. As Civ. Code 1895, § 2322, 3830, involve separate and distinct defenses to cases of this character, a rule applicable to one of them alone should not be given in immediate connection with the other, without appropriate explanation. We will not say, however, that the charge complained of on this ground was necessarily so confusing to the jury as to be cause for a new trial.

7. Under the pleadings and the evidence in this case, it was erroneous not to charge the principle that if the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, she could not recover, although the court was not requested to so charge by the defendant.

8. The court should not only state the contention of a party to the jury, but should also state the law applicable to such contention.

9. Charging the principle laid down in Civ. Code 1895, § 2322, that "no person shall recover damages of a railroad company for injury to him or his property" where the same "is caused by his own negligence," is not equivalent to charging the principle, contained in section 3830, that, "if the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover."

10. "On the trial of an action for personal injuries alleged to be permanent, mortality tables are not proper evidence, and instructions as to their use are inappropriate, unless there be some evidence as to the value of the plaintiff's services or capacity to earn money."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, § 487.]

11. On the trial of such an action, complaints made by the plaintiff to her attending physician of pains in designated portions of her body were not admissible in evidence in her favor, unless made under such circumstances as to be equivalent to spontaneous and involuntary exclamations or outcries, groans, convulsive movements, and other physical manifestations of present pain and suffering.

12. Though a question propounded to a witness was irrelevant and objected to upon this ground, yet if the answer thereto was not unfavorable to the objecting party, or stated only an admissible fact, the overruling of the objection to the question was not cause for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Pickens County; Geo. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by Ruth Gardner, by her next friend, against the Atlanta, Knoxville & Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Ruth Gardner, aged 17 years, by her next friend, Hiram L. Gardner, brought suit in Pickens county against the Atlanta, Knoxville & Northern Railway Company for $15,000, as damages resulting from physical injuries alleged to have been sustained by her in consequence of the negligence of the defendant company. The petition alleged that she "was driving a buggy," and "her route involved crossing over the defendant's railroad track upon a public crossing known as 'Whitfield's Crossing,' in Pickens county," that she "drove said buggy, in the exercise of due care, towards said crossing, and just as she was crossing over the defendant's tracks, and just as she had cleared the tracks, a freight train of the defendant dashed upon the crossing, negligently and recklessly frightening the horse, and causing him to plunge back, and so close was the train to the vehicle that some portion of the train near the front end of it caught the buggy and horse, tore the buggy to pieces, killed the horse, and threw [her] to the ground and greatly and permanently injured her." The petition further alleged that "defendant negligently failed to blow the whistle upon approaching said crossing for a distance of 400 yards, and negligently failed to check and keep checking upon approaching said crossing, so as to be able to stop in time should any person or thing be upon the crossing; and defendant negligently failed to whistle at all or to check at all, and negligently failed to keep a lookout ahead, and was negligently running said train at a speed of about 40 miles per hour, and negligently failed to exercise any sort of care in approaching said crossing." The sixth paragraph of the petition was as follows: "And for further cause of action, and by way of an additional count, plaintiff says that on the 27th day of May, 1902, at Whitfield's crossing in said county, she was injured by the running of the cars, locomotives, and other machinery of the defendant company, and the defendant failed to exercise all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence." The seventh paragraph set forth the extent and character of her physical injuries, her pain and suffering consequent thereon; that she "was a minor and an orphan, and was studying to perfect herself in the art of music, and said injuries have so disabled her that she has been unable to pursue her studies at all, and has, further, been unable to perform any kind of labor or service, either domestic or of any other character"; that "she was able to and did perform divers domestic services about the house, in the way of housekeeping and the like"; that "she was also able to sew, and assisted in sewing, and would shortly have so perfected herself in music as to be able to teach"; that "her services were of the value of $15 to $20 per month, and these have been destroyed for all the future"; that "her capacity to labor and earn money is totally destroyed"; that "doctor's and medical bills are $250"; and that "for each and all of the foregoing items of damage plaintiff sues." The defendant demurred, both generally and specially, to the plaintiff's petition. The court overruled the demurrers, to which ruling the defendant filed exceptions pendente lite. After demurring, the defendant answered the petition, admitting that it was a corporation, and that the occurrence complained of happened in Pickens county, but denying all the other material allegations of the petition. Upon the trial the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,000. There was a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted, assigning error upon the exceptions pendente lite and upon the overruling of the motion for a new trial.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, W. T. Day, and Clay & Blair, for plaintiff in error. Arnold & Arnold, F. C. Tate, and Geo. L. Bell, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. (after stating the facts): 1. The only demurrer insisted upon in the brief and written argument of counsel for the plaintiff in error is the special demurrer to the sixth paragraph of the petition. This demurrer was upon the ground that this paragraph set forth only the conclusion of the pleader, "without alleging wherein defendant failed to exercise all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence." This demurrer should have been sustained, and this paragraph of the petition stricken. As will be seen from the above statement of facts, this paragraph began as follows: "And for further cause of action, and by way of an additional count, plaintiff says," etc.; so it is clear that this was an entirely separate and distinct count. "A count in a petition against a railway company, claiming damages for negligence, which alleges in general terms that the defendant was guilty of negligence, should be stricken on special demurrer setting up that the petition fails to set forth the particulars in which the defendant was negligent, unless the defect in the petition is cured by amendment." Central Ry. Co. v. Weathers, 120 Ga. 475, 47 S. E. 956, and cit. Whether in the present case the refusal of the trial judge to sustain the special demurrer to this count of the petition would have been sufficient ground for reversing the judgment below need not be determined, as a new trial should have been granted upon certain other grounds in the motion therefor.

2. One ground of the motion for a new trial complains of the following charge of the court: "Where a minor has suffered a permanent injury, and such minor is too young to have selected an avocation or to begin to illustrate her earning capacity, in such cases there is no measure as to the amount of damages, where such minor is entitled to recover therefor, except the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors, guided by all the facts and circumstances of the particular case." The errors assigned are: "(1) That this charge was inapplicable. (2) This charge (without qualification) gave the jury an incorrect rule as to the measure for damages sought by plaintiff for lost time, lost capacity, lost earnings, doctor's bills, and permanent injuries. These were matters for computation under other rules, and not to be left to the consciences of jurors, however impartial." This charge was not inapplicable to the facts of the case, as shown by the evidence before the jury, and, under those facts, there was no measure of damages except the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors, guided by all the facts and circumstances of the case. The petition did not allege that the plaintiff was earning any income at the time that she was injured, nor that she had ever earned any, nor did the plaintiff undertake to sustain by evidence the allegations of the petition as to her earning capacity at the time she was injured. The plaintiff introduced no evidence whatever upon this subject, nor upon the subject of expenses incident to her injuries. As her case went before the jury, she was seeking to recover alone for pain and suffering and permanent injuries, without undertaking to furnish the jury by evidence with any standard from which to calculate the amount of diminution in her earning capacity. She did not rely upon loss of established earning capacity, for she did not offer to prove that she ever had any. The proof showed that she was 17 years old at the time she received the injuries complained of. So the charge excepted to was applicable to the facts of the case, and the legal principle charged was in accordance with the decision of this court in Western & Atlantic Railroad Company v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 7 S. E. 912, 12 Am. St. Rep. 320 (4). There it was held: "For a personal injury to a child nine years of age, including deprivation of a member, the law furnishes no measure of damages other than the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors, guided by all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Amongst the results of the injury to be considered are pain and suffering, disfigurement and mutilation of person, and impaired capacity to pursue the ordinary avocations of life at and after attainment of majority." In that case Chief Justice Bleckley said: "A brief but excellent model of a charge upon the measure of damages, where the subject of the injury was a child, will be found in Davis v. The Central Railroad, 60 Ga. 329." The charge here referred to and commended was as follows: "There is no known rule of law by which witnesses can give you the amount in dollars and cents as the amount of the injury, but this is left to the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury. This does not mean that juries can arbitrarily enrich one party at the expense of the other, nor that they should act unreasonably through mere caprice. But it authorizes you to give reasonable damages where the party shows that the law authorizes it. But the jury should exercise common sense and love of justice, and, from a desire to do right, fix an amount that will fairly compensate for the injury received."

3. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial of the following charge of the court: "The duty resting by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the danger is impending, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent man would have reason to apprehend its existence. Failure to exercise ordinary care on the part of the person injured, before the negligence complained of is apparent or should be reasonably apprehended, would not preclude a recovery, but would authorize a jury to diminish the damages in proportion to the fault of the person injured." While in the motion for a new trial there are several assignments of error upon this charge, the argument here by counsel for the plaintiff in error has taken a wider range than seems to be authorized by any of these exceptions. One point which has been much stressed is that the court erred in charging that the duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise "until the danger is impending"; it being contended, with much force, that the duty arises whenever such negligence is discovered, and that no danger may be impending to the discoverer at such time, and may never be if he then exercises ordinary care for his own safety. But none of the assignments of error upon this charge, in the motion for a new trial, presents the question here indicated. We will say, however, in passing, that the language of the court which has been thus criticised in the argument of counsel was, as we have seen, followed and qualified by the words, "or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent man would have reason to apprehend its existence." We do not think that there is any merit in the exception that this charge, "without qualification or further explanation, was calculated to mislead the jury, and was an expression of opinion that the danger was not impending, and should not have been apprehended by the plaintiff, at the time she was injured." There was no expression of opinion involved in the charge, and we do not see how the jury could have been misled into believing that there was. The failure of the court to distinctly charge the principle that the plaintiff could not recover if she could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, did not make the charge here excepted to erroneous. The failure to give this principle in charge at all has been properly excepted to in another ground of the motion, which we will hereinafter consider.

4. Another exception to this charge is based upon the second sentence thereof, quoted above. This exception is: "The jury should not have been restricted to the want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff before the negligence of the defendant became apparent or should have been apprehended. They should have been instructed that any negligence on her part contributing to her injury would require that the recovery in her favor be diminished in proportion to the amount of default attributable to her." The sentence of the charge here excepted to follows the second headnote in Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 Ga. 708, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802, being in almost its very language. If the plaintiff did not fail to exercise ordinary care before the negligence of the defendant was existing and was apparent or should have been reasonably apprehended by her, and after that time could have avoided the consequences to herself of the defendant's negligence by the exercise of ordinary care, she was not entitled to recover at all. On the other hand, if, after she knew or ought to have apprehended the existence of the defendant's negligence, she could not by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided its consequences, then she did not by her own negligence contribute to the injuries which she sustained, and her damages should not have been diminished at all. The law of contributory negligence is not applicable to a case in which the facts show that the person injured did not fail to exercise ordinary care before the negligence of the defendant was either apparent or should have been apprehended by him, and could not after that time have avoided the consequences of such negligence by the exercise of ordinary care. This we understand to be the doctrine laid down in Western & Atlantic Railroad Company v. Ferguson, supra, where Mr. Justice Cobb, speaking for the court, said: "From the expressions used and rulings made in the cases cited (and there are many others where similar expressions are used and similar rulings made), the rule of force with reference to the subject under investigation seems to be well settled, and may be thus stated: The duty imposed by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the negligence of such other is existing and is apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend its existence. In such cases, and in such cases only, does the failure to exercise ordinary care to escape the consequences of negligence entirely defeat a recovery. In other cases—that is, where the person injured by the negligence of another is at fault himself, in that he did not, before the negligence of the other became apparent, or before the time arrived when as an ordinarily prudent person it should have appeared to him that there was reason to apprehend its existence, observe that amount of care and diligence which would be observed under like circumstances by an ordinarily prudent person—such fault or failure to exercise due care and diligence at such a time would not entirely preclude a recovery, but would authorize the jury to diminish the damages 'in proportion to the amount of default attributable to' the person injured."

5. Another exception to this charge is that "the charge gives the jury permission to reduce the verdict for plaintiff's want of care, but does not instruct them that it shall be done," and that "the jury should have been instructed that any fault on the part of the plaintiff would require that the damages be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to her." We think this exception is well taken. The Civil Code of 1895 (section 2322) provides: "If the complainant and the agents of the company are both at fault, the former may recover, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him." It is contended by counsel for defendant in error that the word "authorize," as used by the court in the expression "but would authorize the jury to diminish the damages," etc., is equivalent to "require," and, therefore, that this exception is not sound. This very question was raised in Georgia Railroad v. Pittman, 73 Ga. 325, and it was there held that: "Although the court charged that, if the officers of the railroad and the deceased were both at fault, the jury 'would be authorized to make such reasonable deduction,' yet where, in the same connection, he charged the rule of contributory negligence in the language of the statute, that 'the damages shall be diminished by the jury,' there was no error which requires a new trial." In the opinion Chief Justice Jackson said: "The error alleged in the twelfth ground struck us with some force during the argument, but on examination of the whole charge it disappears." Then, after stating that the point was that the court "merely authorized the jury to do what the statute made imperative upon them," and showing that the full charge did "tell the jury what the law is, a few paragraphs before this excepted to," he concludes that as the court gave the law, "its imperative requirement, as their authority, the plaintiff in error was not hurt by the language excepted to." The question came up again in Krogg v. Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, 77 Ga. 202, 4 Am. St. Rep. 77, and it was held that "while in one part of the charge the judge erroneously stated that the jury would be authorized to reduce the damages if they saw proper, yet in other portions of the charge this inaccuracy was corrected, and no harm resulted from it." Judge Blandford, who delivered the opinion, said: "It is further contended that the court below committed manifest error in instructing the jury that they 'would be authorized to reduce the damages,' etc., if they see proper. We think this charge is objectionable, in that it turns the jury loose to do as they pleased, and we think the court should hold them well in hand; but we held in Georgia Railroad v. Pittman, 73 Ga. 325, that such a charge as this was cured by other portions of the charge, in which the court confined the jury to their duty as to their finding. Immediately after the charge complained of follow two charges by the court, the same being requests of the defendants' counsel, and these requests corrected the looseness of the charge complained of; so we think no harm resulted from the charge." It will be seen that in each of these cases a charge of the court similar to the one now under review was held to be erroneous, but that the error contained therein was harmless when such instruction was modified and explained by other portions of the charge wherein the law contained in the statute was correctly given to the jury. In the present case the trial judge failed to give the jury any other instruction whatever upon this particular subject, and so this particular instruction went before them without modification or explanation. As said by Judge Hopkins, in the Law of Personal Injuries, § 208, "The section [2322] is imperative, and the court should hold the jury to it." The jury were not held to it by the charge in the present case, as they might well have believed that, while they were authorized to diminish the plaintiff's damages in proportion to her negligence, they were not required to do so.

6. The court charged the jury that "no person shall recover damages from a railroad company for injury to himself or his property, where the same is done by his consent or is caused by his own negligence." This principle is laid down in this exact language in Civ. Code 1895, § 2322. The court then immediately gave the instruction, which we have been considering, relative to the duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence. One ground of the motion for a new trial is that it was error for the court to give these different rules of law in connection with each other, without further explanation. While the court failed to charge the jury the principle contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 3830, that, "if the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself of the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover," what the court did charge in reference to the time when the duty to exercise such care to avoid the consequences of the negligence of another arises was applicable only to the last-quoted section of the Civil Code. It has been frequently held that sections 2322 and 3830 involve separate and distinct defenses to cases of this character. For this reason, it has also been repeatedly held that to charge them in immediate connection with each other, without any explanation of their different meanings, is error. Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. Co. v. Hatcher, 118 Ga. 273, 45 S. E. 239, and cases cited. If the two sections should not be charged in immediate connection, without proper explanation, it follows that a principle which is applicable to only one of them should not, without appropriate explanation, be given in charge in immediate connection with the other. We will not say, however, that the charge complained of was for this reason necessarily so confusing as to be cause for a new trial.

7. Another ground of the motion for a new trial is that the court erred in failing to charge the jury that if the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, she could not recover. Under the evidence in this case, the court should have given this principle of law in charge to the jury, and this ground of the motion alone was sufficient to require the grant of a new trial. Upon proof of the injury by the running of the defendant's locomotives and cars, a presumption of negligence arose against the company, and this presumption was not removed, because the company failed to show that its agents had "exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence." It failed to show that it had complied with the statutory requirements applicable to railroad trains approaching public crossings. Consequently, as the case went before the jury, the defendant was bound to be liable to the plaintiff to some extent, unless the evidence disclosed that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences to herself of the negligence of the defendant. As the defendant contended that it was not liable at all, and relied, as it was obliged to do under such circumstances, upon the theory that the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences of its negligence by the exercise of ordinary care, the failure of the court to charge the law upon this subject deprived the defendant of its main defense. Counsel for the defendant in error contend that this was not an issue in the case, because the defendant's answer did not set up any contributory negligence; that it did not set up either want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff or negligence by the plaintiff, but merely denied the allegations in the plaintiff's petition, which simply amounts to a denial of the facts as charged, and to a denial of the negligence charged against the defendant. The plaintiff alleged that she drove the buggy in which she was riding, in the exercise of due care, toward the railroad crossing where the collision occurred which caused her injuries, and the defendant denied this. So, even under the pleadings, the parties were at issue upon the question of due care by the plaintiff in driving upon the railroad crossing at the time that she did. Besides, the defendant by its plea certainly denied any liability to the plaintiff; and if the jury, from the evidence before them, could have found that, notwithstanding the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences to her of such negligence, the law applicable to such a state of facts was directly involved in the case, and the court should have given it in charge to the jury. In Atlanta Railway & Power Co. v. Gaston, 118 Ga. 418

45 S. E. 508, it was held that where the evidence was conflicting, "but there was testimony from which the jury could have found that both parties were in the exercise of ordinary care and that the injury was the result of a casualty, it was error not to charge that the defendant could relieve itself of the statutory presumption by showing that neither party was to blame and that the damage was the result of a pure accident." In the opinion, Mr. Justice Lamar said: "But the mutual criminations and re-criminations are not necessarily exhaustive of the substantial issues raised by the evidence, and as to which the jury must be instructed. Here it could have found that neither was to blame, and, that being true, it was requisite to charge what would be the result of such a finding. The failure to so charge deprived the company of the benefit of a substantial defense." Of course, there is no merit in the contention that the failure of the defendant to submit to the court a written request to charge the legal principle involved in this ground of the motion disposes of the ground. "Where the judge gives in charge substantially the law governing the case, if more specific instructions on any point are desired, they should be asked; but the law of the case must be given to the jury to the extent of covering the substantial issues made by the evidence, whether requested or not, or whether the attention of the court be called thereto or not; otherwise the verdict will be set aside." Central Railroad v. Harris, 76 Ga. 501, and cases cited; Strickland v. State, 98 Ga. 84, 25 S. E. 908; Chattanooga R. Co. v. Volla, 113 Ga. 361, 38 S. E. 819.

8. The able and ingenious counsel for the defendant in error seeks to show that the court did give the principle in question in charge to the jury, when, in the beginning of his instructions, he stated to the jury the respective contentions of the parties. It is one thing to state what a party contends, and another and a very different thing to state the law applicable to such contention. To state to the jury, as the court did, that the defendant contended that it had not "been guilty of any neglect, and that if the plaintiff was hurt it was done under such circumstances that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, could have avoided any injury, if in fact she was injured, and that therefore the defendant [was] not liable," was far from being equivalent to charging the law laid down in Civ. Code 1895, § 3830.

9. Nor can we agree with counsel that the charging of the principle laid down in section 2322, that "no person shall recover damage of a railroad company for injury to him or his property where the same is done by his consent, or is caused by his own negligence," was equivalent to charging the principle contained in section 3830. This has been expressly ruled by this court. In Central Railroad v. Harris, supra, which was a suit by a wife for the homicide of her husband, it was held "that the defendant was entitled to have submitted to the jury both the question whether the plaintiff's husband caused the injury solely by his own negligence, and also whether, by the use of ordinary care, he could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence." In the opinion (page 508, 76 Ga.) Chief Justice Jackson said: "The railroad company had two defenses in this case, either of which would bar any recovery by the plaintiff. One is that the plaintiff's husband caused the killing by his own negligence; the other is that the plaintiff's husband could have avoided the consequence of the company's negligence by ordinary care. The first is found in section 3034 of the Code [now section 2322]; the last in section 2972 [now section 3830]. The two defenses are not the same. They are not identical." He then points out the difference between the two. This ruling was followed, at the same term of the court, in Central Railroad v. Thompson, 76 Ga. 770 (9). The difference between these two sections of the Code had been previously pointed out and discussed in the concurring opinion of Justices Jackson and Blandford in Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. Co. v. Stewart, 71 Ga. 429, where they held (page 447, 71 Ga.) that "the two sections ought not to be construed as the same, but in pari materia as separate defenses." We have seen that even to charge these separate sections of the Civil Code in immediate connection with each other, and without explanation as to their different meanings, is erroneous.

10. Complaint is made in the motion for a new trial of a lengthy excerpt from the charge of the court in reference to the Carlisle Mortality Table, which was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff; the assignment of error being that "this charge was not authorized by the facts in evidence, and that it was calculated to mislead the jury." Under the decision of this court in Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Co. v. Moore, 99 Ga. 229, 25 S. E. 460, instructions in reference to the mortality table and its use by the jury were erroneous. It was there held: "On the trial of an action for personal injuries alleged to be permanent, mortality tables are not proper evidence, and instructions as to their use are inappropriate, unless there be some evidence as to the value of the plaintiff's services or capacity to earn money." See, also, Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R. Co. v. Johnson, 36 Ill. App. 564. In the present case, as we have seen, the plaintiff did not even undertake to show the value of her services or her capacity to earn money.

11. Complaint was also made in the motion of the refusal of the court to exclude, as hearsay, certain testimony of Dr. Earnest, a physician who attended and treated the plaintiff, and whose depositions were taken and introduced in her behalf. The testimony in question was that the plaintiff "complained of backache and pains in her hips," and also of other physical ailments, and his statement that the evidence of some inflammatory trouble having existed consisted in the presence of some adhesions and some deposits in the broad ligaments, "and in the history given me by the patient herself of her having suffered certain pains for a considerable period past"—the quoted words being the testimony objected to. The witness had not been called in by the plaintiff to examine her for the purpose of qualifying himself to testify as a witness in her behalf, nor was he called in after suit brought, but he attended, examined, and treated her, as his patient, some months before the suit was instituted. We have devoted considerable time and investigation to the question here presented, and have examined a great number of cases in which, in one form or another, the question of the admissibility of statements of this character, made by one person to another, has been presented and determined. We find that practically all of the courts in which the question has arisen hold that statements of present pain and suffering, made before suit brought, by a patient to his physician who has been called in solely for the purpose of examining, advising, and treating him, may be given in evidence by such physician, when called as an expert witness, as part of the facts upon which he bases his opinion as to the nature and extent of the patient's injuries or disease. As to the admissibility of statements of past pains or sensations, made by a patient to his physician, there is a decided conflict in the rulings of the courts, some holding that such statements are inadmissible, while others hold that it is admissible for the physician to testify to them when giving his opinion as an expert to the jury. The weight of outside authority, however, seems to be that statements or narratives of past pains and symptoms made by a patient to his physician are inadmissible. Some of the courts, impressed with the danger of opening the door of evidence for the admission of hearsay testimony, particularly in cases in which the hearsay statement may be of a self-serving nature, hold that statements of the above character, even when made by a patient to his physician, are not admissible if made after suit brought by the patient for his injuries. Others hold that they are not admissible if made to a physician or surgeon called for the sole purpose of qualifying himself to testify, as an expert, in behalf of the plaintiff in an action for damages. A few recognize no such distinction, but hold that the fact that the statements were made under such circumstances does not render them inadmissible, but is merely a circumstance to be taken into consideration by the jury in weighing the effect of such statements and the opinion of the expert based in part thereon. While we feel some hesitancy in laying down a rule in this state which will run counter to what seems to be the rule generally, if not universally, accepted elsewhere, we have reached the conclusion that there is no sound reason for making any exception in cases of this character to the rule which excludes hearsay testimony. In Atlanta Street Railway Company v. Walker, 93 Ga. 462, 21 S. E. 48, this court held that "since the change in the law allowing parties to testify in their own behalf," it is not "competent for a plaintiff, suing for physical injuries, to prove by his wife that subsequently to their infliction he frequently complained to her of pains and hurts resulting therefrom, and stated that he suffered a great deal." In that case the complaints were of present pain and suffering. In the opinion, Chief Justice Bleckley said: "The plaintiff's wife was permitted to testify to his complaints made in her hearing. She said he complained of his side a great deal; and, being told to state all his complaints, she said his head hurt him, and his side and leg; he suffered a great deal. Such evidence as this, by a witness other than the wife of a party, was competent and admissible so long as the law excluded parties from being witnesses in their own behalf, but now that they are by statute competent to testify, and where, as in this case, the testimony is heard from the plaintiff himself, who knew the facts of pain and suffering, his wife, whose knowledge of them was derived from hearsay, was not competent to prove complaints which were no part of the res gestae of the injury. The ground on which such evidence was formerly deemed competent was the ground of necessity. That necessity no longer exists. The higher and better evidence is that of the person who has actual knowledge of the truth of the pains and other feelings to which the complaints relate. This ruling was followed in Savannah R. Co. v. Wainwright, 99 Ga. 255, 25 S. E. 622. This is eminently sound reasoning, and applies as well in a case in which the complaints are made to the complaining person's physician as in a case in which they are made by a husband to his wife. The decision in Feagin v. Beasley, 23 Ga. 17, which was a suit for breach of warranty of the soundness of a negro slave sold by the defendant to the plaintiff, that the representations of the negro as to his symptoms, made during his medical examination, were admissible, was made at a time when the negro, being a slave, was not competent to testify against a free white person (Grady v. State, 11 Ga. 253), and his representations to the physician and others were admissible upon the ground of necessity, to which Judge Bleckley refers.

The distinction between statements of pain and suffering made to a physician and such statements made to any other person, so far as admissibility in evidence is concerned, has been rejected by a number of courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, which held that: "The declarations of a party himself, to whomsoever made, are competent evidence, when confined strictly to such complaints, expressions, and exclamations as furnish evidence of a present existing pain or malady, to prove his condition, ills, pains, and symptoms, whether arising from sickness, or from an injury by accident or violence. If made to a medical attendant, they are of more weight than if made to another person." Northern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Urlin, 158 U. S. 271, 275, 15 Sup. Ct. 840, 39 L. Ed. 977. In that case the statements in question were made by the plaintiff at various times to physicians who subsequently testified in his behalf, but, as seen above, the court refused to recognize a distinction, so far as admissibility in evidence was concerned, between statements made to medical attendants and similar statements made to any one else. So it is said, in Greenleaf on Evidence, that "the representation by a sick person of the nature, symptoms, and effects of the malady under which he is laboring at the time are received as original evidence. If made to a medical attendant, they are of greater weight as evidence; but if made to any other person, they are not on that account rejected." 1 Gr. Ev. (16th Ed.) § 162b. In this last edition of this work the editor thereof explains that statements of this character are not received as original evidence, but as exceptions to the hearsay rule; and, in his additions to the original text, he speaks of the limitation of the admissibility of such statements to those made to an attending physician as "unsound upon precedent, principle, and policy," and cites the following cases, in which such limitation has been repudiated: Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Urlin, supra; Hancock Co. v. Leggett, 115 Ind. 547, 18 S. E. 53; Chicago R. Co. v. Spilker, 134 Ind. 392, 33 N. E. 280, 34 N. E. 218; Louisville R. Co. v. Miller, 141 Ind. 533, 559, 37 N. E. 343; Cleveland R. Co. v. Prewitt, 134 Ind. 557, 33 N. E. 367; Baltimore R. Co. v. Rambo, 59 Fed. 75, 8 C. C. A. 6, 16 U. S. App. 277; Bagley v. Mason, 69 Vt. 175, 37 Atl. 287; Brown v. Mt. Holly, 69 Vt. 364, 38 Atl. 69. In the case of Rowell v. City of Lowell, 11 Gray (Mass.) 420, decided when that eminent jurist Chief Justice Shaw was at the head of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, not only was no such distinction made, but it was held that, "in an action to recover for personal injuries, a surgeon who attended and prescribed for the plaintiff once, three months after the accident, and examined the injuries again after the action was brought, may be allowed to testify to his opinion of the plaintiff's condition, and the lasting character of the injuries, derived from what he saw, but not from any statements of the plaintiff." The ruling of the court below, excluding the opinion of the surgeon, formed "from the declarations of the patient" when he visited and prescribed for her before suit was brought, "as to her then state of feeling, and the examination [he then] made * * * as to the extent of the injury she was then laboring under," was affirmed. So we have eminent authority to sustain our view that, if complaints of a person of pain or other physical sensation which produce discomfort or suffering are admissible in evidence at all, there is no sound reason for distinguishing between those made to a medical attendant and those made to any one else. This being true, under the decision of this court in Atlanta Street Railway Company v. Walker, supra, it appears to us that the testimony now in question was inadmissible.

It is true that it was held in a later case that "exclamations or complaints made by a person undergoing physical examination by a physician with a view to ascertaining the extent of his alleged injuries, and apparently made in response to manipulations of the person's body or members by the physician, are admissible in evidence, though such person was not under the treatment of this particular physician, and the examination was being made solely for the purpose indicated. Whether or not the exclamations were involuntary, or the complaints were bona fide, is for determination by the jury under all the evidence submitted." Broyles v. Pricsock, 97 Ga. 643, 25 S. E. 389. But the ruling in that case was put upon the ground that "complaints of pain which are made apparently in response to manipulation of the person do not come within the rule which excludes hearsay and self-serving declarations, and it is not necessary, in order to render them admissible, that they should be made to a physician for the purpose of treatment. Such complaints are regarded as manifestations of pain, as part of the res gestæ of the pain, and are not classed with mere descriptive statements." There complaints of pain, made in response to and coincident with manipulations of the complaining person's body, were treated as being equivalent to involuntary exclamations of pain, convulsive movements of the body, flinching, or screaming when a particular portion of the body is pressed or touched, or other physical manifestations of bodily suffering. If they had not been put upon this ground, this decision would have been clearly in conflict with the one rendered in Atlanta Street Railway Company v. Walker, supra, and it was upon this ground that the two cases were then distinguished. There is, however, a still later decision of this court, in which the writer participated, which we have found it hard to reconcile with the case cited from 93 Ga., 21 S. E. We refer to the ruling in Powell v. State, 101

Ga. 2, 29 S. E. 309, 65 Am. St. Rep. 277, where it was held: "Evidence of pain and suffering by the accused on trial for murder, and who alleges in his defense that he was attacked and beaten by the deceased, is admissible, if confined to a reasonable period of time elapsing after the homicide; and exclamations or expressions indicating the existence of present pain and suffering, made by him on the same day of the homicide, whether given in the course of a medical examination or while describing his particular pain or trouble to another, are entitled to go to the jury. Such complaints may or not have probative value; but of this the jury, under the circumstances of each case, must decide." The evidence the admissibility of which was ruled upon in that case was that the accused, when seen and examined by a nonexpert at the jail on the day of the homicide, had on one side of his neck a print that looked like the print of two fingers, and that "he was complaining of being sore," that "he was just complaining of his throat being sore." It did not appear that these complaints were in the nature of involuntary exclamations, indicating pain, made in response to pressure upon the throat or otherwise; but, from the report of the testimony then in question, it merely appears that "he was just complaining of his throat being sore," and it seems to be evident that they were not made so near in point of time to the homicide as to be considered part of the res gestae of the encounter which resulted in the killing. So that case, but for the above-cited older, conflicting, and necessarily controlling decision, would be authority for holding that evidence as to complaints of present existing pain would be admissible, and the statement of the physician that the plaintiff complained of backache and pains in her hips would be prima facie admissible, such complaints apparently referring to pains existing at the time when the statements were made to the physician. But even this was not admissible under the ruling in the older case. The rest of the testimony objected to was clearly inadmissible, because it referred to statements by the plaintiff of past sensations and symptoms. It will be observed that in neither Broyles v. Priscock nor Powell v. State was any distinction made between complaints of pain and suffering made by a patient to his physician and such complaints made to any other person. In an able and instructive article on "Declarations of Pain and Suffering," in 22 Central Law Journal, 508, 514, the writer well says: "Nothing is better settled than the rule that, when a witness can be called by a party, that party will not be permitted to prove his unsworn declarations. That which a plaintiff can prove by his own sworn statements, being a competent witness, he is not permitted to prove by statements which are unsworn. His declarations as part of the res gestae of some subject of inquiry may be proved, but otherwise they are incompetent. It is difficult to see how spoken declarations or representations of existing pain can be a part of the res gestae of such pain. If the pain is not an act, they are not declarations accompanying an act. Nor can we regard such descriptive statements of present pain as the natural language of such pain. The greatest sufferers seldom say they suffer for the purpose of indicating their pain. Such declarations are not admissible merely because they accompany the act of the party in submitting himself to examination, for it is the existence of the pain, of a bodily condition or sensation, not the fact that a doctor examined the person, that is the subject inquired about. This applies equally to examinations made by physicians for the purpose of treatment, or to qualify themselves to testify as expert witnesses."

12. The conductor of the train testified in behalf of the defendant that, upon approaching the crossing where the collision occurred, the engineer of the train gave two long and two short blasts of the whistle, and, upon cross-examination, he was asked the following question: "Did you blow at all the road crossings up and down the track on that occasion?" This question was objected to by the defendant, upon the ground that it was irrelevant, and the objection was overruled by the court. The witness answered, "Yes, sir," but, upon the question being repeated, he answered that he did not know. In the motion for a new trial error was assigned upon this ruling of the court. The facts with reference to the blowing or nonblowing of the whistle of the locomotive of this particular train at other crossings on that day were clearly irrelevant to the issues on trial, but the plaintiff had the right, upon cross-examination, to test the recollection of the witness as to the blowing of the whistle at other crossings. It would have been perfectly competent to have asked the witness if he remembered whether the whistle was blown at all the other crossings, or to have asked if he remembered whether it was sounded at other named crossings. While it may be that the particular question propounded was in itself objectionable, the testimony which it elicited gave the defendant no legal cause to complain of the ruling of the court. The first answer to the question was favorable to the defendant, and the fact stated in the second was merely in reference to the witness's memory.

WADE v. PEACOCK.

AUDITOR'S REPORT—CORRECTION—DECEDENT'S ESTATE—PRIORITIES—CLAIMS.

1. A judge of the superior court may, in framing his decree on an auditor's report, correct any error of law apparent on the face of the report, and make his decree conform to the law. This is so although exceptions filed to the report of the auditor have been withdrawn.

2. In the settlement of the estate of a decedent, debts due for rent take priority over liquidated demands.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 22, Cent. Dig. Executors and Administrators, § 964.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action between Maggie L. Wade, administratrix, and W. D. Peacock, guardian. From a judgment, Wade brings error. Affirmed.

W. C. Snodgrass, Theo. Titus, and S. S. Bennett, for plaintiff in error. Hammond & Hammond, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Exceptions of fact to an auditor's report are for a jury in the superior court; exceptions of law are for the court. Whether, in the absence of exceptions of fact, the court can, without submitting the case to a jury, and without re-reference to the auditor, frame a decree at variance with the facts reported by the auditor, is a question not involved in this case. "When there is an error of law apparent on the face of the auditor's report wholly irrespective of the evidence on which it is based, then the court can correct that error by its judgment." Brinson v. Wessolowsky, 57 Ga. 143; Anderson v. Usher, 59 Ga. 577. It can make no difference that no exceptions of law have been filed, or, if filed, have been withdrawn. We are not aware of any law requiring a judge to make an erroneous decree, based on a palpably erroneous report of law by an auditor, merely because the party affected did not file exceptions to the report. Such a rule would subordinate the judicial powers of the court to those of the auditor. To hold that re-reference to the auditor is necessary would lead to vexatious and useless delay, for, if the error of law is apparent, why may not the judge correct it at first hand, rather than send it back to the auditor for correction? In the present case the auditor made separate findings of law and fact. Exceptions were filed by the defendant in error, but were subsequently withdrawn. The auditor found as matter of law that in the payment of the debts of a decedent a debt for rent "is an unliquidated demand, and as such takes rank as an open account," and he gave priority to a liquidated demand over such a debt. This was in plain conflict with Civ. Code 1895, § 3424, providing for the priority of debts due by a decedent. The decree framed by the court "approved and confirmed" the auditor's report, but cured the error therein by giving priority to the debt due for rent. This was an inconsistency, but not one of such importance as to require a reversal of the judgment, for the intention of the decree was apparent.

GRIFFIN et al. v. COLLINS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

GUARDIAN FOR PHYSICAL INCAPACITY OF WARD — BOND — ESTOPPEL — REVOCATION OF APPOINTMENT — DISMISSAL — NOTICE OF APPLICATION — RECEIPT BY WARD — LIMITATIONS — JURY TRIAL.

1. There is no provision of law in this state for the appointment of a guardian for a person of full age solely on the ground of blindness and limited education; but where one, on his own motion, is appointed guardian of such a person, and as a condition precedent to his appointment gives bond with security for the faithful administration of the ward's estate, he and the sureties on his bond are estopped, in a suit on the bond, to deny the validity of his appointment as guardian.

2. An order of the ordinary, granting the prayer of a petition filed by one for whom a guardian has been appointed, asking that the guardianship be revoked and the estate turned over to an attorney in fact for the ward, the operation of the order being made conditional upon the guardian's making a full settlement with the ward or her attorney in fact, is not a bar to an action by the administrator of the ward on the guardian's bond.

3. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 2567, publication for four weeks of notice of the application of a guardian for letters of dismission is necessary before the guardian can obtain a valid discharge. Consequently, where a discharge was granted without compliance with this requirement of the law, it was not a bar to a suit on the guardian's bond.

4. A receipt by a ward, acquitting the guardian in full of all claims against him, is not valid if signed before the termination of the guardianship. This is so even though the ward be at the time of sound mind.

5. The period of limitation within which suit may be brought on a guardian's bond is 20 years. This is not affected by section 2565 of the Civil Code of 1895, the effect of which is to provide that in the absence of a full exhibit of the guardian's accounts, and full knowledge by the ward of his rights, receipts in final settlement of the guardian's account will be prima facie binding upon the ward only after the lapse of four years.

6. A receipt signed by a ward, acquitting her guardian of all claims against him, does not "increase the risk" of the sureties on the guardian's bond, so as to release them from liability.

7. A suit against a guardian and the sureties on his bond, seeking to recover on the bond, is an action at law; and where questions of law and fact in such a case are submitted to an auditor, and exceptions of fact are filed to the auditor's report, such exceptions should be submitted to a jury for determination.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Pope Collins, administrator, against J. M. Griffin and others. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Reversed on both bills of exceptions.

Hamilton McWhorter and James B. Park, for Griffin et al. Samuel H. Sibley, for Collins.

CANDLER, J. On October 4, 1880, James M. Griffin was appointed guardian of the estate of Harriet A. Lane, he having filed a petition to the court of ordinary of Greene county in which he alleged that Harriet A.

Lane "is blind, and of hardly any education because of said blindness; of no experience in business; and consequently, though of sound mind and of the age of thirty-nine years, utterly incapable of managing her estate." The petition concluded with a prayer that he be appointed guardian of her estate. The order of the ordinary was as follows: "Whereas, application has been made to this court by James M. Griffin, stating that Harriet A. Lane, of said county, has a considerable estate, and that owing to her blindness and limited education she is incompetent to manage her estate, and that she has no guardian; and whereas, it appears that notice of application for the issuing of a commission has been given in terms of law to inquire into the inability of the said Harriet A. Lane to manage her own business for the reasons given in the petition of said James M. Griffin, and no objection having been made: Ordered, that a commission issue in said case." The jury appointed by the ordinary found that "from blindness and limited education" she was not competent to transact her business, and recommended the appointment of a guardian. In accordance with this recommendation, it was duly ordered that Griffin be appointed guardian of the estate of Harriet A. Lane upon his giving bond in the sum of $14,000. On October 28, 1880, such a bond was given, signed by Griffin as principal, and Joseph McWhorter and J. O. Boswell as securities. The condition of the bond was that Griffin should "well and truly maintain and clothe said Harriet A. Lane according to her circumstances, and * * * take good and lawful care of her person and property according to the laws of this state, and * * * annually make a just and true return of all his actings and doings herein unto the said ordinary, and pay over all assets that [might] remain in his hands when said guardianship [should] legally terminate." Griffin continued as guardian until October 30, 1888, when Harriet A. Lane filed in the court of ordinary of Greene county a petition reciting that he had put her on notice that he must surrender his trust at once; "and inasmuch as it is extremely difficult to get a person suitable to take charge of the property and give the bond required by law, and the probability of a frequent change in these uncertain times would make heavy expense on the corpus of the property, and feeling that she can through a competent agent manage it satisfactorily by having it invested in state bonds as soon as possible, she respectfully prays that the said guardianship be revoked, and that the property be turned over to her or her authorized agent." Attached to this petition was the written consent and recommendation of Griffin as guardian, and that of Mary L. Collins, the sister and nearest of kin to Harriet A. Lane. The ordinary ordered that the prayer of the petition be granted upon Griffin making a full settlement with the attorney in fact of Harriet A. Lane. On January 7, 1889, the ordinary passed an order reciting that the final return of James M. Griffin, guardian of Harriet A. Lane, had remained of file the time required by law, and directing that it be allowed and admitted to record. Thereupon Griffin filed a petition setting out that his guardianship had terminated, and that he had made a full settlement with his ward, and praying for a final order discharging himself and the securities on his bond; and it was accordingly "ordered by the court that James M. Griffin be * * * discharged from said guardianship, and that Joseph O. Boswell and Joe McWhorter, his securities, * * * be released from all further liabilities on said bond as such securities." The record contains certified copies of the various returns of Griffin as guardian, and it appears that on November 5, 1888, B. F. Collins, as agent for Harriet A. Lane, and Harriet A. Lane herself, signed the following receipt: "$6,445.88. Received of Jas. M. Griffin, my guardian, six thousand, four [hundred] and forty-five & ⁸⁸/₁₀₀ dollars, in full of all claims on him to August 5th, 1888. This is a settlement in full. November 5th, 1888." This paper was witnessed by John H. Bowles, a notary public.

Harriet A. Lane died in June, 1901, and Pope Collins, her nephew, was appointed administrator of her estate. The present suit was brought by him to the September term, 1902, of Greene superior court, against Griffin as principal, and Boswell and the executors of McWhorter as securities, on the bond heretofore mentioned. The petition alleged various acts of fraud and mismanagement on the part of Griffin as guardian, and claimed that the settlement between him and his ward by which she undertook to release him from all further liability, was void for want of capacity in her to make such a settlement. It alleged that in procuring this settlement Griffin grossly imposed upon his ward, who reposed the utmost confidence in him, and was, by reason of her bodily and mental affliction, unable to ascertain and discover the fraud that was being practiced upon her. The petitioner waived discovery, and prayed (1) that Griffin be required fully to exhibit his accounts as guardian, (2) that he fully exhibit the items of the pretended settlement, and (3) that the plaintiff have judgment on the bond in such sums as are shown to be due the estate of his decedent. The defendants filed separate answers, and demurred generally and specially. The petition was amended to meet the demurrers, and it was alleged, among other things, that the judgments of discharge granted the defendants by the ordinary were void for want of citation, service, or notice to any one preceding their rendition, and because Harriet A. Lane did not appear before the ordinary, the proceeding being entirely ex parte, and therefore null and void. Various items were set out, wherein it was claimed that Griffin, as guardian, had made erroneous and fraudulent returns, creating an indebtedness from him to his ward in sums stated. The points raised by the demurrers and the averments of the answers filed by the defendants will not be set out at this point, as they will clearly appear from the ensuing discussion of the legal questions involved in the decision of the case. The case was referred to an auditor, the substance of whose report is contained in the closing paragraph thereof, as follows: "Wherefore, in conclusion, I find the plaintiff has established by proof all the allegations in his declaration, the amendments thereto, and his replication to defendants' answers necessary to the recovery hereinbefore indicated; and that therefore he have judgment against all the defendants in the principal sum of $2,598.35, and $2,730.26, interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from the 6th day of August, 1888, to the 10th day of August, 1903, aggregating $5,328.61." Exceptions of law and fact were filed to this report by both the plaintiff and the defendants. The court passed upon all the exceptions, both of law and fact, and declined to submit the exceptions of fact to a jury. All the exceptions were overruled, and the findings of the auditor were made the judgment of the superior court. The defendants except to the overruling of their demurrers, the refusal of the court to submit the exceptions of fact to a jury, the overruling of their exceptions of law and fact to the auditor's report, and to the decree as rendered. The plaintiff filed a cross-bill of exceptions, assigning error upon the overruling of his exceptions of law, the refusal of the court to submit the exceptions of fact to a jury, the refusal of his motion to recommend the case to the auditor for alleged errors in calculation, and the judgment finally rendered. Owing to the great number of the grounds contained in the various demurrers and exceptions of law and fact, no attempt will be made to pass upon these points separately. What follows decides, in our opinion, every material question at issue.

1. There is no provision of law in this state for the appointment of a guardian for a person sui juris solely on the ground of blindness and limited education. Civ. Code 1895, § 2570, enumerates the classes of persons for whom guardians may be appointed by the ordinary, as follows: "Idiots, lunatics, and insane persons, and deaf and dumb persons when incapable of managing their estates, habitual drunkards, and persons imbecile from old age or other cause, and incapable of managing their estates." According to the petition of Griffin to have himself appointed the guardian of Harriet A. Lane, the latter was "of sound mind and of the age of thirty-nine years." The fact that she was blind, of limited education, and wholly lacking in business experience or ability, furnished no ground for the appointment of a guardian for her estate; and, had she chosen, she might at any time have disregarded the appointment made by the ordinary, and have assumed for herself the control and management of her property. But having gone into the court of ordinary and invoked its power of appointment of a guardian, having gained control of the property of this unfortunate woman through his successful efforts to have himself appointed guardian in a case where the law does not provide for the appointment of a guardian, can Griffin now be heard to deny the legality or validity of his appointment, or avoid the liability thereby voluntarily assumed? And can his bondsmen, who were charged with knowledge of the law, and who came forward to fulfill the conditions imposed by the ordinary as a prerequisite to his appointment as guardian, now escape liability on the bond by reason of the fact that the appointment was one not authorized by law? The first question is easily answered in the negative, for it is an elementary principle in the law of estoppel that a party will not be heard to deny the validity or legality of a judgment which he has invoked. A case directly in point is that of Hines v. Mullins, 25 Ga. 696, where it was held that a person who has been appointed guardian by a court of ordinary, and has taken possession of the property and otherwise acted as guardian, is concluded from saying, when sued as guardian, that the ward did not reside in the county of the court, and, therefore, that the court was without jurisdiction to make the appointment. See, also, Luther v. Clay, 100 Ga. 236, 28 S. E. 46, 39 L. R. A. 95; American Grocery Co. v. Kennedy, 100 Ga. 462, 28 S. E. 241; Vaughn v. Strickland, 108 Ga. 660 (2), 34 S. E. 192; Gentry v. Barron, 109 Ga. 172, 34 S. E. 349; Brown v. State, 109 Ga. 570, 34 S. E. 1031. As to the sureties, their liability is determined by Civ. Code 1895, § 2554, where it is provided that, even if the appointment of the guardian for any cause is declared void, they shall nevertheless be responsible on the bond for any property which may have been received by him by virtue of his appointment as guardian. It is idle, therefore, to further discuss the authority of the ordinary to appoint a guardian for Harriet A. Lane as affecting the liability of the obligors of the bond now sued on.

2, 3. The order of the ordinary granting the prayer of the petition of Harriet A. Lane that the "guardianship be revoked and the property turned over to her or her authorized agent," conditionally upon the guardian making a full settlement with her or her attorney in fact, can in no view be treated as a bar to an action against the guardian and the sureties on his bond. The only effect of this order was to terminate the guardianship and settle the relationship between guardian and ward for the future.

It settled nothing whatever as to the state of the guardian's accounts, and was no adjudication of the faithfulness of his stewardship. See, on this subject, King v. Hughes, 52 Ga. 600. But it is contended by counsel for Griffin and his sureties that the order of January 7, 1889, by which the former was "discharged from said guardianship" and the latter were "released from all further liability on said bond as such securities," operated as a complete bar to the present action. It appears, however, that the judgment relied on was preceded by no citation or notice of any character. This was not disputed. It was also alleged in the petition, as amended, that the order of dismission was procured by fraud, and that in obtaining it Griffin concealed from the ordinary the true state of his accounts. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 2567, which is applicable alike to guardians of minors and of lunatics (see section 2580), letters of dismission to a guardian may be granted only on his compliance with the conditions therein named, one of which is the publication of his application for discharge once a week for four weeks in the public gazette where the legal notices of the ordinary's office are usually published. It is clear, then, that the legal requisites for a valid discharge not having been complied with, the order of dismission cannot operate to bar the rights of the ward in the present suit.

4. One for whom a guardian has been appointed on the ground of lunacy is legally incapable of contracting, even though restored to sanity, until the guardianship has been dissolved. Civ. Code 1895, § 3652. If this is true as to contracts generally, a fortiori is it true as to contracts between the ward and his guardian, for the latter, by reason of his peculiar relationship to the ward, is in a position to more easily overreach and take advantage of him; and, until this relationship has been destroyed and the parties placed at arm's length, it would not be consonable to uphold a contract made between them. In the present case, the receipt given by Harriet A. Lane to Griffin was dated November 5, 1888, while the final discharge of the guardian was not granted until January 7, 1889. It was contended by counsel for the plaintiff in the court below that the receipt and settlement were void for lack of capacity in Harriet A. Lane to make them, and for fraud on the part of Griffin in concealing from her the real state of his accounts. Regardless of this, however, we are of the opinion that, even were she in all respects mentally sound, she could not, under the Code section quoted, have given a valid receipt to her guardian so long as he continued to be her guardian, and that for this reason the paper relied on was not of itself a bar to the action.

5. It is urged, however, that, after the lapse of 14 years after the receipt by the ward and the discharge by the ordinary, the plaintiff is barred by the statute of limitations. It is argued that under Civ. Code 1895, § 2565, after four years from the date of the settlement with the ward, the latter could not reopen the account. The section referred to is as follows: "No final settlement made between the guardian and ward shall bar the ward, at any time within four years thereafter, from calling the guardian to a settlement of his accounts, unless it is made to appear that the same was made after a full exhibit of all the guardian's accounts, and with a full knowledge by the ward of all his rights." In the case of Steadham v. Sims, 68 Ga. 741, this section was, in effect, construed as meaning that in the absence of a full exhibit of the guardian's accounts, and full knowledge by the ward of his rights, receipts in final settlement of the guardian's account would be prima facie binding upon the ward only after the lapse of four years. This case was decided by a full bench, and is binding upon us; and any different meaning to the section that was given in the decision when that case was again before this court (74 Ga. 187) is not binding, for the reason that upon this branch of the case Chief Justice Jackson did not concur with the majority of the court. The principle announced in the earlier case strikes us as entirely sound. Ordinarily, a receipt in full settlement of an account is binding, in the absence of fraud in its procurement, from its date. It could not have been intended that in the case of wards, around whom the law throws the most jealous protection, a limitation of four years should operate to bar the right to sue the guardian for money remaining due on a fraudulent settlement. The view urged by counsel for the plaintiff in the court below seems to us to set forth accurately the true law on this subject, viz., that section 2565 was designed to create a provision in favor of the ward, and not to bar his rights. It must be borne in mind that this is a suit on the guardian's bond—a sealed instrument—and that it is not barred until after the lapse of 20 years. It is the right of the defendants to plead in bar of the action the settlement between the guardian and his ward, and after four years from the date of that settlement it will be prima facie presumed that the ward is bound thereby—a presumption identical with that created in ordinary cases from the date of settlement. The ward, however, may then show that the settlement was procured by fraud, and thus rebut the presumption in its favor arising from the lapse of the statutory period. There is no merit in the contention that this action is barred by the statute of limitations.

6. It was urged on behalf of the securities that the receipt given by Harriet A. Lane "was an act of the creditor without their knowledge or consent, which increased their risk and released them from liability."

We confess our inability to follow this line of reasoning. Granting that the receipt was given without their knowledge or consent, we are at a loss to understand by what process of logic it can be construed as increasing their risk. If it was a valid, binding act, it entirely relieved them from any risk whatever; while if it was void from fraud, it had not the slightest effect upon their obligation.

7. For reasons which will now appear, we have not discussed the evidence appearing in the record as having been admitted on the hearing before the auditor. On one point counsel for both sides are agreed, viz., that the exceptions of fact to the report of the auditor should have been submitted to a jury; and both bills of exceptions assign error upon the refusal of the court to take this action. Civ. Code 1895, § 4596, provides that, in all law cases where an auditor is appointed, exceptions of fact to his report shall be passed upon by the jury as in other issues of fact; while section 4596 provides that, in equity cases, only such exceptions of fact shall be submitted to the jury as are approved by the trial judge. The question then arises, whether the present action was one at law or in equity. In determining this question, the nature of the relief sought, rather than the form of the allegations of the petition, is important. Steed v. Savage, 115 Ga. 97, 41 S. E. 272; Fowler v. Davis, 120 Ga. 443 (3), 47 S. E. 951. The waiver of discovery by the plaintiff would indicate his intention to invoke the aid of a court of equity; but this is a matter of form, rather than substance, at least so far as the determination of the nature of the suit is concerned. The prayer for an accounting is appropriate either to an action at law or in equity. McLaren v. Steapp, 1 Ga. 376; Epping v. Aiken, 71 Ga. 686. The prayer for judgment on the bond, however, fixes the suit as one at law, and for that reason we are clear that the exceptions of fact to the auditor's report should have been submitted to a jury.

In view of the fact that the proper determination of the exceptions of law filed by the plaintiff depends in great measure upon the determination of the issues of fact, which must be submitted to a jury when the case is tried again, it will not be necessary to pass upon the assignments of error in the cross-bill of exceptions upon the overruling of those exceptions of law. We will state in this connection, however, that nothing in this opinion is intended to preclude the plaintiff from again urging the same points when the case is tried again. We simply leave the matter open, to be passed upon by the trial judge in the light of the rulings announced in the foregoing.

Judgment on both bills of exceptions reversed. All the Justices concur.

ALLISON v. WALL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 1, 1905.)

OPINION EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY — CONVEYANCE OF GROWING TREES — CONSTRUCTION.

1. The admission of opinion evidence is limited to those instances where, because of the complexity of the elements involved, it is impossible for the witness to detail all of the circumstances which lead his mind to a particular conclusion; or where, because in a matter of science, special art, or particular occupation, persons inexperienced therein would be unable to reach a proper conclusion from a mere statement of the facts on which the expert based his opinion.

2. Where dates have not been specially noted, or time measured by a timepiece, it is competent for a witness to give his opinion as to how long a time elapsed between given facts.

3. It would likewise be proper to admit opinion evidence as to what would be a reasonable time for performing an unusual task or special work, where all the elements and data for making the calculation could not be detailed to the jury, or presented to them in such a way that they could themselves make the calculation.

4. But where, as in the present case, it was possible to state the data from which the jury could make a calculation, it was not admissible for an expert to testify as to what, in his opinion, would be a reasonable time for the performance of the act under consideration.

5. The evidence objected to was also properly excluded because it sought to give the opinion of the witness as to the very matter in issue, and involved the witness' opinion not only as to what could be done, but also what, as a matter of law, should have been done.

6. A conveyance, in 1891, "of all the pine trees growing and being upon 4,900 acres of land, for sawmill and turpentine purposes," included only those which were then suitable for such purposes, and not those which by growth subsequently came within the description of the original grant.

7. The charge objected to on the subject of returning and cutting was not error. Construed as a whole, and in connection with the succeeding sentence, the jury were instructed that the right could be exercised during the entire period covered by the "reasonable time," but that, after all trees suitable for sawmill purposes had been cut, the plaintiff could not return, and remove timber which was not originally suitable, but which had subsequently become so.

8. The general verdict for the defendant was equivalent to a finding that the plaintiff had not removed the timber within a reasonable time, and therefore that all the trees, whether growing or lying on the ground, reverted to the grantor.

9. The verdict was supported by the evidence. There was no error requiring the grant of a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Dodge County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by J. H. Allison against J. W. Wall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Allison brought an equitable petition to enjoin Wall from cutting timber and to recover damages for timber already cut. Both the plaintiff and the defendant claimed to be in possession under a conveyance from the heirs of McMillan. The plaintiff was a subtransferee and successor in title from his father, J. R. Allison, and the question involved depended mainly upon the construction to be given to the instrument of March 12, 1891, from Archibald McMillan to John R. Allison, whereby, in consideration of $3,000, McMillan granted, sold, and conveyed to John R. Allison "all the pine trees growing and being upon the certain tracts or parcels of land for sawmill and turpentine purposes." The land consisted of all of nine lots of 490 acres each, 100 acres of lot 161, and 390 acres of lot 162; "to have and to hold the afore-described pine trees for sawmill and turpentine purposes," with the rights and appurtenances thereto. "Also selling and conveying to said John R. Allison the right of way through and over said described lands for a tramroad, and the right to cut at any time any pine trees for cross-ties, bridge or trestle timbers to be used in building and maintaining said tramroad, and the right to cut at any time any pine trees for raft oars and binders; and the said Archibald McMillan * * * the said bargained pine trees for sawmill and turpentine purposes and right of way for a tramroad unto said John R. Allison, his heirs and assigns, forever, warrants and defends against the claims of all persons by virtue of these presents." On April 16, 1891, Allison, in consideration of $5,969, sold to Buckley, his successors in trust, and assigns all the pine trees growing and being on the land above described for sawmill purposes. Buckley conveyed his interest to Suydam, Suydam to Gray & Bros. and Gray & Gatchell. They conveyed to the Gray Lumber Company. Subsequently the Gray Lumber Company conveyed to J. H. Allison, the plaintiff, by deeds dated April 23, 1901, and June 12, 1901. Archibald McMillan died on June 22, 1901. Soon thereafter his heirs conveyed to Dickson & Dorminey certain of the timber involved for sawmill and turpentine purposes, the same to be cut at pleasure within the period of 10 years. The defendant, Wall, is in possession by virtue of license from Dickson & Dorminey. After the property came into the possession of the Gray Lumber Company, it permitted others to cut certain timber. Their operations ceased, and thereupon the Gray Lumber Company again entered and began cutting some of the timber, but ceased operations. Under an arrangement with McMillan, J. R. Allison had been working the timber, and subsequently entered into the contract of 1891. Allison testified that he was in the turpentine business in Irwin county. This timber was used for turpentine purposes by Allison & Gasque. It ceased about three years before the trial. The plaintiff testified "that, while he did not know how much timber J. R. Allison had in connection with a certain kind of business, it amounted to a large body, and that he operated his still there continuously; does not know what time he cut and used this particular timber." He had two stills. Ten lots of land timbered like these lots would have been a pretty fair location for a small mill.

It would have been about two years' run for a small mill. There was evidence that timber was boxed during three years for turpentine purposes, and that thereafter the trees were proper to be used for sawmill purposes. There is no evidence as to the accessibility, situation, or size of J. R. Allison's turpentine tract or stills, nor how large a body of land, if any, he controlled beyond that mentioned in McMillan's lease. There was some evidence that McLeod & Co. and Linder, by permission of Gray & Co., cut trees off the property in dispute, paying an agreed price as "stumpage," and that they did not cut all of the trees suitable for sawmill purposes. There was evidence that the Gray Lumber Company owned large tracts of timber, and it was claimed that they did not abandon the timber on the McMillan tract, but expected to cut it after sawing up the lumber on another tract across the Satilla river, on which their leases were about to expire. There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the trees left by McLeod & Co. were suitable for sawmill purposes under the conditions existing when the contract was made in 1891, it being claimed by the defendant that the timber was not suitable for such purposes, and that what was left was actually abandoned, and subsequently became available and profitable. There was evidence as to the entry on the land by Wall in 1901, and the number of cross-ties which he had cut from standing timber, and evidence that he had cut and removed logs lying on the ground at the time when he entered. Several witnesses testified that for the successful operation of a turpentine distillery it would be necessary to acquire a title to a large tract. They varied in their estimates as to what would be necessary for this purpose, and as to the amount necessary to operate a sawmill.

The plaintiff propounded to several witnesses who were experienced in the turpentine and sawmill business the following interrogatory: "What, in your opinion, would be a reasonable time for a sawmill owner to cut and remove the timber from land in the lease to which no time is limited within which to cut and remove the timber? State the reasons for such an opinion as to time for such removal." The witnesses varied as to what would be a reasonable time; some saying 12 and some 10 years. In answer to a similar question, other witnesses stated that 10 or 12, others 6 or 7, years would be a reasonable time within which to use timber for turpentine purposes, where there was no time limit in the lease; that it is very expensive to move a turpentine distillery, moving the laborers, and building suitable houses to be occupied by them; that 3 or 4 years is occupied in the actual use of the timber, and it is impracticable to break up and move a turpentine distillery oftener than 10 or 12 years, for the reasons stated. On objection by the defendant, these questions and answers were excluded, and the court, in its charge, also instructed the jury that they were not to consider the opinion of any witness which may have been given in the testimony. To these rulings the plaintiff excepted.

The plaintiff also excepted to the following instructions to the jury: "(a) If you find any of the trees were cut by the defendant, and that they were pine trees, and that they were growing and being upon these tracts of land, then that must have been their condition at the time of the execution of that lease. If they were not trees at that time, and growing and being upon this land, of course they would not pass by the terms of this lease. (b) I charge you to ascertain what mill timber is; and I charge you that under this lease the parties would have no right to exercise that right but once. One of the contentions of the defendant is that the parties went upon this land, and cut off all of the mill timber, and that afterwards there was an effort to go back on it after having been there one time. The contention of the plaintiff is, while they admit that they went there to cut off some of the timber, yet they did not cut off all of it; that they did not abandon it, but intended to go back. If you find as a matter of fact that they did not go there and cut off all the timber suitable for sawmill purposes, then they would not be permitted to go back, this right can only be exercised one time. (c) If you find the dead timber lying on the ground there was converted into cross-ties, that would not come within the description there of growing trees on the land, and the plaintiff would not be permitted to recover for that class of timber."

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiff in error.
E. D. Graham, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. 1-5. In judicial investigations it frequently becomes necessary for a jury to determine what is the reasonable value of services or property. In such cases expert and opinion evidence is admissible. There is an apparent, but no real, analogy between this class of testimony and proof of reasonable time by like evidence in the present case. The distinction illustrates the reason underlying the rule. So far as reasonable value is concerned, opinion evidence is the only form of proof which can be made. At last, value is a matter of opinion. So many factors enter into its determination that it would be impossible for any witness to state them all to the jury; or, if he could, it would be impossible for them, from such evidence alone, to make the calculation. Even as to staple articles the selling price varies from day to day. It is affected by the activity or depression of business, the existence or want of competition, and the infinite and complex causes operating under the law of supply and demand. For these reasons, and because no one can tell exactly why anything will sell for a given amount, opinion evidence is admissible. In the nature of things, it is the only class of evidence that can be given; and Civ. Code 1895, § 5286, itself expressly recognizes it as proper to be received. The same principle would apply where no record of dates had been kept, or no timepiece had been used in measuring time. It would be impossible for the witness to state exactly how he judged of its lapse or duration. He could therefore give his opinion as to how long he thought it was between two acts. So, too, there might be cases in which it would be proper for opinion evidence to be introduced as to what would be a reasonable time for the performance of a given act. But in such instances its admissibility would grow out of the peculiar facts, and result from the inability of the witness to give the data or to detail the circumstances on which he based his conclusion, and also from the impossibility of persons unfamiliar with the special business of making the calculation. But in the present case there was no difficulty in the jury making the proper calculation as well as an expert, if they were furnished with the proper data. After considering all these circumstances, and the condition of the parties, and determining when the work of boxing the trees should begin, they could then easily determine how long it would take to complete that part of the enterprise. In like manner it would be for them to determine from all the circumstances what was in contemplation of the parties, or what, under all the facts, would be a reasonable time within which to begin. This having been settled, given the quantity and character of the timber, the usual number of hands, and the capacity of the mill, it would be a mere matter of arithmetic to determine how long would be required to cut the timber. To permit a witness to determine all these matters by answering what, in his opinion, was a reasonable time, would have been to allow him to usurp the functions of the jury, and to decide the very point in issue. What was a reasonable time must be determined by the facts as they existed in 1891. The condition of the parties and all of the circumstances were for consideration by the jury under instructions from the court. But it was not competent for a witness to give his opinion as to what was a reasonable time within which the trees should have been boxed and the timber cut. Such testimony involved not only calculations as to what could be done, but also, as a matter of law, as to what should be done. Mayor of Milledgeville v. Wood, 114 Ga. 370, 40 S. E. 239.

6. Construing the contract, then, as it must be, according to its legal effect on the day it was executed, and not according to subsequent changes, the court properly instructed the jury that it included only timber which in 1891 was suitable for turpentine and sawmill purposes. The right to such trees, and to such trees only, passed at that date as definitely as if each had been at that time marked and designated by the parties. If by growth others thereafter became suitable for turpentine or sawmill purposes, they did not thereby become subject to a contract which did not originally include them within its terms. Martin v. Peddy, 120 Ga. 1079, 48 S. E. 420 (4); Warren v. Short, 119 N. C. 39 (3), 25 S. E. 704.

7. When the jury, under the evidence and the charge of the court, determined what would be a reasonable time for boxing and cutting the trees, they, in legal effect, could insert that date in the contract, and thereupon it would result that J. R. Allison or his assigns would have until the last day within which to exercise the rights granted. He or they could cut all the timber the first year, or all of it the last year. He or they, during this period, could cut a part of the trees on all or a portion of the tract. During the period found by the jury to be a reasonable time, he or they could return, and box or cut the balance. But neither he nor they could at the beginning of this period cut all of the timber suitable for sawmill purposes, and then return and cut such as by growth had become suitable for sawmill timber. Such, fairly construed, was the effect of the charge assigned as error. But if there was any doubt thereon it was removed by a consideration of the succeeding sentence, wherein the court instructed the jury that "they would have had the right to have gone back, provided it was in the reasonable time that was contemplated by the agreement of parties at the execution of the lease."

8, 9. There was some evidence that the defendant cut dead timber which was lying on the ground, and complaint is made of the charge of the court that such timber did not pass by the conveyance of 1891. But the verdict in favor of the defendant shows that the jury found as a fact that a reasonable time had expired, and that the plaintiff no longer had any right to even the growing timber. If this was true, the plaintiff, of course, had no right to the dead timber, all having reverted to the grantor. So that, if the charge was incorrect, it was harmless. McRae v. Stillwell, 36 S. E. 938, 111 Ga. 65 (1a), 55 L. R. A. 513.

LUQUIRE v. LEE et al.

EJECTMENT—PETITION — AMENDMENT—DEED—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CONVEYED—TRUSTEE—POWER OF SALE—MERGER—ADVERSE POSSESSION—REMAINDERMEN—FOLLOWING TRUST FUNDS.

1. Though the premises were not described in the petition with sufficient fullness, yet the description was not so indefinite but that an amendment more particularly describing the premises was allowable.

2. A grantor in 1852 conveyed land by deed to a named trustee, his heirs and assigns. The habendum clause was: "To have and to hold the said tract or parcel of land to the said [trustee], his heirs and assigns forever, upon the special confidence and trust, nevertheless, for the sole and separate use of Nancy R. Lee and her children during the natural life of or widowhood of said Nancy R. Lee; and at her death or marriage this trust to cease and the property to be equally divided between the children of said Nancy R. Lee living at her death, share and share alike; with full power to said [trustee], with the consent of said Nancy and her husband, to sell said property and invest the proceeds in other property. To have and to hold the said tract or parcel of land with all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances thereto appertaining, to the only proper use, benefit and behoof of him, the said [trustee], upon the trust aforesaid and for the use aforesaid, [his] heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, in fee simple." Mrs. Lee died in 1900, without remarriage. Held: (1) The estate created was a joint life estate in Nancy R. Lee and her children during the life of Mrs. Lee, with a fee-simple estate in remainder to the children of Nancy R. Lee who survived her; (2) that the trustee took the legal title to the life estate only; and (3) that the power of sale conferred on the trustee was a special personal trust, and one which did not pass to a successor.

3. The power of sale referred to in the preceding headnote expired with the death of the trustee. The judge of the superior court, upon petition of one of the beneficiaries, at chambers, could appoint a successor to the deceased trustee, but was without jurisdiction over the legal estate in remainder so as to confer upon the new trustee the power of sale vested by the deed in the deceased trustee.

4. Coincidence of two independent estates presently held by one and the same person or class of persons is a necessary prerequisite to merger. There can be no merger of estates until such identity of person and of present interest in point of fact exists.

5. As the trustee did not represent the estate in remainder, and there was no merger of estates, the possession of the defendant did not become adverse to the remaindermen until the death of the life tenant.

6. The estate in remainder by the terms of the deed was limited to the surviving children of Mrs. Lee. Heirs of a child who died before Mrs. Lee died took no interest in remainder under the deed.

7. The evidence was insufficient to support the equitable plea that the proceeds of the land improperly sold by the substituted trustee was invested in other land, which was conveyed to him as trustee for his wife and children, and which had been partitioned between the plaintiffs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by Thomas Lee and Sarah Sheffield against H. F. Luquire. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lane & Park, for plaintiff in error. M. G. Bayne, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. This was an action of ejectment, brought against H. F. Luquire by Thomas Lee and Sarah Sheffield, who claimed title to the premises in dispute as remaindermen under a deed dated January 10, 1852, from Anna Jepson to Thomas P. Stubbs, trustee. This deed purported to convey to "Thomas P. Stubbs, his heirs and assigns," a certain described parcel of land in Bibb county, containing four acres. The habendum clause was: "To have and to hold the said tract or parcel of land to the said Thomas P. Stubbs, his heirs and assigns forever, upon the special confidence and trust, nevertheless, for the sole and separate use of Nancy R. Lee and her children during the natural life of or widowhood of said Nancy R. Lee; and at her death or marriage, this trust to cease and the property to be equally divided between the children of said Nancy R. Lee living at her death, share and share alike; with full power to said Thomas P. Stubbs, with the consent of said Nancy and her husband, to sell said property and invest the proceeds in other property. To have and to hold the said tract or parcel of land with all and singular the rights, members and appurtenances thereto appertaining, to the only proper use, benefit and behoof of him, the said Thomas P. Stubbs, upon the trust aforesaid and for the use aforesaid, [his] heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, in fee simple." The deed also contained a general warranty of title "unto the said Thomas P. Stubbs, upon the use aforesaid, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns." Nancy R. Lee died in November, 1900. The plaintiffs' action was commenced in March, 1903.

To this action the defendant interposed the following defenses: (1) Defendant, and those under whom he claims, have been in open, notorious, uninterrupted, exclusive, and adverse possession of the premises sought to be recovered for a period of 40 years, holding the same under deeds duly executed and recorded, and the defendant therefore has title by prescription. (2) On January 9, 1861, by an order passed by the judge of the superior court of the Macon circuit, William W. Lee, the husband of Nancy R. Lee, was, upon her petition, appointed trustee instead of Stubbs, the nominated trustee, who had previously died; said order of court conferring upon the substituted trustee "like powers, duties, and liabilities as were originally conferred on the said Thomas P. Stubbs in relation to the property mentioned in the deed of trust," which gave to him a power of sale for the purpose of reinvestment, with the consent of Nancy R. Lee and her husband. On April 3, 1863, William W. Lee, as trustee for his wife and children, and in execution of this power of sale, sold and conveyed the premises, with the written consent of Nancy R. Lee, to William T. Nelson, under whom the defendant claims as grantee. (3) The proceeds of this sale, amounting to $2,500, were invested by William W. Lee, as trustee, in another tract of land in Bibb county, purchased from and conveyed by one Durin Murray on July 23, 1863, the conveyance being made to William W. Lee as trustee for his wife and her children. The sale of the trust property and the investment of the proceeds in the tract of land last referred to "was with the full knowledge of the said Nancy R. Lee and her children," who immediately entered into possession of the land, and held, owned, and enjoyed the same, receiving the full benefit thereof as tenants in common until January 27, 1883, when, by the judgment of Bibb superior court upon the petition of Thomas Lee, one of the plaintiffs in this suit, said tract of land was partitioned, and each received his or her respective share in severalty. The plaintiffs, having thus received and enjoyed the full value and benefit of the property sold by their trustee, William W. Lee, and having in no way accounted or offered to account for the same, are now estopped from claiming the property so sold.

A trial of the case was had on the merits. After the plaintiffs announced closed, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit. The plaintiffs thereupon amended their petition by more fully describing the premises sued for, and the court overruled the motion to nonsuit. Evidence in behalf of the defendant was then submitted, and the plaintiffs introduced testimony in rebuttal. After the conclusion of both sides had been announced, the court was asked by counsel for the plaintiffs to direct a verdict in their favor, which the court, after hearing argument, accordingly did. Exception is taken by the defendant below both to the overruling of his motion to nonsuit, to the allowance of the amendment to plaintiffs' petition, and to the judgment of the court directing a verdict against him. The questions thus presented for our determination will be briefly stated and disposed of in the discussion of the case which follows.

1. As originally framed, the plaintiffs' petition described the premises sought to be recovered as a "tract or parcel of land lying and being in the county of Bibb, and in the Godfrey district, in the suburbs of the city of Macon, and more particularly described as follows: Fronting on the New Houston Road on southwest; on north by lands claimed by Jane Jones, being $\frac{1}{4}$ acre, more or less." By way of amendment the plaintiffs alleged that this one-fourth acre was "in the shape of a triangle fronting on New Houston Road on the southwest, and on the opposite side by street name of which is unknown to plaintiffs; that said triangle is bounded on the north by lot now claimed by one Berry Hall, on which he now resides, and being a part of original lot No. 46, described in the deed from Anna Jepson to Thos. P. Stubbs, trustee, recorded in Book L, page 253, clerk's office, Bibb superior court." The defendant objected to the allowance of the amendment on the ground that "the original petition did not contain enough to amend by, and that the amendment offered set up a new and distinct cause of action, it appearing from the amendment that different property from that attempted to be described in the original petition was sought to be recovered." In support of this position counsel for the plaintiff in error cites the cases of Turner v. Rives, 75 Ga. 606, and Harwell v. Foster, 97 Ga. 265, 22 S. E. 994, in which this court pointed out the necessity of describing premises sought to be recovered with sufficient fullness and particularity to authorize a decree being based upon the pleadings. In both of these cases, however, the right of a plaintiff to amend by perfecting an indefinite description of the property sued for was distinctly recognized. In the present case there was certainly enough in the petition to amend by, and the amendment did not, as claimed, substitute for the imperfect description of the property for which the action was originally brought a description of other and different property.

2. The estate created by the deed from Jepson to Stubbs, trustee, was a joint life estate in Mrs. Lee and her children during the life of Mrs. Lee, with a fee-simple estate in remainder to the children of Mrs. Lee who survived her. Frankie v. Berkner, 67 Ga. 264; East Rome Town Co. v. Cothran, 81 Ga. 359, 8 S. E. 737. There are many cases holding that a conveyance to one in trust for another for life, and on the death of the life tenant to her children in remainder, clothes the trustee with the legal title to the life estate, but not to the estate in remainder. Fleming v. Hughes, 99 Ga. 444, 27 S. E. 791; Rogers v. Pace, 75 Ga. 436; Carswell v. Lovett, 80 Ga. 36, 4 S. E. 866; Bull v. Walker, 71 Ga. 195; Allen v. Hughes, 106 Ga. 775, 32 S. E. 927; Brantley v. Porter, 111 Ga. 886, 36 S. E. 970; Overstreet v. Sullivan, 113 Ga. 891, 39 S. E. 431; Tillman v. Banks, 116 Ga. 250, 42 S. E. 517. The vesting of a power in the trustee to dispose of both the equitable estate held by him in trust and the legal estate in remainder does not confer on the trustee the title to the estate in remainder. It is competent for a grantor to confer upon a trustee of an equitable estate a power of sale over the entire fee, though the trustee may have no interest whatever in the legal estate in remainder. Civ. Code 1895, § 3171; Headen v. Quillian, 92 Ga. 220, 18 S. E. 543; Heath v. Miller, 117 Ga. 854, 44 S. E. 13; Tillman v. Banks, supra. The remainder estate is none the less a legal estate while the trust as to the life estate is executory, but with the limitation that the trustee may, in the exercise of the power of sale, defeat it in the particular property. The property purchased with the proceeds of the sale becomes impressed not only with the trust declared in the original deed, but the remainder estate in the substituted property does not lose its character as a legal estate. The power of sale over the entire fee, therefore, does not convert the legal estate in remainder into an equitable estate, nor clothe the trustee with title thereto. The power of sale may be personal to the trustee or it may attach to the office of trustee. If the power is personal to the trustee, it can be exercised by him only, but if the power is incident to the office of trustee it may be executed by a successor. Generally, a "power of sale, whether a common-law or equitable power, or taking effect under the statute of uses, can be exercised only by the persons to whom it is expressly given." 2 Perry on Trusts, § 499. In determining the limitation of the power relatively to its exercise by the nominated trustee or a successor, the whole deed should be looked to, in order to ascertain the purpose of the grantor. If the deed had conferred upon the trustee and his successors the right to execute the power, clearly the power would have pertained to the office of trustee, and could have been exercised by the trustee for the time being. An imperative power to sell, such as a direction to sell property in any event, would impose a duty to sell on any one filling the office of trustee, and could be exercised by a substituted trustee. A discretionary power to sell can be exercised only by the trustee upon whom it is conferred. "Wherever an authority is given to trustees which is either not compulsory upon them to exercise at all, or, if compulsory, the time or manner or extent of its execution is left to be determined by the trustees; that is obviously a discretionary power, though the extent and nature of the discretion may vary in each case." Hill on Trustees, 485. In the deed under consideration the trustee could not sell without the consent of Nancy R. Lee and her husband; neither could Nancy R. Lee and her husband sell without Stubbs, the trustee, joining in the conveyance. The sale and reinvestment contemplated the affirmative assent of the trustee to become effectual. The grantor, if she wished to deprive the trustee of any discretion as to the sale or reinvestment, could very easily have made it his duty to sell and reinvest at the will of Mr. and Mrs. Lee, thus constituting the trustee the mere conduit of passing the legal title. The grantor's intention cannot be supplied by suggestions or matters extrinsic her written declarations; and by her solemn deed she invested the trustee with full power to sell with the consent of Mr. and Mrs. Lee—a power which the trustee necessarily had a discretion in executing. The conclusion is irresistible that the power in the deed was not incident to the office of trustee, but personal to the trustee. Even though the writer had been in doubt as to the correctness of his conclusion, this court, in Simmons v. McKinloch, 98 Ga. 738, 26 S. E. 88, decided: "Where a deed conveyed land to a named person in trust for a married woman for life, and at her death to her children then living 'with power in said trustee, by and with the written consent of the [life tenant], to sell said property and reinvest the same in other property, subject to the same limitations and restrictions,' the power thus created conferred upon the trustee a special personal trust, and was therefore one which did not pass to a successor." In my search of the authorities where sales by a substituted trustee were upheld the deed or will either constituted the power of sale an incident to the office of trustee, or made provision for the exercise of the power of sale by a successor of the original trustee. Freeman v. Prendergast, 94 Ga. 369, 21 S. E. 837; Henderson v. Williams, 97 Ga. 709, 25 S. E. 395; Baillie v. Carolina Ass'n, 100 Ga. 20, 28 S. E. 274; Heath v. Miller, 117 Ga. 854, 44 S. E. 13. In Freeman v. Prendergast the power of sale was construed to belong to the office of trustee, and not to be personal to the trustee. This construction was based on the following considerations: The power of sale was not unilateral, but matter of express covenant. The power was not personal because it extended to both trustees, "or to the survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor." The power was coupled with an interest, the trustee being clothed with the legal title and estate in the trust property, which was the entire fee; and the power of sale was imperative as to the payment of certain specified debts, and was to be executed irrespective of whether the life tenant were living or dead. None of the characteristics pointed out by the learned judge in the opinion in that case as a reason for holding the power of sale appurtenant to the office of trustees are included in the deed in the case at bar. In the deed under discussion the power was unilateral, and was not a matter of express covenant between the parties. The power was personal, as already pointed out in this opinion, and the exercise of the power was limited to Stubbs, without the addition of the words "executors or administrators," or any words of similar character or import. The power of sale was not coupled with an interest extending to the whole estate, because by the express terms of the deed the trust did not extend to the remainder estate, the language of the deed being, "at her [Mrs. Lee's] death or marriage, this trust to cease, and the property to be equally divided between said children of said Nancy R. Lee living at her death, share and share alike." The power of sale did not put an imperative duty on the trustee to sell, as was the case in the instrument involved in Freeman v. Prendergast. That case is therefore clearly distinguishable from the case now under consideration. In the other cases cited the instruments giving the power authorized in express terms the exercise of the power of sale by a "successor" of the nominated trustees.

3. If the power of sale was personal to Stubbs, the nominated trustee, then it expired with his death. What effect, therefore, should be given the order of the judge of the superior court appointing a new trustee, and investing him with the powers conferred on the original trustee by the deed? In the first place, the application for the order was made by Mrs. Lee. The petition recited that it was her petition, and it was signed by her.

The only reference to her children was by way of recital that they took an interest with her under the deed from Jepson to Stubbs, trustee. The prayer was for the appointment of a trustee to fill the duties of the trust to the same extent as the original trustee might or could do. The order based on this petition did not allude to the children by name or as a class, but merely named a trustee, and gave him the same powers possessed by the trustee in whose stead he was appointed. The chancellor could, at chambers, upon the petition of the beneficiaries who had arrived at discretion, appoint a trustee. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3164, 3165. Before the Code it was not necessary to serve the minors to bind their equitable interests, and it was discretionary with the chancellor to require them to be made formal parties. Freeman v. Prendergast, supra. So far as the equitable interest of Mrs. Lee extended, the trustee appointed under this order of court represented that interest. And perhaps the interest of the minor children to share with their mother the rents and profits of the land during her life might also be included in the equitable estate represented by the substituted trustee. The chancellor had plenary power in vacation over the appointment of the trustee, and could authorize the sale of the equitable estate which the trustee represented. As we have pointed out, the power of sale conferred on Stubbs, the nominated trustee, was a personal one, and expired at his death. Therefore the trustee appointed in his stead would derive his power of sale not from the deed, but from the order of court. The order of court was tantamount to a decree of sale under the same limitations as contained in the deed. It affected to dispose of both the equitable estate of the life tenants and the legal estate in remainder. The chancellor had no power, at chambers, to order a sale of the legal estate of the remaindermen for the purpose of reinvestment. Pughesley v. Pughesley, 75 Ga. 95; Rogers v. Pace, Id. 436; Taylor v. Kemp, 86 Ga. 185, 12 S. E. 296; McDonald v. McCall, 91 Ga. 305, 18 S. E. 157; Fleming v. Hughes, 99 Ga. 450, 27 S. E. 791; Richards v. Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 614, 33 S. E. 193, 45 L. R. A. 712. In the last-cited case, while it was held that in term time the superior court could authorize a trustee to sell for reinvestment both the equitable and legal estates, where all parties at interest were represented, yet it was recognized that this power did not exist in vacation. The fact that the chancellor had the power to order the sale of the trust property would not give him power to order the sale of the legal estate, although the remaindermen had a joint interest with their mother in the estate created for her life. The order of the chancellor was therefore limited to the equitable estate, and the substituted trustee did not represent the legal estate, nor had he any power under that order or otherwise to sell the estate in remainder. The purchaser from him acquired no interest in the remainder estate, but only title to the equitable estate represented by the trustee.

4. Another question presented for determination is whether, between the date of the trust deed and the death of Mrs. Lee, there was any merger of the interest of her children in the life estate into the remainder interest which they took under that deed. A merger of estates occurs when "two estates in the same property unite in the same person in his individual capacity, the less estate [being] merged in the greater." Civ. Code 1895, § 3106. Or where, as was held in the case of Lowe v. Webb, 85 Ga. 731, 11 S. E. 845, two or more persons, having, as tenants in common, a life estate in realty, acquire in common the absolute fee thereto. See, also, Stringfellow v. Stringfellow, 112 Ga. 494, 497, 37 S. E. 767; Bardwell v. Edwards, 117 Ga. 825, 45 S. E. 40. It is doubtless true that, where the entire interest in a life estate is held by a class of persons under a deed or will which does not provide for survivorship, and subsequently the estate in remainder is vested in all of the members of this class as tenants in common, by inheritance or otherwise, the life estate becomes merged, by operation of law, into the greater estate which they acquire. But there was not, for at least three good reasons, any merger of the two estates created by the trust deed now under consideration: (1) The children of Mrs. Lee did not take the entire interest in the life estate thereby created, but held it, together with her, as long as she continued in its enjoyment, and, after she parted with her interest therein by deed, owned it in common with her grantee. Accordingly, because of the ownership of a part of the life estate by a third person, the life estate could not, at any time prior to Mrs. Lee's death, merge into the estate in remainder created by the trust deed in favor of her children. In other words, the class of persons entitled to enjoy the life estate was not, in personnel, the same as the class of persons in which the estate in remainder vested. No merger could take place without, on the one hand, ignoring and depriving Mrs. Lee (or her grantee) of the interest in the life estate conferred upon her, or, on the other hand, sacrificing the interest of her children in the life estate by limiting their enjoyment of the property to their estate in remainder and postponing such enjoyment till her death. (2) To declare such a merger would defeat the object and purpose of the donor; and it is well settled that this may not be done where the donor has, by one and the same instrument, conferred upon different persons, respectively, separate and exclusive interests or estates in the property conveyed. See 1 Wash. Real Prop. (6th Ed.) § 368. Indeed, the doctrine of merger of estates is designed, primarily, for the benefit of one who acquires an interest in property greater than that he possessed in the first instance, and will not be held to apply, against his will, to his disadvantage. Knowles v. Lawton, 18 Ga. 476, 63 Am. Dec. 290; Cole v. Grigsby (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 690, and authorities cited. (3) The children having an interest in the life estate were not, necessarily, those who might eventually enjoy the estate in remainder. By the very terms of the trust deed, none of the children of Mrs. Lee could take as remaindermen in the event she survived all of them and died childless. Those who survived her, and those only, were to enjoy the estate in remainder. Who they might be could not, with any degree of certainty, be ascertained before the termination of the life estate; and so long as the uncertainty existed there could be no merger of the life estate into the estate in remainder. The doctrine of merger of estates rests upon actualities, not upon mere possibilities. Coincidence of two independent estates presently held by one and the same person or class of persons is a necessary prerequisite to merger. No merger can take place until such identity of person and of present interest in point of fact exists. For instances in point, where it has been held that no merger took place despite the fact that one and the same person had different interests in property of which he was only part owner, see Asch v. Asch, 18 Abb. N. C. 82; Bomar v. Mullins, 4 Rich. Eq. 80; Johnson v. Johnson, 7 Allen, 196, 83 Am. Dec. 676; Cole v. Grigsby, supra.

5. If the trustee did not represent the remaindermen, or if there was no merger of estates, then the defendant did not acquire a prescriptive title as against the remaindermen. The suit was filed very soon after the death of the life tenant. The right of the remaindermen to sue arose upon the death of their mother. The possession of the defendant was not adverse to them until they had their cause of action.

6. Only the children of Nancy R. Lee who were in life at her death took the remainder estate. It appears that at the date of the deed Mrs. Lee had three children, and that subsequently one of these died before Mrs. Lee died, leaving heirs. The plaintiffs were the surviving children. The contention of the plaintiff in error is that, even if the plaintiffs below were entitled to recover, they could recover only a two-thirds interest, whereas the verdict was for the entire land. The heirs of the child who died prior to the death of Mrs. Lee had no interest in the remainder estate. The unambiguous terms of the trust deed expressly limited the enjoyment of the estate in remainder to surviving children.

7. The evidence upon which the defendant relied as showing that the proceeds of the sale of the trust property went into the lands conveyed by Durin Murray to William W. Lee, as trustee for his wife and children, was not sufficient to support anything more than a bare conjecture that this was in point of fact true. The plaintiffs introduced testimony tending to show that the proceeds realized from that sale were not so invested, but that payment for the trust property was made by the purchaser in Confederate currency, which went into the hands of Mrs. Lee, and was kept by her until, shortly after the sale, the house in which she lived was destroyed by fire, together with about $2,000, some $300 of this amount being in coin and the rest in currency. It further appeared that she and her husband had loaned to a neighbor $750 in Confederate currency some six or eight months before the close of the war, and that this debt had never been paid. The plaintiffs offered themselves as witnesses, and each denied knowing anything about the investment of the trust funds in the land purchased from Murray. One of the defendant's witnesses was permitted to swear (apparently without objection) that some two or three years before William W. Lee died (which was somewhere along about the year 1886) witness had a conversation with him regarding his purchase of the Murray place, and he had said he "had sold the land up this way, and bought the place he lived on; he sold this five acres in South Macon, and purchased that place he lived on"; and, during the course of the same conversation had further said that "Tom [one of the plaintiffs] had made some threats to get up a lawsuit about it, and he did not think it was right; that he already had the worth of it." It is evident from other facts appearing in the record that the land "in South Macon" to which William W. Lee referred in this conversation was the tract which he had sold as trustee under the order of court hereinbefore mentioned. But the testimony of the witness with regard to this conversation was hearsay, pure and simple, and in no way strengthened the defendant's case. "Since ordinary hearsay testimony is not only inadmissible, but wholly without probative value, its introduction without objection does not give it any weight or force whatever in establishing a fact." Eastlick v. Ry. Co., 116 Ga. 48, 42 S. E. 499. The question to be determined is whether, ignoring this mere hearsay, there was sufficient competent evidence to warrant a jury in finding in favor of the defendant. Suttles v. Sewell, 117 Ga. 214, 216, 43 S. E. 486. We think there was not. Certainly the equitable defense set up by the defendant was meritorious, if founded on fact. Taylor v. James, 100 Ga. 328, 335, 34 S. E. 674, and cases cited. The burden of establishing this defense rested upon him. He signally failed to show that either of the plaintiffs had, expressly or impliedly, ratified the trustee's sale and reinvestment, or that for any reason either of them was estopped from asserting title to the premises in controversy. The defendant also failed to successfully trace the trust funds into the Murray place.

Moreover, even were the evidence such as to warrant a jury in finding that the proceeds of the trust property were invested by the trustee in that tract of land, they were not furnished by the defendant with sufficient data to enable them to find what amount in money he was entitled to receive from the plaintiffs, or either of them, as a condition precedent to their obtaining a decree for the land which he had purchased in good faith. It was necessary that the defendant should furnish this data, for the plaintiffs could be charged with such benefits only as they derived out of the purchase of the Murray place. Bazemore v. Davis, 55 Ga. 505 (11). The tract of land conveyed by the Jepson trust deed and sold by Lee, as trustee, to William T. Nelson, the defendant's predecessor in title, contained five acres, and of this tract the defendant had purchased but a quarter of an acre, the balance of the tract being claimed by other persons not parties to the case. It was therefore incumbent on the defendant to furthermore show what pro rata share of such benefits chargeable to the plaintiffs he was entitled to call on them to account for before they could recover the quarter of an acre he had bought. Id. 506 (12). No attempt appears to have been made by the defendant to meet these requirements as to proof, and, so far as this branch of the case is concerned, the court was clearly right in declining to submit the case to a jury.

The other issues raised on the trial involved only questions of law, so a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs was inevitable in the view we take of the law governing the case.

BROWN STORE CO. v. CHATTAHOOCHEE LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 28, 1905.)

FIRE—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—PLEADING—DEFENSES—NONSUIT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The petition set forth a cause of action, and the court did not err in overruling the demurrers.

2. Where a suit is brought for damages for the burning of plaintiff's houses and goods, alleged to have resulted from fire communicated from a slab pit of the defendant, so built and operated as to be a nuisance and a menace to the neighborhood—the petition also alleging negligence in conducting such slab pit—there was no error in striking a plea which set up that plaintiff held his property under a conveyance from the defendant's predecessor in title, prior to which conveyance a similar slab pit at nearly the same place had been conducted by defendant's predecessor in title; that, by so purchasing the land, plaintiff had assumed the risk; and that subsequently the old slab pit was destroyed by fire, the premises afterward purchased by defendant, and the present slab pit built.

3. In a suit for damages for the destruction of houses and of the goods therein, it was not error to refuse to grant a nonsuit upon the ground that the title to the realty appeared not to be in the plaintiff. Plaintiff was entitled to recover for the destruction of his goods and for the damage to his possession, even though he may have no interest in any injury to the freehold.

4. In the trial of a civil case, it is error to charge the jury that it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to make out his case to a moral and reasonable certainty.

5. Damages which are the natural, reasonable, and proximate result of a wrongful act are not too remote to be recovered. It is therefore error to charge that the plaintiff must show that his damage was the usual, direct, and necessary consequence of the wrongful act.

6. In a case in which the defendant is bound to use ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, it is error, since the adoption of the Code, to charge that the plaintiff cannot recover unless it appear that the defendant was grossly negligent. Macon & Western R. Co. v. McConnell, 31 Ga. 133, 76 Am. Dec. 685, explained.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; B. B. Bower, Judge.

Action by the Brown Store Company against the Chattahoochee Lumber Company. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross-bill, affirmed.

A. G. Powell, for plaintiff. Donalson & Donalson and R. W. Fleming, for defendant.

SIMMONS, C. J. The first three headnotes require no elaboration. As to the fourth, see the case of Supreme Conclave Knights of Damon v. Wood, 120 Ga. 328, 47 S. E. 940. As to the fifth, see Civ. Code 1895, § 3913, and Cheeves v. Danielly, 80 Ga. 115, 4 S. E. 902.

As to the degree of diligence due by the defendant to the plaintiff, the court, in effect, charged that, if the slab pit was not a nuisance, then plaintiff could not recover unless it appeared that the defendant had been grossly negligent in its operation. It is clear that the defendant was bound, in such case, to exercise ordinary and reasonable care and diligence. 1 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 727-730; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 414. Failure on the part of the defendant to use this degree of care would be such negligence as to make it liable for damages thereby done to plaintiffs. Under our Civil Code of 1895 (section 2898), the absence of ordinary diligence is termed "ordinary neglect," while (section 2900) gross neglect is defined as "the want of that care which every man of common sense, how inattentive soever he may be, takes of his own property." The court's charge was evidently based upon what was said in the opinion in Macon & Western R. Co. v. McConnell, 31 Ga. 133, 76 Am. Dec. 685. An examination of the questions made in that case, and of the charge there under review, convinces us that the term "gross negligence" was used by Judge Lyon to mean simply a want of ordinary care. The court approved the charge of Judge Bull, in which appeared the following: "They are not responsible for accidents happening from the exercise of these rights, unless these accidents result from the gross negligence or carelessness of the employes or agents of the road, and the plaintiff must prove that the injury complained of did result from such culpable neglect or carelessness. The amount of diligence required is just so much as an ordinarily prudent man would use in his own affairs." This part of the charge was not excepted to, but it is evident that in it "gross negligence" was used to denote merely a want of ordinary care. This is especially clear when we compare the opinion in Macon & Western R. Co. v. Davis, 13 Ga. 68, in which Judge Nisbet used the term in the same way, saying: "They are bound to reasonable care and diligence, and will be liable for gross neglect. In cases arising under this rule, the question is left to the jury, whether, with reference to the caution which a man of ordinary prudence would observe, the defendant has been guilty of gross negligence." There is some authority outside of this state for so using the term, and the cases just discussed were both decided before our Code went into effect. Since the adoption of the Code, the terms "ordinary neglect" and "gross neglect" have in this state a definite meaning, and, in a case in which the defendant is bound to use ordinary diligence, it is error, as against the plaintiff, for the court to charge that the defendant is liable for gross negligence only. Southern Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hudson, 113 Ga. 434, 38 S. E. 964 (2).

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross-bill, affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MOORE v. DEAN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1904.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—INSUFFICIENT CASE.

1. Where, on appeal from the judgment of the circuit court affirming a judgment of a magistrate, the case does not show on what ground the magistrate based his judgment, nor the exceptions on appeal to the circuit court, nor on what ground the circuit court based its judgment, the decision of the circuit court will not be reviewed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by Annie Moore against George R. Dean in magistrate's court. From a judgment for defendant in circuit court, sustaining the judgment of the magistrate, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Evans & Finley, for appellant. D. A. Hydrick, for respondent.

JONES, J. The appeal in this case is from the judgment of the circuit court, affirming the judgment of the magistrate's court in an action of claim and delivery for three cases, resulting in favor of the defendant. The exceptions are as follows:

"First. In that the circuit judge erred in affirming the magistrate's ruling by allowing the introduction of the records, showing a previous trial between the same parties based upon said mortgage; it appearing by the evidence that the plaintiff had paid or offered to pay an additional amount of $16 on the mortgage, which plaintiff claimed fully paid off and discharged the same after the former judgment was rendered, whereupon he would be entitled to plead payment in full of his claim and delivery, and would not be bound by any previous judgment.

"Second. In that the circuit judge erred in affirming the ruling of the magistrate, who sustained the demurrer of the defendant, and held that the plaintiff was estopped from recovering in this action by reason of the judgment and execution introduced in a former claim and delivery proceedings between the same parties; the error being that the facts were not the same as in the former suit, as the plaintiff had tendered payment in full of the balance due on the mortgage under which the former suit was tried.

"Third. In that the circuit judge erred in allowing the introduction of oral testimony for the purpose of showing that the written contract between Sam Moore and the defendant was a laborer's contract, and not a rental contract, in that it varied the terms of a written contract.

"Fourth. In that the circuit judge erred in holding that the contract introduced was a laborer's contract, and not a rental contract, as the terms of the contract, and the evidence bearing thereon, clearly established a rental contract, and not a laborer's contract.

"Fifth. In that the circuit judge erred in holding that the proceeds of the mortgaged property coming into the hands of the mortgagee could be applied to the payment of an open account, and not credited on the mortgage, when there are other parties interested in the mortgaged property, even by the direct consent of the mortgagor; the error being in allowing the credit on the open account of the proceeds of the mortgaged property.

"Sixth. In that the circuit judge erred in holding that the proceeds of the mortgaged property coming into the hands of the mortgagee or his agent could be applied to the payment of an open account, and not credited on the mortgage; the error being that the law applies credit of the proceeds of mortgaged property when it comes into the hands of the mortgagee to the mortgage, without any direction whatever from the mortgagor.

"Seventh. In that the circuit judge erred in finding that, from the whole testimony, the chattel mortgage had not been fully paid off and discharged by the proceeds from the sale of the crops which were covered by the mortgage, which proceeds were delivered to the mortgagee or his agent, and amounted to more than the mortgage, together with interest and costs; the error being in the failure of the court to apply the payment on the mortgage instead of on an open account."

The record does not show upon what grounds the magistrate based his judgment, except that the testimony is set out; nor does it show what exceptions were taken on appeal from the magistrate, nor upon what grounds the circuit court based its judgment. As the court has no jurisdiction to review the findings of fact by the circuit court in a case of this kind, and as it does not appear that the circuit court ruled as indicated in the exceptions, we are not in a position to consider if that court committed error of law. The circuit court's judgment, so far as we know, may have been based upon its view of the testimony.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

(70 S. C. 344)

DE HIHNS v. FREE et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 6, 1904.)

RESULTING TRUST—PAROL EVIDENCE—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Where a lease and agreement between plaintiff and the parties under whom defendant claims as heir at law show a relation to the property inconsistent with the resulting trust, defendant cannot assail the same by parol evidence in conflict therewith.

2. Evidence in support of irrelevant allegations allowed to remain in a pleading is properly excluded.

3. It is not an abuse of discretion to refuse to allow an answer to be amended during trial by pleading the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 83, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 693.]

4. An agreement that on the termination of a lease by the death of a tenant the land should be equally divided among the heirs of the deceased tenant and her husband, providing certain conditions in the lease should be first complied with, among which was the payment to the plaintiff of a certain sum paid by him to secure certain property, with interest, is a contract to convey the premises on the performance of certain conditions precedent; and an action thereon is in the nature of an action for specific performance, and not in foreclosure of a mortgage.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; Allen J. Green, Special Judge.

Action by George L. De Hihns against George W. Free and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The circuit decree is as follows (omitting former order of sale):

"This action came on to be heard before me at special November term, 1903, of the court of common pleas for Fairfield county. Issues out of the cause were docketed on calendar 1. The case was reached late in the afternoon. Counsel for defendants then stated that the original order submitting the issues was not in court, but a copy was, and they would use the copy for the present, and bring in the original in the morning. There appearing no objection to this course, a jury was impaneled, and the trial proceeded. Pending the introduction of plaintiff's testimony, the court adjourned for the night. Upon the opening of court the next morning, counsel for the defendants stated that they had been unable to find the original order submitting the issues; that they could not say positively whether such order had been passed, but, as there was no objection to it, proposed that I now sign the order. I suggested that plaintiff's counsel attach their consent. To this plaintiff's counsel demurred, saying that they did not desire to waive any rights they may have, and did not appear as consenting or resisting. Thereupon I signed the order, and the trial proceeded. Upon the introduction of parol testimony by the defendants to sustain the issues submitted to the jury, plaintiff objects upon the grounds hereinafter referred to. The testimony was held incompetent, and I withdrew the case from the jury, and proceeded to try the same on the equity side of the court, upon the pleadings and testimony taken before me in open court.

"The complaint alleges substantially:

"(1) That the lands described in the complaint were levied on and sold by the sheriff under execution against Charles Free, and bought by James B. McCants, on November 2, 1868.

"(2) That McCants sold and conveyed the lands to the plaintiff for $1,200, then paid by plaintiff on May 1, 1869.

"(3) That plaintiff was the son-in-law of Charles Free and his wife, Harriet, and, being desirous of their retaining the lands during their lives, the parties executed a lease, dated May 15, 1869, by which, in consideration of certain covenants therein mentioned to be performed by Harriet Free, plaintiff leased the lands to her for the term of her natural life, and a paper purporting to be the lease was recorded on January 14, 1865, in the proper office.

"(4) That on January 4, 1869, the plaintiff and Charles and Harriet Free entered into an agreement under their hands and seals by which plaintiff agreed that, upon the termination of the lease by the death of Harriet, the lands should be equally divided among the heirs of the said Charles and Harriet, provided certain conditions therein expressed should be first complied with, among which was the payment to plaintiff of the sum he paid to secure said property, with legal interest at seven per cent. from May 1, 1869, which sum was $1,200. That this agreement, together with the deeds of the sheriff to McCants and of McCants to plaintiff, and plats relating to the land, was inclosed in an envelope which was sealed and given Mrs. Free, with the following indorsement on it: 'To be opened after the expiration of the lease of Mrs. Harriet Free in the presence of the children, by George L. De Hihns or if dead or otherwise unable to be present, by the oldest living son of Mrs. Free.' The plaintiff has been unable to find said envelope since the death of Mrs. Free, but is informed that it is in existence, and in the hands of defendants' attorneys.

"(5) That no part of said $1,200 has been paid, and the said Harriet retained possession of the land under the lease until her death, on January 1, 1902 (the said Charles having predeceased her), leaving as heirs at law, and the heirs at law of the said Charles, nine children, named as defendants; and plaintiff, under terms of lease, has taken possession and rented same to a tenant for 1902.

"(6) That plaintiff has sought to have the agreement carried out without the aid of the court, but that the defendants have failed and refused to comply with the conditions by the payment of said sum of money and interest, denying plaintiff's legal rights, and interfering with and threatening to interfere with his quiet possession and receipt of rents, so that he is compelled to ask the aid of the court, and prays that the land be sold and the proceeds applied to the plaintiff's claim, etc.

"Defendants answer, admitting first paragraph of complaint, and so much of paragraph 2 as alleges the conveyance to plaintiff, but deny that plaintiff paid any part of the consideration. They also deny that plaintiff and Charles and Harriet Free entered into the agreement of June 12, 1869, and allege that they have no knowledge or information of the other allegations of the complaint, and for a second offense substantially allege that the funds with which the lands were purchased were not the funds of the plaintiff, but were furnished by Charles Free to the plaintiff for the purpose of purchasing the lands and preserving the same for the benefit of himself, his wife and family, including plaintiff's wife; that the funds so furnished were used by the plaintiff in the purchase of the land, and the deed taken in the name of plaintiff, and submit that a resulting trust thereby arose in favor of Charles, and they, as his heirs at law, are entitled to partition; that, if the instrument set out in paragraph 4 of the complaint (the agreement) was ever entered into, such agreement was merely to carry out the understanding and agreement by which plaintiff should nominally hold the title, without any beneficiary interest therein to himself, for the use of the said Charles and Harriet. Wherefore they ask partition.

"It appears from the testimony that in 1868 Charles Free was heavily embarrassed, there being a large amount of judgments against him, three of which were owned or controlled by J. B. McCants, Esq.; that, under executions based upon these judgments, his lands were sold by the sheriff and bought by Mr. McCants, and nulla bona returns made by the sheriff on other executions against Free. In this state of affairs, Free applied to his son-in-law, the plaintiff, who had just come into possession of a legacy of about $2,500, our money, from his kindred in Germany. The plaintiff came from his home in Lexington to Winnsboro, and arranged with Mr. McCants to purchase the property from him for the sum of $1,200. This arrangement was consummated by the payment of the money and the delivery of the deed from McCants to plaintiff, dated the 1st day of May, 1869, which deed was recorded on September 30, 1869. On the 15th day of May, 1869, the plaintiff leased these premises to Harriet Free for the term of her life, as alleged in the complaint. This lease is executed under seal by the plaintiff, Charles Free, and Harriet Free, witnessed by two witnesses, and was recorded January 14, 1865. On June 12, 1869, the paper called 'Agreement,' which is the basis of this action, was executed by the plaintiff and his wife, Lucinda, under seal, witnessed by William Summer, who is now dead. Upon this agreement appears the following:

"We, the undersigned, do hereby sanction and approve the intention of George L. De Hihns.

"Done at our residence in Fairfield County, S. C., this 2d October, in the year of our Lord, 1869.

Charles Fr. [L. S.]

"Harriet Fr [L. S.]

"It is apparent from an inspection of the paper that Charles and Harriet did not leave themselves room for their full names before the scrolls; hence the abbreviation of the 'Free.' These three papers, together with the deed of the sheriff to McCants, and the envelope in which papers had been sealed, were produced by the defendants at the trial, upon notice from the plaintiff. The envelope is mutilated, but some of the seals are intact, and show the impression of a nickel, which, under the glass, bears date '1869.' The indorsements on the envelopes are as follows:

"Recorded deeds of real estate and personal property for division among the body heirs of Charles and Harriet Free, Fairfield County, So. Ca."

"The seals of those enclosed papers will be broken only in the presence of all the body heirs of Charles and Harriet Free or their body heirs or agents after the lease given of the above property by George L. De Hihns, of Lexington County, to Harriet Free and agency given to Charles Free expires—by the oldest living body son of Harriet and Charles Free."

"Sealed this 2 day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, in presence of all three unto signed persons concerned."

"The signature to the three persons to this last indorsement has been erased with a knife or some sharp instrument, and partially pasted over with another and different kind of paper. These indorsements on the envelope are in the handwriting of plaintiff, and I have no doubt that the erasures was of the names of the plaintiff and Charles and Harriet Free.

"At this stage of the case the defendants proposed to prove by parol that the purchase money of the premises, which was the consideration of the deed from McCants to De Hihns, was the property of, and furnished by, Charles Free. To this testimony plaintiff objected on three grounds: (1) Because it would contradict the terms of the deed to McCants; (2) because the defendants, claiming as the heirs at law of Mr. and Mrs. Free, were estopped by the lease and agreement from disputing the title and settlement made through them; (3) that such evidence would tend to show a secret agreement that would be a fraud upon the creditors of Charles Free—and cited 1 Perry on Trusts, § 151; Nesbitt v. Cavender, 30 S. C. 33, 8 S. E. 193; Arnold v. Mattison, 3 Rich. Eq. 153, 154; Broughton v. Broughton, 4 Rich. Law, 491. I did not think the first ground well taken. The deed did not purport to say to whom the $1,200 paid by plaintiff belonged. But the other grounds, I thought, were well taken; and, in any view, the testimony was inadmissible, because, even conceding it to be true, as averred, that the money was furnished by Free for the purpose of preserving the property to himself and family, the writing signed by the parties at the time of the transaction was the best evidence of the terms on which the settlement was made, and this settlement would be sustained as a family settlement. Smith v. Tanner, 32 S. C. 263, 10 S. E. 1008; Gardner v. Gardner, 49 S. C. 62, 26 S. E. 1001.

"This ruling practically struck out defendants' second defense and eliminated the issues referred. The issues were therefore withdrawn from the jury, and the defendants thereafter confined to evidence impeaching the writings, or showing performance of the conditions of the agreement. I do not understand the rule laid down in Ragsdale v. Railroad Company, 60 S. C. 381, 38 S. E. 609, to conflict with this view. In the first case the court pointed out the remedy provided under the Code for simplifying the issues and ridding pleadings of irrelevant or redundant matter, but based their decision not on the failure of the objecting party to avail himself of that remedy, but upon the fact that the question had not been passed upon by the court below, and therefore the objection could not be raised for the first time in the Supreme Court. In the latter case the exception was held bad on its merits, and the remedy for pleadings stated in the first case approved and affirmed. None of the cases go to the extent of holding that failure of the party to avail himself of the motion to strike out will render competent evidence that will overturn settled principles of law, such as permitting a tenant to those claiming under him to dispute the title of his landlord, or an heir at law the right of his ancestor to dispose of his property in his lifetime, and cannot be carried to such extent without making the right of litigants dependent upon the skill of the pleader rather er than the law and equity of the cause—the evil the adoption of the Code was intended to obviate.

"Some testimony was introduced tending to show that the signature of Mr. Free to the agreement was not his writing, and the witness who purports to have probated the lease did not sign the probate; but Mrs. Spotts, one of the defendants, testified that she was present and heard the agreement read over by the plaintiff to her father and mother, and the same, together with the other papers, was sealed by plaintiff in the presence of all of them and delivered to her mother. My conclusion is that the papers are all genuine, and were executed and delivered by the parties, placed in an envelope, which was sealed and delivered as alleged in the complaint.

"Charles Free died March or April, 1884; Harriet Free, on January 1, 1902. This action was commenced May, 1902. It was urged that the action was, in effect, the foreclosure of a mortgage, and the agreement an instrument in the nature of a mortgage, and, it not having been recorded, and there having elapsed more than twenty years from the creation of its lien, under section 2449 of the Code of Laws, the action could not lie; and, in this view, leave to amend the answer so as to plead the statute in bar was asked at the close of the argument. I do not think the amendment material. In my view, the agreement creates no lien. It is but an agreement—a contract under seal, based upon good consideration, to convey the premises upon the performance of certain conditions precedent by the heirs of the bodies of Charles and Harriet Free. The defendants are not bound to perform these conditions, but they have the option of so doing, and, if they do, then plaintiff is bound to convey. The action is not one of foreclosure, but an action for the specific performance of a contract vendor against vendee, and its office is to require defendants to perform, or submit to a sale of the lands and application of the proceeds to the contract price. The title is held as security for the price. Vendee cannot compel conveyance until he pays the price—not even though the notes given are barred by the statute. Blackwell v. Ryan, 21 S. C. 121; Gregorie v. Bulow, Rich. Eq. Cas. 245.

"Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the action is well brought, and the plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought."

Defendants appeal on following exceptions:

"(1) Because his honor erred in withdrawing the issues from the jury upon the ground that the testimony offered by defendants to sustain the allegations of their answer was incompetent, whereas said testimony was competent, the plaintiff not having moved to strike out any part of the answer, and the issues should have been submitted to the jury on such testimony.

"(2) Because his honor erred in holding that the testimony offered by defendants by several witnesses tending to show that Charles Free, deceased, had paid all or a part of the purchase money of the tract of land, as alleged in the answer, was incompetent; the error being that such testimony was competent for the following reasons: (a) It was strictly in reply to testimony offered by the plaintiff. (b) It was strictly competent to prove the allegations of the answer, which the plaintiff had failed to move to strike out. (c) It was competent because it tended to disprove the allegations of the complaint. (d) Because it was competent, by such testimony, for defendants to show the real consideration of the deed from James B. McCants to George L. De Hihns, and that the same was not paid by the said George L. DeHihns, but by another party, in which event the plaintiff would not be entitled to be paid anything on his alleged agreement.

"(3) Because his honor erred in holding that the testimony offered by the defendants to sustain the allegations of their answer was incompetent, whereas he should have held that the said testimony was competent, and should have admitted it to show that the purchase money of the premises described in the complaint was paid by Charles Free at the time of the execution of the deed of James B. McCants to George L. De Hihns, and that such purchase money was not paid by said George L. De Hihns.

"(4) Because his honor erred in holding that the testimony offered by defendants to prove that Charles Free had paid all or a part of the purchase money mentioned in the deed from James B. McCants to George L. De Hihns was incompetent, on the ground that it would have been a fraud against the creditors of Charles Free when his honor should have held that such testimony was competent, no creditor of Charles Free being before the court; and, even if such testimony tended to show a fraud as against the creditors of Charles Free, the defendants should have been allowed to show it, in order that the court might grant no relief to either party, as the plaintiff would have been a participant to any such fraud, and in pari delicto, even if it had been established.

"(5) Because his honor erred in holding that the defendants, claiming as the heirs of Mr. and Mrs. Free, were estopped by the release and agreement from disputing the statements made therein, and in holding that parol testimony could not be admitted to show the true consideration of the deed, whereas he should have held that it is always competent to show the real and true consideration of a deed, even by parol testimony, and he should have further held that the papers mentioned did not constitute a family settlement.

"(6) Because his honor erred in holding that the writing signed by the parties at the time of the transaction was the best evidence of the terms on which the settlement was made, and in holding that such writing constituted a family settlement, whereas he should have held that the paper referred to was never agreed to by Charles Free and Mrs. Free, as appears from an inspection of said alleged agreement.

"(7) Because his honor erred in not holding, as contended by the defendants, that the deed from James B. McCants to George L. De Hihns, of date the 1st day of May, 1869, was a deed in the nature of a mortgage, and that, taken together with the other papers set forth in the complaint, practically constituted a mortgage, and that, as more than twenty years had elapsed from the date of said deed at the time of the commencement of the action, and no acknowledgment of the debt secured thereby, or any note of any payment thereon, having been recorded on the record of said deed having the effect of a mortgage, that it had ceased to constitute any lien on the premises described in the complaint at the time of the commencement of this action.

"(8) Because his honor erred in refusing to allow defendants to amend their answer pending the trial of this cause so as to set up by way of defense the failure of plaintiff to comply with the provisions of section 2449 of volume 1 of the Code of Laws of 1902.

"(9) Because his honor erred in not holding that the provisions of section 2449 of volume 1 of the Code of Laws of 1902 need not be specially pleaded.

"(10) Because his honor erred in holding that the instrument of writing set forth in the complaint was an agreement, based upon a good consideration, to convey the land described in the complaint to the defendants upon the performance of certain conditions, and that this was an action for special performance of contract between vendor and vendee, when there was no evidence to sustain said findings on the part of his honor.

"(11) Because his honor erred in refusing to admit the testimony offered by the defendants to show that the purchase money, in whole or any part, had been paid by Charles Free, when, if such fact had been established by the testimony, a resulting trust would have arisen in favor of the said Charles Free or his heirs at law."

J. E. McDonald and G. W. Ragsdale, for appellants. A. S. & W. D. Douglass, for respondent.

JONES, J. The decree of the circuit court and the exceptions are reported herewith, and reference may be had thereto for the facts of this case, and the specific points involved in this appeal. No exceptions are taken to the findings of fact upon which the decree rests, and this court is satisfied that the conclusions reached are sound and just, and it is not deemed necessary to review all the reasons assigned.

The chief reliance of appellants in resisting the relief sought by respondent was their claim of a resulting trust. A resulting trust arises by implication in the absence of evidence of a contrary intent, and cannot arise when an express agreement in writing shows a contrary intent. Perry on Trusts, § 124; Manning v. Screven, 56 S. C. 83, 34 S. E. 22. The lease and agreement proven in this case between the plaintiff and Mr. and Mrs. Free, under whom defendants claim as heirs at law, show a relation of the parties to the property inconsistent with the resulting trust claimed. It must follow that defendants could not assail the lease and agreement by parol evidence in conflict therewith, and that the exclusion of such evidence and the withdrawal of such issue from the jury were proper. The contention of appellants that the evidence offered was proper, because the answer alleged a resulting trust, and the allegations had been allowed to remain, is fully met by the case of Martin v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 70 S. C. 8, 48 S. E. 616, wherein this court held that the trial judge has power to exclude evidence in support of irrelevant allegations allowed to remain in a pleading.

The refusal to allow the defendants to amend answer so as to plead the statute of limitations was within the discretion of the court, and no abuse of discretion appears. The amendment was proposed during trial, and its refusal deprived defendants of no substantial right.

We are entirely satisfied with the conclusions of the circuit court that this action is not one practically in foreclosure of a mortgage, but is one in the nature of an action for specific performance of a contract under seal, based upon good consideration, to convey the premises upon the performance of certain conditions precedent.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BANK OF SPARTANBURG v. CHICKASAW SOAP CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 24, 1904.)

EQUITY—JURY TRIAL.

1. Where complaint alleges an indebtedness on a note and a pledge of notes and mortgage as collateral, and seeks judgment on the notes and an order for the sale of the collaterals and foreclosure of the mortgage, and an application of the proceeds thereof on the judgment, and the answer admits the indebtedness, equitable issues only are raised, and defendant is not entitled to a jury trial.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Townsend, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Spartanburg against the Chickasaw Soap Company.

From an order refusing a motion of plaintiff for reference, it appeals. Reversed.

Johnson & Nash, for appellant. Stanley Wilson, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This appeal involves the single point as to the effect of the pleadings—whether they raised equitable issues, or whether the same raised legal issues. The circuit judge held that they raised legal issues, and hence refused the motion of plaintiff for an order requiring the master to take the testimony. An examination of the pleadings convinces us that the pleadings raise equitable issues. It is true that the complaint sets up an indebtedness of more than $6,000, yet the answer admits this indebtedness. The complaint also sets up a pledge of $15,000 of bonds of the Chickasaw Soap Company, secured by a mortgage on its property, and also shows a bond for $3,200, and mortgage of lands as an additional security to the same, and asks that the bonds be sold and the mortgages foreclosed. The answer admits these facts of the complaint. Thus it is manifest that equitable issues are involved. This was the case in McLaurin v. Hodges, 43 S. C. 187, 190, 20 S. E. 991, 992, where this court held: "If the appellant was entitled to have the trial here heard by a circuit judge, sitting as a chancellor, it was serious error to order a part of the issues tried by a jury on the demand of right by the defendant." See, also, the declaration of this court on page 192, 43 S. C., page 998, 20 S. E., of the case just cited. The late Chief Justice McIver declared, in Hughes v. Kirkpatrick, 37 S. C. 161, 169, 15 S. E. 912: "So that it is apparent that a trial by jury of any question of fact which arises in the progress of any proceeding cannot be demanded as a matter of right, but only where 'an issue of fact for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property,' arises."

It is the judgment of this court that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the action be recommitted to the circuit court.

WM. L. ALLEN & CO. v. DAVIDS et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 23, 1904.)

PARTNERSHIP—ACTION AGAINST INDIVIDUAL MEMBERS—COMPLAINT.

1. In an action against individual members of a firm for goods sold to the firm, where service is had on only one partner, it is not necessary that the complaint should allege that, when the goods were sold, plaintiff knew that such defendant was a member of the firm.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Aldrich, Judge.

Action by Wm. L. Allen & Co. against W. Irving Davids and Esdaille M. Solomons, copartners. From an order refusing a motion to amend, defendant Solomons appeals. Affirmed.

Mordecai & Gadsden, for appellant. Smythe, Lee & Frost, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The plaintiff by this action seeks to recover an account of $73.60 against the defendant Esdaille M. Solomons, who alone was served with the summons and complaint, as the balance due the plaintiff by W. Irving Davids and Esdaille M. Solomons as copartners in the conduct and management of the Congress Hall Hotel, Saratoga, N. Y. It will be necessary to have before us the complaint and argument of the defendants. They are as follows:

The complaint, omitting the caption, is as follows:

"The plaintiff, complaining of the defendants, alleges as follows:

"(1) That it was at the times herein mentioned, and is now, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the state of New York.

"(2) That heretofore, on or about the 8th day of June, 1903, the defendants, W. Irving Davids and Esdaille M. Solomons, entered into a written agreement, a copy of which is hereto attached, and made a part of this complaint.

"(3) That by reason of the said agreement the said defendants were copartners in the conduct and management of the Congress Hall Hotel, therein referred to, subsequent to the date of said agreement, and during the operation of the lease therein referred to, and became liable for all the debts contracted by either of said defendants during the said time in the conduct and management of said hotel, or business connected therewith.

"(4) That the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of seventy-three and $\frac{60}{100}$ dollars (\$73.60); the said amount representing the balance due for merchandise sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants subsequent to the date of said agreement, and during the operation of the lease referred to therein; the said goods and merchandise, and the time of their sale and delivery to the defendants, and their value, being fully alleged and set forth in the annexed itemized and verified account, which is hereby made a part of this complaint. And the plaintiff alleges that there is now due and owing by the defendants to it, the full and just sum of seventy-three and $\frac{60}{100}$ dollars (\$73.60), as is shown by said account. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendants in the sum of seventy-three and $\frac{60}{100}$ dollars (\$73.60)."

And a copy of the agreement is as follows:

"Memorandum of agreement made this eighth day of June, 1903, between W. Irving Davids, of Charleston, S. C., a party of the first part, and Esdaille M. Solomons, of the same place, party of the second part.

"Whereas, heretofore, by an instrument dated May first, 1903, the party of the first part herein leased of Henry Clement and John B. Clement, as executors, etc., of Wil-ham B. Clement, and one John Cox, for the term of five months, the property known as Congress Hall, in the village of Saratoga Springs, N. Y.; and

"Whereas, the said lease was signed and executed by the party of the first part herein as sole lessor; and

"Whereas, as understood and agreed between the parties hereto, in the leasing of said hotel, the party of the first part herein is to render his personal services, and the benefit of his experience in the management of said hotel; and the party of the second part is to furnish one-half of the capital necessary to conduct and manage the same; and the parties hereto are to divide the profits, derived from the conduct and management of said hotel, equally share and share alike.

"Now, therefore, it is mutually understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto, that the said party of the first part and the party of the second part have and hold equal interests in the lease above mentioned, and are considered hereby partners in the conduct and management of said Congress Hall, under said lease, and to share and share alike equally in and to the profits derived from said conduct and management of said hotel.

"It is further mutually understood and agreed that the terms and covenants herein shall bind the parties hereto, their executors, administrators or assigns.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have set their hands and seals, the day and year above written. W. Irving Davids. [L. S.] Esdaille M. Solomons. [L. S.]"

The attorneys for defendant Solomons served upon plaintiff the following motion:

"You will please take notice that on Tuesday next, 8th of December inst., at the hour of 10 o'clock, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, we shall move the Honorable James Aldrich, presiding judge, at the courthouse in Charleston, for an order requiring the complaint herein to be more definite and certain in the following particulars, to wit: By alleging to whom and under what partnership name the credit was given for the goods and merchandise mentioned in the complaint, and whether said credit was extended to W. Irving Davids and Esdaille M. Solomons, as copartners in business, upon the faith of said copartnership, known to the plaintiff when said credit was given." Upon hearing the motion, and after argument of counsel, Judge Aldrich made the following order: "On hearing the motion of the defendant E. M. Solomons to make the complaint herein more definite and certain in the particulars set forth in the notice of said motion, and after hearing argument for and against said motion by counsel representing the plaintiff and the defendant E. M. Solomons, it is ordered that the complaint be amended as follows: By inserting in paragraph 4, after the words 'sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants,' and before the words 'subsequent to the date of said agreement,' the following, to wit, 'as copartners in the conduct and management of the said Congress Hall Hotel,' and that in other respects the motion be, and is hereby, refused. It is further ordered that the defendants have twenty days after the service of the said complaint, amended as aforesaid, in which to plead thereon." Thereupon the defendant took the following ground of appeal: "Because the presiding judge erred in not requiring plaintiffs to amend their complaint by alleging to whom and under what copartnership named the credit was given for the goods and merchandise mentioned in the complaint, and whether said credit was extended to W. I. Davids and E. M. Solomons as copartners in business upon the faith of said copartnership, known to the plaintiffs when said credit was given."

The fourth paragraph of the complaint, as amended by the circuit judge, reads as follows:

"(4) That the defendants are indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $73.60, the said amount representing the balance due for merchandise, sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, as copartners in the conduct and management of the said Congress Hall Hotel, subsequent to the date of said agreement, and during the operation of the lease referred to therein; the said goods and merchandise, and the time of the sale and delivery to defendants, and their value, being fully alleged and set forth in the annexed itemized and verified account, which is hereby made a part of this complaint."

We deem it best to set out a copy of the account:

It is apparent that every item embraced in the account is connected with the running of a hotel, and that hotel is "Congress Hall, Saratoga Springs, New York State," and, furthermore, the date of each item is subsequent to the alleged partnership agreement, and before its termination. We must always remember that the partnership is a new entity, and blinds everybody who is a party to it, whether known as a party to it at the time or not.

Again, to so much of defendant's objection that the complaint does not allege that, at the time the credit was given, the plaintiffs knew of the partnership: In 22 A. & E. Ency. Law (2d Ed.), at page 63, it is held: "A dormant partner is a partner who takes no part in the business, and whose connection with it is unknown." Our own case of Reab v. Pool, 30 S. C. 140, 144, 8 S. E. 703, is a case well in point. In this case one S. L. Vaughn purchased an interest in the business conducted in the name of "R. R. Pool, Agent," and the business was conducted in that name. Upon default in payment of the obligation of R. R. Pool, agent, the defendant, Vaughn, was sued as a partner. He tried to avoid such obligation by alleging that he had received none of the profits of the business and was not known in it. (Italics ours.) The court, however, held: "Whether Vaughn was known in the business or not could not affect the case. He agreed to become a partner under the old style of 'R. R. Pool, Agent.' He was a partner, but a dormant partner, and, as such, could not, of course, be known in the business." We might multiply authorities, but the foregoing are deemed sufficient. Other courts may take a different view, but we deem our position fully tenable.

It is the judgment of this court that the order appealed from is just and proper, and it is therefore affirmed.

McCREERY LAND & INVESTMENT CO. v. MYERS et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1904.)

TRIAL—LEGAL AND EQUITABLE ISSUES—EQUITY—JURISDICTION—BOUNDARIES.

1. Whether legal or equitable issues shall be first tried is in the discretion of the trial judge.

2. Where, in an equitable action, the issue of title is submitted to the jury, all issues which could properly be raised in a legal action for possession of the land, including fraud in the deed introduced by plaintiff, are involved.

3. Equity has no jurisdiction of a suit where mere confusion of boundaries exists, as remedies at law to settle disputed boundaries are sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Boundaries, § 139.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County.

Action by the McCreery Land & Investment Company against Jeremiah Myers and others. From an order refusing a reference and transferring the case to calendar for trial of legal issues, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Melton & Belser, for appellant. Thomas & Gibbs and W. D. Mayfield, for respondents.

JONES, J. The appeal in this case is from an order of the circuit court, Hon. J. H. Hudson presiding as special judge, transferring the cause to calendar 1 for trial of issue of title by jury, the court holding that the complaint raised the question of title, and that the whole case is a proper one for the jury. The exceptions are as follows: "First. Because his honor held that the whole case was a proper one to be passed upon and decided by a jury, and, so holding, overruled plaintiff's motion to refer, and ordered the cause transferred to calendar No. 1 for trial of the whole cause by jury; whereas, it appearing that the pleadings raised certain equitable issues, namely: (1) The issue as to fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake in the execution of said deed from the defendant Jeremiah Myers to the plaintiff, and the right of the defendants to have said deed and the plat referred to herein reformed; (2) the issue as to the right of the defendants, or any of them, to claim as purchasers for value, without notice, as against the plaintiff; and (3) the issue as to confusion of the boundaries between the lands of the plaintiff and defendants, and the correct location of the boundary line called for in plaintiff's said deed and plat. Said issues, or one or more of them, should have been passed upon and decided by the court in the exercise of its chancery power, and it was error to order the same tried by a jury on the law side of the court. Second. Because his honor ordered the case transferred from calendar No. 1 to calendar No. 2 for trial by jury; whereas, it appearing that the pleadings raised certain equitable issues, or one or more thereof, which the nature of the case and relation of the issues required should be determined prior to the determination of the legal issues as to possession of real estate, the cause should therefore have been retained on calendar No. 2 for the prior determination of said equitable issues, and his honor erred and abused his discretion in ordering the cause transferred to calendar No. 1 at this stage of the proceeding."

We think the exceptions must be overruled, for these reasons:

1. In Knox v. Campbell, 52 S. C. 461, 463, 30 S. E. 485, this court held that since the adoption of the Code it is left to the discretion of the judge whether the legal or equitable issues should be first tried, quoting with approval from Pomeroy on Code Remedies, § 86: "The equitable issues may be first tried, and the legal issues afterwards, or the order may be reversed, as the nature of the case and the relation of the issues seem to require." So that, even if it be true, as contended for by appellant, that equitable issues were involved, there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the circuit court in first submitting the issue of title raised by the pleadings to the jury. We do not understand the order of Judge Hudson as intending to submit any strictly equitable issue to the jury. The issue of title alone is submitted to the jury, which, of course, would involve any issue tendered which could properly be raised and submitted to a jury in a strictly legal action to recover possession of land. For example, in an action to recover land the deed under which plaintiff claims may be assailed for fraud by way of defense before the jury. De Walt v. Kinard, 19 S. C. 292; Archer v. Long, 38 S. C. 272, 16 S. E. 998. Questions of fraud or mistake may sometimes be adjudicated in actions at law, as in these matters the jurisdiction of equity is not exclusive but concurrent. Griffin v. Ry. Co., 66 S. C. 77, 44 S. E. 562. If, after the issue of title has been determined, there remain any independent equitable issues for determination, these must be tried by the appropriate tribunal.

2. The contention of appellant that the case is one solely of equitable cognizance as a case of confusion of boundaries cannot be sustained. A mere confusion of boundaries of land is not sufficient to give a court of equity jurisdiction. There must be some equity in addition thereto. If the ordinary legal remedies are adequate, they must be resorted to. 1 Story, Eq. Juris. (12th Ed.) § 610, 615. The legal remedies provided by our Code for the recovery of possession of land by one out of possession against another in possession claiming title are ordinarily adequate to settle disputed boundaries. The complaint in this is substantially an action to recover possession of a strip of land in the possession of the defendants, claiming title, and this issue of title must be tried by a jury, under section 274, Code Proc. 1902, and the numerous cases so holding.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

CARRIERS—LOSS OF WIFE'S BAGGAGE—ACTION BY HUSBAND—EVIDENCE—LIABILITY—PARTIES.

1. Where a husband sues a carrier for the loss of his wife's trunk while a passenger, the husband may testify as to the value after the wife has testified as to the contents.

2. A carrier is liable for money necessary for traveling expenses, and jewelry for personal use, carried as baggage in a trunk.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 5, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1522.]

3. Where the trunk of a passenger is delivered to the only person in charge of the station, who is at the time engaged at a telegraph instrument, by depositing it at the place indicated by him, and giving him at the time directions as to checking, and notice that the owner would soon appear, and that he would attend to it, it is a delivery to the carrier.

4. Defect of parties can be taken advantage of only by demurrer or answer.

5. The husband has title to the wearing apparel of his wife and children, and other articles convenient to their personal use, so that he may maintain an action for the loss of them in a trunk in the possession of his wife, delivered to a carrier as the baggage of his wife, though no evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier is shown.

Gary, A. J., and Woods and Jones, JJ., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by P. C. Battle against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Lyles and N. B. Dial, for appellant. Simpson & Cooper, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This is an action for damages. The complaint is as follows:

"The plaintiff, complaining of the defendant, alleges:

"(1) That the defendant is, and at the times hereinafter stated was, a corporation duly chartered, organized, and doing business under the laws of the state of South Carolina, and owning and operating a line of railroad as a common carrier of goods and passengers between Columbia, South Carolina, and Laurens, South Carolina, a part of said line being in Laurens county and said state, and that Clinton, South Carolina, is a station on said road.

"(2) That on December 30, 1901, Mrs. Bettie Battle, the wife of the plaintiff, with a view to becoming a passenger over the defendant's line of railroad from Laurens, S. C., to Clinton, S. C., about 12 o'clock m. of the said day delivered to the agents of the defendant, at its depot and baggage room at Laurens, S. C., through N. S. Garrett, a trunk containing her wearing apparel, jewelry, the wearing apparel of her children and the plaintiff's children, some bedclothes, provisions, five dollars in money, and other articles, for the purpose of having the same checked as her baggage over the defendant's railroad from Laurens, S. C., to Clinton, S. C., to which place she was going as a passenger over the defendant's said road, and the defendant, through its agent, received the said trunk for that purpose.

"(3) That, shortly after the delivery of the said trunk to the defendant, the said Mrs. Bettie Battle went to the ticket office of the defendant at Laurens, S. C., for the purpose of obtaining passage over the defendant's said railroad to Clinton, S. C., but while she was purchasing her ticket the train over defendant's road from Laurens to Clinton left Laurens, and she was compelled to remain in Laurens until the next day. That shortly after the train left she went to the baggage room of the defendant at Laurens, S. C., to inquire about the trunk, and found the same missing and lost.

"(4) That the defendant, through its negligence and the negligence of its agents and servants, suffered the said trunk to be lost or stolen, and, although the plaintiff has made frequent demands upon the defendant to deliver the said trunk to him, it has failed and still fails to do so.

"(5) That the said trunk and its contents were reasonably worth the sum of two hundred dollars.

"(6) That the plaintiff had been put to considerable trouble and expense in searching for said trunk, and in providing wearing apparel for his wife and children, to the amount of fifty dollars, which expense was caused by the negligence of the defendant in failing to deliver the said trunk to the plaintiff, as it was its duty to do.

"(7) That the said trunk and contents were the property of this plaintiff.

"(8) That the plaintiff, by reason of the negligence of the defendant in failing to deliver the said trunk to him, has suffered damage to the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars.

"Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars damage, and for the cost of this action."

Answer:

"The defendant, by William H. Lyles, its attorney, answering the complaint in the above-entitled cause:

"(1) Admits the allegations contained in the first paragraph of the complaint.

"(2) Denies each and every other allegation in said complaint contained."

The trial came on before Judge Dantzler and a jury. The trend of the testimony led to establishing this state of facts: On the 30th December, 1901, the trunk of Mrs. Bettie Battle was carried to the depot of the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad, at Laurens, S. C., by Mr. Garrett, and, by the direction of Mr. Crisp, an agent of the said defendant railway company, it was placed in front of the door of its baggage room, under an assurance of said agent that he would attend to it as soon as he got through some work upon which he was then engaged. The trunk was described as a trunk covered with zinc and strapped by ropes, belonging to a lady who would soon come to the said depot. Mrs. Bettie Battle came down about 2 o'clock, and bought a ticket from Laurens to Clinton, S. C., over the defendant's railroad. She could not find her trunk, and missed taking the train until the next day. She had her brother and brother-in-law to assist her in looking for her trunk, but it was never recovered. Its contents were $50 worth of her clothing; $5 in money; two rings (gold finger rings), valued at $15; her children's clothes, valued at $30; some small gold pins, valued at $5; some $5 worth of cake, sausage meat, and butter; also a counterpane and blanket. The trunk value was $5. The husband of Mrs.

Bettie Battle, the plaintiff, P. C. Battle, brought suit for $250. A motion for nonsuit was overruled. Defendant's testimony was offered. After a charge from the presiding judge, the jury brought in a verdict for $121.50. Thereupon defendant appealed to this court on the following grounds, to wit:

"(1) Because the circuit judge erred in allowing P. C. Battle to testify, against objection of defendant, to the contents of the trunk—that there was money and jewelry in it.

"(2) Because he erred in not granting defendant's motion for nonsuit, because there was no testimony to show that Crisp was agent for its company: (a) Because there was no testimony to show that the trunk was delivered to the defendant.

"(3) Because he erred in not granting defendant's motion for nonsuit on the ground that the action could not be maintained in the name of P. C. Battle, whereas the testimony showed the trunk and its contents were the separate property of Mrs. Bettie Battle.

"(4) Because he erred in not granting defendant's motion for nonsuit, even if the clothing of the children belonged to the father, the plaintiff, for he was not a passenger nor intended passenger.

"(5) Because he erred in not granting defendant's motion for nonsuit on the ground that there was no contractual relation between it and the plaintiff.

"(6) Because he erred in not granting defendant's motion for nonsuit, inasmuch as there was not a particle of testimony showing that it had any notice whatever that Mr. Battle intended becoming a passenger over its line, and by purchasing a ticket later could not fix the liability on it, there being a joint agency.

"(7) Because he erred in charging the jury, 'When a party delivers baggage to a railroad company, with intention of becoming a passenger, and the road so accepts it, the company will be liable', the error being there was no testimony whatever going to show that the defendant had accepted the trunk, or had any notice that the said Battle intended to become a passenger over its particular line.

"(8) Because he erred in charging the jury, 'If you find that P. C. Battle gave the property to his wife simply to be used by her as his wife, then it is his property, and that he is the proper plaintiff in the case.'

"(10) Because he erred in making a similar charge as the above as to the children's clothes.

"(11) Because he erred in charging the jury the plaintiff could recover for the provisions of the wife, and would be liable for such, and for money and jewelry.

"(12) Because he erred in not setting verdict aside and granting a new trial on defendant's motion, the same being contrary to the law and the evidence in the case."

We will now proceed to pass upon these grounds of appeal in their order.

1. The wife of plaintiff had fully testified to the contents of the lost trunk. The witness P. C. Battle did not attempt to say what articles of property were in the trunk. He was not with his wife when she packed the trunk, and he testified that he only knew because his wife had told him. There was therefore no harm done defendant. Exception overruled.

2. We cannot sustain this exception, for there was testimony showing Mr. Crisp's connection with defendant railway. The value of that testimony was for the jury. Exception overruled.

3. P. C. Battle could maintain his action for any of his property which was in the trunk. He could certainly sue for the $5 in cash and for his children's clothing. There was testimony that those articles were in that trunk, and that said trunk was carried to the defendant's depot, and delivered at the baggage room in accordance with its agent's direction. This exception is overruled.

4. We cannot hold that Mrs. Battle, to whom plaintiff's property was confided, and who purchased a ticket over defendant's railroad, could not lawfully include her husband's property in her trunk, and that the defendant did not thereby owe a duty to plaintiff therefor, which duty so owed entitled the plaintiff to maintain an action against it therefor. This exception is overruled.

5. We cannot sustain this exception, for the reason just given in discussing the fourth exception.

6. It was not necessary for Mr. Battle to become a passenger, to enable him to recover from the defendant the value of his property which passed into defendant's hands through the contractual relation of Mrs. Battle with defendant. This exception is overruled.

7. We do not think this question was fairly presented to the circuit judge, but, even if it was directly presented, the fact that the plaintiff was not a passenger, but that his wife was such, while she was intrusted with plaintiff's property, would make the railroad responsible to him for such property.

8. We overrule this exception because there was some testimony on this issue.

9. We must sustain this exception. We are not satisfied with the position of the circuit judge on this branch of the case. By our Constitution, a married woman can acquire a right of property by gift. She is, as to that property, its owner. It might be that a clash of claims might arise as between the husband and wife themselves. The railroad should not be liable to pay to each one separately for the property under the circumstances involved in the suit.

10. There was no error by the circuit judge as to the plaintiff's right of action for his children's clothing, under the circumstances of this case.

11. We only sustain this exception as to the husband's right of action for the $5 in money.

12. The verdict of the jury covering the value of all of the property—both that of the husband and the wife—the motion for a new trial should have been granted.

I think the judgment should be reversed.

Statement of the Case.

GARY, A. J. (dissenting). This is an action to recover damages for the loss of a trunk. The complaint alleges:

(1) The corporate existence of the defendant.

(2) That on December 30, 1901, Mrs. Bettie Battle, the wife of the plaintiff, with a view to becoming a passenger over the defendant's line of railroad from Laurens, S. C., to Clinton, S. C., about 12 o'clock m. of the said day delivered to the agents of the defendant at its depot and baggage room at Laurens, S. C., through N. S. Garrett, a trunk containing her wearing apparel, jewelry, the wearing apparel of her and the plaintiff's children, some bedclothing, provisions, $5 in money, and other articles, for the purpose of having the same checked as her baggage over the defendant's railroad from Laurens, S. C., to Clinton, S. C., to which place she was going as a passenger over the defendant's said road, and the defendant, through its agent, received the said trunk for that purpose.

(3) That, shortly after the delivery of the said trunk to the defendant, the said Mrs. Bettie Battle went to the ticket office of the defendant at Laurens, S. C., for the purpose of obtaining passage over the defendant's said railroad to Clinton, S. C.; but while she was purchasing her ticket the train over defendant's road from Laurens to Clinton left Laurens, and she was compelled to remain in Laurens until the next day. That, shortly after the train left, she went to the baggage room of the defendant at Laurens, S. C., to inquire about the trunk, and found same missing and lost.

(4) That the defendant, through its negligence and the negligence of its agents and servants, suffered the said trunk to be lost or stolen, and, although the plaintiff has made frequent demands upon the defendant to deliver the said trunk to him, it has failed and still fails to do so.

(5) That the said trunk and its contents were reasonably worth the sum of $200.

(6) That the plaintiff has been put to considerable trouble and expense in searching for said trunk, and in providing wearing apparel for his wife and children, to the amount of $50, which expense was caused by the negligence of the defendant in failing to deliver the said trunk to the plaintiff, as it was its duty to do.

(7) That the said trunk and contents were the property of this plaintiff.

(8) That the plaintiff, by reason of the negligence of the defendant in failing to deliver the said trunk to him, has suffered damage to the amount of $250.

At the close of plaintiff's testimony the defendant made a motion for nonsuit, which was refused. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $121.50, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment entered thereon.

Opinion.

The first assignment of error is that his honor the presiding judge erred in allowing P. C. Battle to testify, against the objection of the defendant, as to the contents of the trunk—that there was money and jewelry in it. This exception seems to have been taken under a misconception of the facts. The circuit judge, upon objection by the defendant, ruled that the plaintiff could not testify as to the contents of the trunk, but, after Mrs. Battle had testified as to the contents, allowed the plaintiff to testify as to the value of the articles therein contained.

A carrier may be held responsible for the jewelry of a passenger carried for her own personal use, to a reasonable extent. 8 Enc. of Law, 534; 6 Cyc. 667. A passenger has the right to carry with him on his journey, as baggage, a sum of money reasonably necessary for his traveling expenses. 3 Enc. of Law, 535; 6 Cyc. 667.

The second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth exceptions relate to the refusal to grant a motion for nonsuit, and assign the following errors: (1) Because there was no testimony to show, or tending to show, that the trunk was delivered to the defendant; (2) that the action could not be maintained in the name of P. C. Battle, whereas the testimony showed that the trunk and its contents were the separate property of Mrs. Battle; (3) that, even if the clothing of the children belonged to the father, the plaintiff, he was not a passenger or intended passenger; (4) that there was no contractual relation between the defendant and the plaintiff; (5) that inasmuch as there was not a particle of testimony showing that the defendant had any notice whatever that the plaintiff intended becoming a passenger over its line, and by purchasing a ticket later could not fix the liability on it. The record shows that the motion for nonsuit was made on two grounds: (1) Because there was no testimony to go to the jury as to the delivery of the trunk to the defendant; and (2) because the suit is brought in the name of the wrong party, and he cannot maintain an action against a common carrier for articles of personal property in possession of some one else. No other grounds can be considered by this court.

We will first consider whether there was any testimony tending to show delivery of the trunk to the defendant. It was admitted that M. L. Crisp was the ticket agent and telegraph operator of the defendant. There was testimony to the effect that he was in the ticket office and at the telegraph instrument, and was the only person in charge of the depot, when the trunk was carried there. N. S. Garrett, who carried the trunk, asked Crisp, who was standing at the telegraph instrument, where to put the trunk, and he said, "Around at the next door." Garrett did so, and called his attention to it. He told him that it was a lady's trunk, who would be there directly, where to check it, and, "Please to take care of it." Crisp told Garrett that as soon as he got through he would take charge of the trunk. Mrs. Bettie Battle came thereafter, bought her ticket, but could not find her trunk.

In 8 Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 562, it is said: "Delivery to an agent other than the baggage master having supervision and control over matters at the carrier's depot or station is a delivery to the carrier, and it is as binding as if the delivery had been to one whose special duty it was to receive baggage." In Hickox v. Naugatuck R. Co., 81 Conn. 281, 83 Am. Dec. 143, a passenger took his trunk to a station on defendant's line, and requested that it be checked for a train that left in about four hours, but was told by the agent that the company only checked baggage fifteen minutes before the departure of the trains. He left his baggage, and returned at the proper time, got his check, and took passage, but, on receiving his trunk at the place of destination, found that it had been opened, and some of its contents stolen. There was no evidence as to whether it was opened while at the station or en route. It was held that the company must be regarded as having received the trunk when it was first taken to the station, that their liability attached at that time, and that it was therefore immaterial where the articles were stolen." Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 561, note. In the case of Rogers v. R. Co., 38 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 289, the baggage was sent to the station in the care of an expressman, who delivered it to the company's agent, calling his attention to it, who thereupon replied, "All right." It was held that such proof established a prima facie case of delivery to the company, although it appeared that such person was not the agent having charge of the receipt of baggage; that where a company sanctions the employment of a ticket agent, and holds him out to the world as its agent, it is estopped from repudiating his act in accepting baggage for transportation. These authorities show that this assignment of error cannot be sustained.

We will next consider the assignment of error that the suit was brought in the name of the wrong party. An objection that there is a defect of parties is waived unless there is a demurrer or answer insisting upon this objection. Shull v. Caughman, 54 S. C. 203, 32 S. E. 301. The only pleading on the part of the defendant in this case was a general denial. This objection was therefore waived.

The seventh and eighth exceptions are as follows:

"(7) Because he erred in charging the jury, 'When a party delivers baggage to a railroad company in contemplation of becoming a passenger, and the baggage is so accepted, then that establishes the relation of passenger to the railway;' the error being there was no evidence whatever that the plaintiff, P. C. Battle, ever intended becoming a passenger.

"(8) Because he erred in charging the jury, 'When a party delivers baggage to a railroad company, with intention of becoming a passenger, and the road so accepts it, the company will be liable;' the error being there was no testimony whatever going to show that the defendant had accepted the trunk, or had any notice that the said Battle intended to become a passenger over its particular line."

In order to comprehend the force and effect of the charge, it will be necessary to determine what the rights of the plaintiff are under the complaint. The general rule of the common law is that the owner of personal property having committed no act of estoppel has the right to recover its possession from any one withholding it from him. Carmichael v. Buck, 10 Rich. Law, 332, 70 Am. Dec. 226. Or if it has been wrongfully sold, he has a right of action against the seller for the proceeds arising from the sale thereof, or for the value of the property. See authorities cited in the concurring opinion in Holliday v. Poston, 60 S. C. 103, 38 S. E. 449. These principles, however, are not applicable to this case. The plaintiff's wife was in possession of his alleged property as bailee. The general rule is that during the continuance of the bailment the bailee alone has a right of action for damages arising from an interference with the possession of the property. Steele v. Crockett, Dud. 16, 31 Am. Dec. 546; Clarke v. Poozer, 2 McMul. 435. When, however, the act of a third party causes the destruction or loss of the property itself, it is an infringement of the bailor's rights, and he, as well as the bailee, may sue. 3 Enc. of Law, 763. The plaintiff's action does not rise ex contractu, but ex delicto, and it was incumbent on him to prove that the alleged negligence or recklessness of the defendant caused the loss of his property. The charge gave the plaintiff the benefit of the law as to passengers, when he in no respect occupied that position. The defendant did not owe him any duty as a passenger, and the charge was misleading and prejudicial to the defendant. These exceptions must therefore be sustained.

The ninth exception is as follows: "(9) Because he erred in charging the jury, 'If you find that P. C. Battle gave the property to his wife simply to be used by her as his wife, then it is his property, and that he is the proper plaintiff in the case.' This is only a portion of the charge upon this question, and, when considered in connection with the other portions, it is free from error. The test is whether it was the intention of the parties that the husband should part with his right of ownership in the property, and that the title should vest in the wife as her separate estate. State v. Pitts, 12 S. C. 180, 32 Am. Rep. 506. The charge was in conformity with this principle.

The tenth exception is as follows: "Because he erred in making a similar charge as to children's clothes." The rule is thus stated in State v. Trapp, 14 Rich. Law, 203, 207: "Articles of property furnished by a father, in fulfillment of his natural duty to provide for his children, to his minor son, who lives with him, may be described in an indictment, even for larceny, as the property either of father or of the son. The general property may be said to be in the father, who has bought and paid for them—the use, in the child. 2 Russ. Cr. 94; State v. Williams, 2 Strob. 229. But where, in an indictment for larceny of certain articles of wearing apparel, the property was laid to be in J. W., and the proof was they belonged to a son of J. W., nineteen years old, bound apprentice to his father, and entitled by the covenants of his indentures to be supplied with his clothing, the court held the indictment defective. 2 Russ. Cr. 95. The clothing had been furnished, not in discharge of the father's natural duty, but in performance of a contract, and for a valuable consideration. Whatever property he had held in them had been divested, and the ownership was exclusively in the son." So, in the case under consideration, if the children's clothes were furnished by the father in fulfillment of his natural duty to provide for them, he has a right of action for the loss of the property through negligence. It is, however, incumbent on him to establish the fact of negligence.

The eleventh exception is as follows: "(11) Because he erred in charging the jury the plaintiff could recover for the provisions of the wife, and [the defendant] would be liable for such, and for money and jewelry." As hereinbefore stated, the plaintiff's right to recover damages is dependent upon his ownership of the property.

The twelfth exception is as follows: "(12) Because he erred in not setting aside verdict and granting a new trial on defendant's motion, the same being contrary to the law and the evidence in the case." This exception points out no specific error, and is too general for consideration.

WOODS, J. I concur in the views expressed by Mr. Justice GARY, except as to the seventh and eighth exceptions. These exceptions are as follows:

"(7) Because he erred in charging the jury, 'When a party delivers baggage to a railroad company in contemplation of becoming a passenger, and the baggage is so accepted, then that establishes the relation of passenger to the railway; the error being there was no evidence whatever that the plaintiff, P. C. Battle, ever intended becoming a passenger.

"(8) Because he erred in charging the jury, 'When a party delivers baggage to a railroad company with intention of becoming a passenger, and the road so accepts it, the company will be liable;' the error being there was no testimony whatever going to show that the defendant had accepted the trunk, or had any notice that the said Battle intended to become a passenger over its particular line."

Whether the trunk was delivered to the railroad company and accepted by it as baggage was a question of fact for the jury. It was also a question of fact whether the contents were the property of the husband, who was the plaintiff, or of his wife. The charge of the circuit judge on these two points, as Mr. Justice GARY has shown, was free from error. If the trunk and its contents were the property of the husband, received by the carrier as baggage carried by the wife, and the contents were of such character as should be regarded baggage, then the carrier should be held liable to the husband, just as if he himself had delivered the trunk as a passenger. The ordinary baggage of a wife and of children, consisting of wearing apparel and other articles convenient for personal use, are usually furnished by the husband, and the title is in him, while the use is enjoyed by the several members of the family upon whom it may be bestowed. When the railroad company received such property to transport it as baggage for the wife as a passenger, it received it as a common carrier, and became liable to the owner as a common carrier; and it is not incumbent on the husband, suing as the owner for its loss, to prove negligence, as a condition of recovery. In Sonneborn v. Ry. Co., 65 S. C. 502, 44 S. E. 77, and Harzburg v. Ry. Co., 65 S. C. 539, 44 S. E. 75, the owners were not passengers, but the trunks were filled with samples, and checked by traveling salesmen, who were merely the agents of plaintiffs. The actions were brought by the owners, and the railroad company was held in both cases to the full liability of common carriers. As the defendant's liability was the same as if the plaintiff himself had been a passenger, there was no error in charging the propositions of law quoted in the seventh and eighth exceptions. This seems the reasonable and just view. It is supported by Curtis v. R. Co. (N. Y.) 30 Am. Rep. 271, and Richardson v. R. Co. (Ala.) 5 South. 308, 2 L. R. A. 716, and we have not been able to find any authority to the contrary.

Associate Justice JONES concurs in this opinion that all the exceptions should be overruled; the CHIEF JUSTICE holds in his opinion that all the exceptions should be overruled except the ninth; and Associate Justice GARY holds in his opinion that all the exceptions should be overruled except the seventh and eighth. The result is that all the exceptions are overruled by a majority of this court, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

MORRIS v. SPARTANBURG RY., GAS & ELECTRIC CO.

ABATEMENT—ACTION FOR WRONGFUL DEATH.

1. An action under Civ. Code 1902, §§ 2851, 2852, brought by an administrator of a son for his wrongful death, for the alleged benefit of his father and brothers and sisters, does not abate on the death of the father, though he was sole beneficiary under the statute when the action was commenced, and on the death of the father the action may be carried on for the benefit of whoever may be entitled to participate in the recovery.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Jackson B. Morris, administrator of William S. Morris, against the Spartanburg Railway, Gas & Electric Company. From an order refusing a motion to declare action abated, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. Stanyarne Wilson and C. P. Sims, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff, as administrator of William S. Morris, deceased, brought this action against defendant company for damages for wrongfully and negligently causing the death of his intestate by running its railway car over him near Glendale Factory, on its line between Spartanburg, S. C., and Clinton, S. C., in May, 1902. The action was brought under sections 2851, 2852, et seq., Civ. Code 1902, vol. 1, and the complaint, inter alia, alleged: "That said deceased left as his only heirs at law and distributees his father, Wm. Simpson Morris, his brother, Jackson B. Morris, and his sisters, Frances Crocker and Tallulah Burdett, for whose benefit this action is brought." Before the case was called for trial, the father, Wm. Simpson Morris, died, and thereupon defendant gave notice of motion to strike from the paragraph of the complaint above quoted the words, "his brother, Jackson B. Morris, and his sisters, Frances Crocker and Tallulah Burdett," on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action in their favor, and also gave notice of motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the action had abated by the death of William Simpson Morris, the father, the sole person who was beneficiary at the death of intestate or commencement of the action. The motion was refused by Judge Buchanan, and this appeal from such refusal presents the question whether the death of the father, after the commencement of the suit, abated the action.

Section 2851 provides: "Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of another, and the act, neglect or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person or corporation who would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as make the killing in law a felony."

Section 2852 provides: "Every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife or husband and child or children of the person whose death shall have been so caused; and if there be no such wife or husband, or child or children, then, for the benefit of the parent or parents; and if there be none such, then for the benefit of the heirs at law or the distributees of the person whose death shall have been caused, as may be dependent on him for support, and shall be brought by or in the name of the executor or administrator of such person; and in every such action the jury may give such damages, including exemplary damages, where such wrongful act, neglect or default was the result of recklessness, wilfulness or malice as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties, respectively, for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought. And the amount so recovered shall be divided among the before-mentioned parties in such shares as they would have been entitled to if the deceased had died intestate and the amount recovered had been personal assets of his or her estate."

The statute is remedial, and should be liberally construed, so as to accomplish its object. It was designed to remove the common-law rule, founded on the maxim, "Actio personalis moritur cum persona," as an obstacle to the recovery of damages for death of a party by a wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, and to create a right of action in the administrator of the deceased for the benefit of the persons named in the statute. In re Estate Mayo, 60 S. C. 401, 415, 38 S. E. 634, 54 L. R. A. 660. The award of damages for the wrongful death is the important matter; the manner of distribution is of secondary consideration. We think it would be too narrow a construction of the statute to hold that an action thereunder could abate as long as any beneficiary person or class named in the statute existed. In this case, while it is true that the father would have been sole beneficiary in the event of his being alive at the time of recovery of damages, still the statute had other beneficiaries in contemplation in the event of his death. The brothers and sisters of the deceased named in the complaint are his heirs at law, and, since they fall within the class of beneficiaries, while the action is still pending, the action should not abate for want of a statutory beneficiary. Under the statute the action must be prosecuted in the name of deceased administrator, and he is living to carry on the action for the benefit of whoever may be entitled to participate in the distribution of such recovery as may be had.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

L. T. MADDEN & CO. v. PHOENIX ASSURANCE CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 30, 1904.)

INSURANCE—WAIVER OF PROOFS—IRON-SAFE CLAUSE—OTHER INSURANCE—PLEADING—DEFENSE—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action on an insurance policy, where there was evidence that at the request of the insured an agent of the insurer came to the scene and informed insurer that the matter would be adjusted, and the adjuster refused to assist in making up proofs of loss according to the promise of the insurer, and the proofs executed were found defective by the insurer, and liability was denied because the policy was void, as to whether proofs of loss were waived was for the jury.

2. Where at the time of making an application for insurance the insured showed an inventory of the goods to the agent of the insurer, who said it was all right, the insurer thereby waived the right to insist that the inventory did not conform to the iron-safe clause of the policy.

3. Where there was some evidence that the books and inventory were kept in a fireproof safe, and were produced for the inspection of the company after the loss, the question of compliance with the iron-safe clause is for the jury.

4. An agent of an insurance company issued a policy having knowledge that another company, of which he was also agent, had a policy on the same goods, issued by his predecessor. Held, that his knowledge would be imputed to the latter company, and on its failure to cancel the policy tended to show waiver of a provision prohibiting other insurance.

5. In an action on an insurance policy, where defendant claimed that plaintiff in his application made false statements as to when the inventory of the stock had been taken, testimony was competent to show good faith on the part of plaintiff, and that misstatement as to the date was a mistake.

6. Where in an action on a policy, plaintiff alleges ownership of the property destroyed in himself, the insurance company under general denial may prove ownership in another.

7. In an action on an insurance policy, under general denial of allegation that the fire did not happen through the fault or negligence of plaintiff defendant may show that plaintiff burned his own property.

8. Error in admitting immaterial evidence is not ground for reversal.

9. A salesman who has had experience in merchandising and has inspected a stock of goods is qualified to testify as to its value.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County.

Action by L. T. Madden & Co. against the Phoenix Assurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Johnson & Nash and W. R. Richey, for appellants. Ferguson & Featherstone and King, Spalding & Little, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for the recovery of $1,200 on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant to the plaintiffs 1st September, 1904, on their stock of goods at Cross Hill, S. C., which was destroyed by fire on the 12th day of June, 1902. The defendant answered the complaint, denying the material allegations thereof, and interposing the following defense: "That the plaintiffs violated the terms and conditions set forth in the policy of insurance in the following particulars: (1) That they failed to keep and furnish the defendant the inventories and books provided for in said policy, and to keep the same in an iron safe or other safe place, as therein provided. (2) That they took out other and further insurance on the stock of goods covered and other property covered by their contract with the defendant without defendant's consent, thereby making the contract with defendant null and void. (3) And, further, that at the time defendant's policy was issued the plaintiffs had other insurance on their stock of goods, of which fact they failed to notify defendant. (4) That the plaintiffs, in their application for insurance, made sundry false representations as to value of stock on hand when the inventory had been taken, other insurance thereon, and as to fires previously had by them, thereby rendering the policy issued to them by defendant null and void." After all the testimony for both sides in this case had been taken, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to write a verdict for the defendant on the following grounds: (1) Because, under the proof of this case, the undisputed proof has been a failure to furnish such proof of loss as the law required by the written contract of the insurance policy, which was before the court. (2) There has been a total breach of what is known as the 'iron-safe clause' before the court. (3) There is in existence other insurance without notice within contemplation of the policy." After argument the court ruled as follows: "I am satisfied the case is fatal on all three grounds, and I will have to instruct a verdict for the defendant"—which he did. The plaintiffs appealed, assigning errors on the part of his honor the circuit judge in directing a verdict, and on other grounds set forth in the exceptions.

We proceed to the consideration of those exceptions assigning error in directing a verdict on the first ground mentioned. There was testimony introduced to establish the following facts: Immediately after the fire the plaintiff wrote to J. W. Spence, the agent of the defendant, giving him notice of the fire, and requesting him to come to Cross Hill. The plaintiffs had policies of insurance on their stock of goods in two companies. J. W. Spence came, and in the course of conversation said to P. H. Madden that he would have the whole matter adjusted; that he need not put himself to any trouble; that he would ask the agent of the other company to let one man adjust the loss under both policies. Spence told the plaintiffs to write to L. R. Warren at Richmond, Va., who was the adjusting agent of the company. On the 11th of July, 1902, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant as follows: "Cross Hill, S. C., July 11, 1902. Phoenix Assurance Company—Gents: We send you statement what was lost on June 12th, 1902, on Policy No. 5625260. We had on September the 1, 1901, date of policy, amount of goods $2,629.47; bought since $1,800.49. We lost $2,380.85. This is correct. Yours truly, L. T. Madden & Co. P. S. How the fire started is not known." The letter was sworn to before a notary public. On the 6th of August, 1902, the plaintiffs wrote to L. R. Warren, and likewise to the company, stating that they had not heard from the defendant, and requesting a reply. On the 14th of August, 1902, the plaintiffs wrote a letter to L. R. Warren, the adjusting agent, giving the same information in the same words as was contained in their letter of July 11, 1902, and stating that the Piedmont Insurance Company had a policy for $500 on the same property. Neither Warren nor the company replied until the 11th August, 1902. Wrote to the assured on the 27th of August, 1902, declining to receive the papers as proofs of loss, and stating the defects therein as such. They expressly advised the plaintiffs that the company waived none of its rights. This letter was inclosed with one dated 28th of August, 1902, stating that Warren would request F. M. Butt, of Augusta, Ga., to visit Cross Hill, and investigate the loss, and would suggest to him to show the plaintiffs how to fill up and execute the proofs of loss, if they so desired, but that this would be done only to facilitate them, and without waiver of any of the company's rights; that the sole authority of F. M. Butt was to investigate and report, but that any proposition made through F. M. Butt would be considered. F. M. Butt went to Cross Hill, but refused to render the plaintiffs any assistance in the preparation of the proofs of loss, and said to them that the insurance policy was null and void from the date it was issued. There was other correspondence, which we do not deem it necessary to reproduce.

Let us see to what extent the acts and declarations of J. W. Spence and F. M. Butt, the company's agents, were binding upon it. Section 1810 of the Code of Laws (Civ. Code 1902) is as follows: "Sec. 1810. Any person who solicits insurance in behalf of any insurance company not organized under or incorporated by the laws of the state, or who takes or transmits other than for himself any application for insurance, or any policy of insurance to or from such company, or who advertises or otherwise gives notice that he will receive or transmit the same, or who shall receive or deliver a policy of insurance of any such company, or who shall examine and inspect any risk, or receive, collect or transmit any premium of insurance, or make or forward any diagram of any building or buildings, or do or perform any other act or thing in the making or the consummating of any contract of insurance for or with any such company other than for himself, or who shall examine into and adjust or aid in adjusting any loss for or in behalf of any such insurance company, whether any such acts shall be done at the instance or request or by the employment of such insurance company, shall be held to be acting as the agent of the company for which this act is done or the risk is taken." This section was construed in the case of Norris v. Ins. Co., 57 S. C. 358, 365, 35 S. E. 572, 574. In that case the insurance company contended that Smith was not its agent, as far as the plaintiff was concerned. The court said: "But we are not prepared to take such subtle views of the matter of agency. These corporations act through agents. There is nothing in the policy issued by this insurance company which names any agent as such who can bind the company. This insurance company must remember that its contracts made within our state limits under our statute are taken with section 1481 (now 1810), hereinbefore quoted, as a part of such contracts, and that this section 1481 does not, in its use of the word 'agent,' place any limitations upon his powers so as to deprive any one who deals with such agent with respect to a contract of insurance made by such a one with the agent's insurance company as to the principle of the right to impute knowledge of such agent to the knowledge of the principal." When a person does any of the acts enumerated in section 1810 of the Code of Laws, the presumption is that he was the agent of the insurance company, but such presumption is subject to rebuttal. This principle does not infringe upon the doctrine announced in Young v. Ins. Co., 68 S. C. 387, 47 S. E. 681. Our conclusion is that the acts and declarations of the agents, J. W. Spence and F. M. Butt, were prima facie binding upon the defendant, and that they furnished evidence of waiver on the part of the defendant to insist upon its right to require compliance with the terms of the policy as to proofs of loss, especially when F. M. Butt refused to assist in the preparation of the proofs of loss, and declared that the policy was null and void from the time it was issued. These facts tended to show a denial of liability on the part of the defendant, and that it intended to rely upon the fact of forfeiture of the policy by the plaintiffs as a ground for refusing payment. In the case of Dial v. Life Association, 29 S. C. 560, 579, 8 S. E. 27, 38, the court uses this language: "The case of Knickerbocker Life Insurance Company v. Pendleton, 112 U. S. 696, 5 Sup. Ct. 314, 28 L. Ed. 886, with the authorities therein cited, shows conclusively that a distinct refusal to pay and a denial of liability upon the ground that the policy had lapsed and was forfeited is a waiver of the condition precedent requiring proof of death; and this doctrine seems to have been recognized in this state in Neve v. Charleston Insurance & Trust Company, 2 McMull. 237; Madsden v. Phoenix Fire Insurance Company, 1 S. C. 24. When, therefore, the company was notified of the death of Dial, and the necessary blank forms to make out proof of death were applied for, and refused upon the ground that the policy had been forfeited, this was a waiver of the required proof, or at least was sufficient evidence of such waiver as rendered it necessary to submit the question to the jury." This principle is applicable to fire as well as life insurance policies. Pelzer Mfg. Co. v. Sun Fire Office, 36 S. C. 213, 15 S. E. 562; Stickley v. Ins. Co., 37 S. C. 56, 16 S. E. 280. It was error, therefore, not to submit the question of waiver to the jury.

We will next consider whether his honor the presiding judge erred in directing a verdict on the ground that there was a total breach of what is known as the "iron-safe clause" of the policy. That clause is as follows: "1st. The assured will take a complete itemized inventory of stock on hand at least once in each calendar year, and unless such inventory has been taken within twelve calendar months prior to the date of this policy, one shall be taken in detail within thirty days of issuance of this policy, or this policy shall be null and void from such date, and upon demand of the assured the unearned premium from such date shall be returned. 2d. The assured will keep a set of books which shall clearly and plainly present a complete record of business transacted, including all purchases, sales and shipments, both for cash and credit, from date of inventory, as provided for in first section of this clause and during the continuance of the policy. 3d. The assured will keep such books and inventory and also the last preceding inventory, if such has been taken, securely locked in a fire-proof safe at night and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy is not actually open for business, or failing in this, the assured will keep such books and inventories in some place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the aforesaid building. In the event of failure to produce such set of books and inventories for this inspection of this company, this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon." The sections of this clause will be considered in their regular order.

First section. The testimony shows that the plaintiffs made an inventory of their stock of goods, which was completed on the 25th of August, 1901, and that they exhibited the inventory to the defendant's agent when they made application for policy of insurance; that the agent raised no objection to it, but, on the contrary, said it was all right. The case of Pelzer Manufacturing Co. v. Sun Fire Office shows conclusively that the defendant waived the right to insist upon the objection that it did not conform to the requirements of the policy.

Second section. The plaintiffs introduced in evidence the invoices of goods bought between 25th August, 1901, and 12th June, 1902, amounting to $1,800.46. They also offered in evidence their cashbook, showing cash sales from 25th August, 1901, to 12th June, 1902, amounting to $1,910.96. The following is a sample page of the cashbook set out in the record: "Cash sales for September, 1901.—2d, $1.00; 3d, $1.00; 4th, $1.10; 5th, $1.80; 6th, $1.25; 7th, $1.50; 8th, $1.00; 10th, $1.25; 11th, $1.50; 12th, $1.30; 13th, $1.00; 14th, $1.50; 16th, $1.25; 17th, $1.00; 18th, $1.00; 19th, $1.25; 20th, $1.50; 21st, $1.25; 23d, $1.40; 24th, $1.10; 25th, $1.00; 26th, $1.15; 27th, $1.10—total, $28.20." They also offered in evidence their credit sales book, showing credit sales up to 12th June, 1902, amounting to some $300 or $400, the amount of which was included in the cash sales. This afforded at least some evidence of a compliance with the requirements of the policy, and presented a question for the jury to determine as to its force and effect. If there is any evidence whatever tending to establish a fact, the judges cannot determine its sufficiency, but it must be submitted to the jury. In volume "b" of Starkie on Evidence it is said: "It has been frequently doubted whether a particular question be one of law or fact. Thus far it is clear that whenever, upon particular facts found, the court, by the implication of any rules of law, can pronounce of their legal effect with reference to the allegations on the record, such inference is matter of law. It is also clear that whenever the court cannot pronounce on the legal effect of particular facts, and when it is requisite to enable them to do so, that the jury should find some other inferences or conclusions, such further inferences or conclusions are questions of fact." In the case of Glover v. Gasque, 67 S. C. 13, 34, 45 S. E. 113, 119, the court, after quoting the language thus mentioned, proceeds as follows: "It is unquestionably the duty of the court in construing a written instrument, to interpret its language, and it may also state the effect thereof, where it is susceptible of but one inference; but where the inference to be drawn from the facts stated in the instrument is in dispute, and such facts susceptible of more than one inference, then the question must be determined by the jury, especially when the inference to be drawn is dependent upon other facts in the case." See, also, Thompson v. Protective Union, 66 S. C. 459, 45 S. E. 19. The burden of proof rested upon the defendant to show that the policy was forfeited, and when the circuit judge decided that the testimony was sufficient to establish that fact, he invaded the province of the jury, it being susceptible of more than one inference. Roach v. Security Fund Co., 28 S. C. 431, 6 S. E. 286; Kingman v. Ins. Co., 54 S. C. 599, 32 S. E. 762.

Third section. There was testimony to the effect that the books and inventory were kept in a fireproof safe. There was also testimony that the books and inventory were produced for the inspection of the company.

The next question for consideration is whether there was error in directing a verdict on the ground that there was in evidence other insurance without notice, in contemplation of the policy. In the application of the policy of insurance in this case is the following question: "Is there now other insurance on said property? (If there is, state (1) how much; and (2) in what company or companies.)" To which the plaintiffs answered, "Yes, $500 on stock expired February, 1902." The policy provides that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void, if the insured now has or shall hereafter make or procure any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy." When the policy for $500 expired in February, 1902, it was not renewed. In January, 1902, the plaintiffs wrote a postal card to S. E. Miller, who was the defendant's agent when the policy in suit was issued. As J. S. Spence had succeeded him as agent of the defendant, he wrote to the plaintiffs as follows on the 30th of January, 1902: "Your postal to Mr. S. E. Miller in regard to insurance received, and as he has sold his fire insurance business to me, he referred it to me. I shall be glad to take the matter up with you on the terms named to Mr. Miller, namely: payment of $20 now and balance in a short while. You will please send me to-morrow the old policy of Simpson & Miller, so that I can see the exact amount and circumstances in the matter. Trusting to hear from you at once and I will write the policy and send it to you at once." The policy was issued in another company for $600, but was canceled on the 12th of February, 1902, because that insurance company objected. J. W. Spence testified that he would have canceled, also, the policy now in litigation, but was informed by the plaintiffs that they had bought their spring stock, and expected likewise to have a car load of corn in a few days. To the question, "As a matter of fact, you were agent of this company, and let that $1,200 policy stand?" he answered, "Yes." The defendant introduced in evidence a policy of insurance issued by the Piedmont Mutual Insurance Company for $500 on the 30th of April, 1902, to L. T. Madden & Co., covering their stock of goods at Cross Hill, and it was of force at the time their stock of goods was burned. J. W. Spence testified that he did not have knowledge of this policy. It may be said that J. W. Spence permitted other insurance on the property when he himself insured the property in another company, although he knew that the policy in dispute was then of force. In 7 Enc. of Law (1st Ed.) 1017, it is said: "But knowledge of other insurance on the part of a general agent as a local agent authorized to write policies for the company and transact its business generally in his locality is treated as the knowledge of his company, and it has been held that his waiver of notice of other insurance—as by the receipt of renewal premiums after he has knowledge of other insurance on the premises—is binding on the company, although the policy provides that no consideration can be waived except in writing by the secretary, and that any person other than the assured who may have procured this insurance to be taken by this company shall be deemed to be the agent of the assured named in this policy and not of this company, under any circumstances whatever, or in any transaction relating to this insurance." When J. W. Spence, the agent of the defendant, insured the plaintiffs, and in another company, his knowledge that there was other insurance is imputed to the defendant. Norris v. Ins. Co., supra. And its failure to cancel the policy and return the premium of insurance after such knowledge was a circumstance tending to show waiver of the right to insist upon the provision of the policy prohibiting other insurance. The burden of proof rested upon the defendant to show that the policy was forfeited, and when the circuit judge decided that the evidence was sufficient to establish that fact he invaded the province of the jury, the testimony being susceptible of more than one inference.

The sixth exception is as follows: "(6) Because the court erred in not allowing P. H. Madden to testify as to a mistake that was written in the application as to the date his inventory was taken, it not being an effort to vary the terms of the paper, but to correct an error." The defendant, in its answer, alleged that the plaintiffs in their application for insurance made false statements as to when the inventory had been taken. The testimony was competent, not only for the purpose of showing good faith on the part of the plaintiffs, but likewise to establish the fact that the defendant had notice of the true facts before issuing the policy. The court is not confined to the exercise of its chancery powers in administering relief from mistakes. The doctrine is thus stated in Moore v. Edwards' Ex'rs, 1 Bailey, 23 (approved in Hodges v. Kohn, 67 S. C. 69-72, 45 S. E. 102, 103): "Accidents and mistakes certainly constitute one branch of equity jurisdiction; but it is not peculiar except when a discovery is indispensable, or the nature of the relief such as to require the extraordinary aid of chancery. Actions at law to recover back money paid by mistake constitute in all the books of practice a conspicuous class of causes for which the action of assumpsit may be maintained at law; and there is no question that in general, when the facts can be proved according to the rules of the common law, and the remedy is such as a court of law can administer consistently with the prescribed modes of proceeding, mistakes may be inquired into in a court of law. In the case under consideration the plaintiff sued out a sci. fa. to revive a judgment against the defendant, and as evidence of payment the defendant procures an execution on which is indorsed the word 'Satisfied.' The plaintiff replies it was so indorsed by mistake. There is nothing magical in the term itself. The evidence offered was admissible according to the rules of the common law. The relief was such as a court of common law was competent to give, and the court therefore clearly had jurisdiction."

The seventh exception is as follows: "(7) Because the court erred in allowing testimony as to the ownership of the burned property when they had not specially denied it, it being submitted that the defendant must deny specially that plaintiffs did not own the goods before it can assail their ownership." The complaint alleges that at the time of making said insurance and until the fire they were the owners of the property insured. The testimony was responsive to this allegation, and was therefore competent. Latimer v. Cotton Mills, 66 S. C. 135, 44 S. E. 559.

The eighth exception is as follows: "(8) Because the court erred in allowing testimony as to a scuttle hole in the store, and other matters tending to show, and for the purpose of showing, that Madden burned his own store, when the defendant had not pleaded any such defense." The complaint alleges that the fire did not happen by any negligence or by any fault of the plaintiffs. This exception is disposed of by what was said in considering the seventh exception.

The ninth exception is as follows: "(9) Because the court erred in allowing the witness E. B. Raser to answer the question, 'Might or not a man who is familiar with that class of goods form a pretty accurate idea?' it being suggested that this calls for a mere opinion about which the witness may have no right to have an opinion; especially to express it." This was an immaterial question, and was in no wise prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiffs.

The tenth exception is as follows: "(10) Because the court erred in allowing the question by defendant's attorney to B. B. Goodman, 'Empty shoe boxes would not amount up very fast, would they?' It is suggested that this is a leading question, and presumed the fact that there were empty shoe boxes." This exception is disposed of by what was said in considering the ninth exception.

The eleventh exception is as follows: "(11) Because the court erred in holding and ruling that a witness may give his opinion about the value of a stock of goods, whether he knows anything about it or not." The testimony showed that the witness had experience in merchandising, and had likewise sold goods as a salesman, and that he had inspected the stock of goods insured. Under these circumstances the testimony was admissible. In 1 Elliott on Evidence, § 685, the rule is thus stated: "Witnesses who are not strictly experts, as well as expert witnesses, may testify as to the value of the property, real or personal, or as to the value of services in a proper case. They must, however, have some knowledge on which to base their opinion. If they have such knowledge, the fact that it is slight will go to the weight of their testimony, rather than to its competency; but, if they are not acquainted with, or have no knowledge of, the matter in question, so that their opinion can in no way aid the jury, the court should refuse to permit them to give an opinion which would necessarily be a mere guess of conjecture." See, also, sections 671, 672, 675, and 686.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

STATE ex rel. KIRVEN v. SCARBOROUGH.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 30, 1904.)

VENUE—MANDAMUS—CONTEMPT—JURISDICTION.

1. Under Gen. St. 1882, § 2344, providing that if any issue shall be joined in mandamus the person suing such writ shall try the same in such place as a civil action might be tried in, the circuit judge has no jurisdiction of a proceeding in mandamus in any other county than the one in which the defendant resides.

2. The disobedience of an order made by the judge without jurisdiction is not contempt.

Application by the state, on the relation of J. K. Kirven, against R. J. Scarborough.

From an order granting the same, respondent appeals. Reversed.

Spears & Dennis, for appellant. Coggeshall & Edwards, for respondent.

JONES, J. On December 24, 1903, John Floyd, a magistrate for Darlington county, on the affidavit of T. Z. Odom, issued a warrant against J. K. Kirven for larceny of a mule, valued at $150; and at the same time issued a search warrant directing R. J. Scarborough, as special constable, to search the premises of J. K. Kirven, take possession of said mule, and keep the same to be disposed of according to law. The case having been transferred to Magistrate H. E. P. Sanders, he conducted the preliminary examination, and found that the prosecutor had utterly failed to produce any proof that the said John K. Kirven was guilty of the charge of larceny, or that the property seized under the said search warrant was stolen property; but, on the contrary, it appeared that the said property had been wrongfully taken from the possession of the said John K. Kirven. He accordingly dismissed the case, and ordered Scarborough to restore the property to the possession of Kirven. Upon failure or refusal of Scarborough to obey the order of Magistrate Sanders, Judge Watts at chambers issued an alternative writ of mandamus, commanding Scarborough to deliver the mule, as required by the order of Magistrate Sanders, or show cause at Cheraw, S. C., why he did not obey said order. Scarborough made return, among other matters, claiming that it was a matter of physical impossibility for him to comply with the order of the magistrate or the writ of mandamus, as the property was no longer in his custody or control, but had been turned over to the prosecutor, T. Z. Odom, under the order of the magistrate who issued the papers. Judge Watts held the return insufficient, and issued a peremptory writ of mandamus, January 18, 1904, commanding Scarborough to forthwith deliver the property to Kirven. From this order Scarborough gave due notice of appeal, making the point, among others, that Judge Watts had no authority to make the alternative writ of mandamus returnable at chambers, and to hear and determine the issues therein involved out of the county in which respondent resides. Scarborough resides in Darlington county, and the issues were heard and determined by Judge Watts at his chambers in Cheraw, S. C., in Chesterfield county.

Scarborough having failed or refused to turn over the mule as directed, Judge Watts, on January 22, 1904, issued an order requiring Scarborough to show cause before him at his chambers in Cheraw why he should not be adjudged in contempt of court. To this Scarborough made return that it was impossible for him to obey the order of the magistrate or the writ of mandamus; that he had turned the mule over to Odom, as ordered by Magistrate Floyd; that Odom had turned it over to W. B. Brunson, the man from whom he had purchased it; that Brunson had turned it over to N. R. Harrell, a partner of John K. Kirven, in the firm of Harrell & Kirven, who claimed to be the owner of the mule; that demand had been made upon Harrell for the mule, and that Harrell had informed him that he had disposed of it; that he (Scarborough) had made diligent inquiry as to the whereabouts of the property without being able to find it; that he intended no disrespect to the orders of the court, and would willingly comply if possible. A counter affidavit by Magistrate Floyd was submitted, to the effect that Scarborough did not apply to him, either before or after the case was heard by Magistrate Sanders, for direction as to what disposition to make of the mule.

On February 2, 1904, Judge Watts, at his chambers, Cheraw, S. C., made an order adjudging Scarborough in contempt, for refusing to obey the peremptory writ requiring him to deliver the mule to Kirven, the order concluding as follows: "It is therefore ordered that the said R. J. Scarborough do within ten days from the date hereof turn over to the said John K. Kirven the said dark brown mule, as required by the order of this court of date January 18, 1904; and that in case he fails so to do within the aforesaid period of ten days he do pay to the clerk of the court of Darlington county, in the state aforesaid, a fine of $150, to be held by the said clerk of court subject to the further order of this court. It is further ordered that in case the said R. J. Scarborough shall fail to pay the said fine of $150 within the said period of ten days and two days thereafter, to wit, within twelve days from the date hereof, the said R. J. Scarborough be committed to the common jail of Darlington county, in the state aforesaid, and there kept in close confinement without bail for the term of sixty days."

From this order R. J. Scarborough appeals upon the following exceptions: "(1) His honor should have held that the return of the respondent to the aforesaid rule to show cause why he should not be adjudged in contempt showed conclusively the actual inability and impossibility for the respondent to perform the conditions of the said order before the issuance of the same or of any proceeding connected therewith, and that the said inability was not caused or brought about by any negligence or default on the part of the respondent, and that he did not willfully defy the court or its authority, and had exhausted every means and made every effort to obey the said order, and it was error and abuse of discretion not so to hold. (2) His honor should have held that the notice of intention to appeal to the Supreme Court from the peremptory writ having been served, and such service made known to the court, the court could not proceed to adjudge the respondent in contempt for failure to obey said order pending appeal from the said order, and it was error not so to hold. (3) His honor should have granted respondent's motion to quash and dismiss the peremptory writ, upon which the contempt proceedings were based, for irregularities and want of jurisdiction apparent upon the face of the proceedings, in that (a) the court had no power or authority to make the writ returnable at chambers, and to hear and determine the issues therein involved outside of the county wherein the respondent resided; (b) inadequacy of legal remedy was not shown, or any facts from which it could be inferred; (c) no special interest in the property was alleged, which gave the relator a legal or equitable right to the writ or to entitle him to the relief sought; (d) no facts alleged from which it can be inferred the respondent had the ability to comply, and it was error not so to hold. (4) His honor should have held that the affidavit upon which the contempt proceedings were based was insufficient, in that (a) it did not allege respondent's ability to comply, nor a willful disobedience of the order of the court; (b) a refusal to obey with ability to do so; (c) nor did it allege any willful negligence or default on the part of the respondent, and it was error and abuse of discretion not so to hold. (5) His honor should have held that he had no power or authority to punish for a contempt in the case at his chambers, in that the acts complained of, which, in the judgment of the circuit judge, constituted a contempt of his court, occurred before the circuit judge acquired jurisdiction over respondent or of the subject-matter of the proceedings, and arose out of a criminal case; and he erred in not so holding. (6) It appearing by respondent's return that there were other parties other than relator and respondent directly interested in the question involved, claiming the property which respondent was ordered to turn over to the relator, all parties should have been remitted to an action at law and the proceedings dismissed, and it was error for his honor, the circuit judge, not so to hold."

The disobedience of an order made by a court or judge without jurisdiction is not a contempt. State v. Nathans, 49 S. C. 200, 27 S. E. 52. If, therefore, Judge Watts had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the issues raised by the return of the writ of mandamus, the failure or refusal of Scarborough to obey his order thereon does not constitute a contempt. The writer of this opinion, in the opinion prepared by him in the case of La Motte v. Smith, 50 S. C. 558, 562, 27 S. E. 933, 934, used the following language: "Proceedings in mandamus are triable in the county where the respondent resides. It is true that sections 145 and 146 of the Code of Procedure, relating to the place of trial of civil actions, do not directly apply to proceedings in mandamus; since section 452 of the Code provides that, 'until the Legislature shall otherwise provide, the second part of this Code of Procedure shall not affect proceedings by mandamus or prohibition.' But in section 2344, Gen. St. 1882 (section 2459, Rev. St. 1893), it is provided: 'If any issues shall be joined on such proceedings (mandamus), the person or persons suing such writ shall and may try the same in such places as a civil action might or should have been tried,' etc. So that whether we may look to the Code of Procedure to ascertain the meaning of 'a civil action,' or whether it means 'action on the case,' under the practice before the Code, as said in State v. Treasurer, in 10 S. C. 40, an issue in mandamus proceedings should be tried where the respondent resides."

This we regard a correct statement of the law. It must follow that Judge Watts had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the issues in the mandamus proceedings in a county other than that in which the respondent in such proceedings resided. It does not appear that any objection was made to the jurisdiction of Judge Watts on the hearing of the return to the writ of mandamus, but it has been determined that a question of jurisdiction may be first raised in this court. Ware v. Henderson, 25 S. C. 385; Bell v. Fludd, 28 S. C. 313, 5 S. E. 810.

Furthermore, this was a proceeding in criminal contempt, and in the case of State v. Nathans, supra, this court held that a judge at chambers has no jurisdiction to pass judgment or sentence for criminal contempt, except such as may be committed in the immediate presence of the court.

Those views necessarily work a reversal of the judgment appealed from, and it is deemed improper to further consider the exceptions. The order adjudging appellant in contempt is therefore set aside for want of jurisdiction.

WALKER v. CASSELS et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1904.)

SAWYER'S LIEN—WAIVER—LIMITATIONS—PAYMENTS—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. A sawyer has a lien on lumber sawed for the sawing so long as he retains possession thereof.

2. Where the sawing of certain lumber had been completed, and the sawyers had left the ground without leaving any agent in charge, and plaintiff stacked the lumber, and used some of it, and sold a considerable portion of it, he was in possession, and any lien of the sawyers was waived.

3. A payment on a note, made by the direction of the maker, was sufficient to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 623.]

4. Whether a judgment was entered in conformity to the decree in the case cannot be first questioned on appeal.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chester County; Townsend, Judge.

Action by W. N. Walker against W. W. Cassels and J. L. Saunders. From the decree, defendant Cassels appeals. Modified.

The special referee made the following finding and conclusions, among others: "Third. What damages has the plaintiff proven against the defendant Cassels on account of his attempted seizure and sale of the lumber under his supposed sawyer's lien? Under the contract for sawing the defendants were bailees of the logs and lumber, and by the common law, I think, had a claim or lien on the logs and lumber committed to them for their bill for sawing, so long as they retained actual possession; but, if they surrendered possession to the plaintiff or other party, this special claim or lien was waived and gone. Edwards on Bailments, §§ 420-424. No stress was laid by either side on the point as to who was in possession on the 26th of October, 1901, when Cassels put up his notices and advertised the lumber for sale. But the tendency of the testimony is to show that plaintiff was in possession. The sawing had been completed, and the sawyers, so far as I gather from the evidence, had left the ground, and no claim is made that they left any agent in charge. Plaintiff had stacked the lumber, used some of it, and sold a considerable portion of it, and it was on his own ground. So I must conclude he was in possession, and any lien the defendants may have once been entitled to was waived."

Henry & McLure, for appellant. Caldwell & Gaston, for appellee.

GARY, A. J. This action arises out of a contract between the parties to this suit for the sawing of a large quantity of lumber for the plaintiff, and an attempt on the part of the defendants to sell said lumber under an alleged sawyer's lien to pay for the sawing. The plaintiff also alleges a balance due by the defendant Cassels on a note as an offset to the sum due for the sawing. The complaint also prayed for an injunction, which was granted. The defendant Cassels appealed from the judgment of the circuit court.

The first question presented by the exceptions is whether his honor the circuit judge erred in his finding as to the price agreed upon for the sawing of the lumber. The finding of the special referee was sustained by the circuit judge, and it has not been made to appear to us that the preponderance of the testimony is against such finding.

The next question for consideration is whether the circuit court erred in its ruling that the defendants did not have a lien on the lumber for sawing at the time of the attempted seizure thereof. The report of the special referee as to this issue was sustained by the circuit court. The reasons assigned by the special referee for concluding that there was not a lien at the time mentioned are satisfactory to this court.

The next assignment of error is on the ground that the circuit judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages to the amount of $50 by reason of the unlawful seizure of the lumber by the defendant Cassels. The special referee found that the plaintiff was only entitled to damages amounting to $5. The circuit judge erred in overruling the report of the special referee upon this issue. The reasons assigned by the special referee are satisfactory to this court. It was the fact that the lumber had been delivered to the plaintiff that destroyed the defendant's lien for the sawing. The injury to the lumber took place after the delivery; therefore the defendants were not responsible therefor. Doxier v. Johnston, 2 Hill, 297.

The next question is whether there was error in holding that the note executed by Cassels was not barred by the statute of limitations. The payment on the note was made by the direction of Cassels, and this necessarily prevented the bar of the statute.

The last question is whether the judgment was entered in conformity with the decree. The circuit court has not ruled upon this question, and it cannot be made in the first instance in this court.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, except in the particular hereinbefore mentioned, and that it be modified in that respect.

SUTTON v. CATAWBA POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1904.)

COMPLAINT—AMENDMENT—NEW TRIAL.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 194, giving large powers of amendment, the exercise of such powers by the allowance of an amendment of complaint after verdict and new trial ordered will not be disturbed, where the amendment was material to the case, which had been defectively stated, and did not substantially change the cause of action.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Townsend, Judge.

Action by A. E. Sutton against the Catawba Power Company. From an order permitting plaintiff to amend his complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wilson & Wilson, for appellant. Jas. F. Hart, for appellee.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from an order of Judge Townsend allowing the complaint to be amended after a new trial ordered by Judge Dantzler. The original complaint relevant to the amendatory matter was as follows:

"(3) That on and before the 18th day of April, 1901, the defendant herein began the construction of a dam from the east bank of Catawba river, about three hundred yards above plaintiff's lands, for the purpose of impeding and storing the waters of said river; and also on the west side of said river, at a point a short distance below where the unfinished dam projected into the same, had built of stone and timber an extensive structure known as a 'cofferdam,' of a height of about thirty feet, which extended from the west bank of said river to and beyond the middle thereof one hundred and fifty feet.

"(4) That, owing to the wanton and negligent manner in which said cofferdam was constructed, and without due regard to the rights of plaintiff herein, the flood waters of said Catawba river were, on or about the said 18th day of April, 1901, and days following, thereby diverted from their proper channel by the obstructions aforesaid, and were turned with great force and in great volume upon and across the lands of plaintiff, tearing away protective embankments, tearing up and washing off the soil, and depositing sand and other worthless substances thereon, and rendering a large part of the same unfit for cultivation, and of no value whatever.

"(5) That by reason of said continued cofferdam obstruction in said river, which was subsequently, in the early summer of 1901, built and extended yet further into and across said river, the flood waters of said river thereafter continued to be diverted from their proper channel, and were driven over and across plaintiff's lands, tearing up and carrying away the soil of other portions of her said lands, and depositing other sand and worthless substances thereon, and rendering other large portions thereof unfit for cultivation or other use.

"(6) That said cofferdam obstruction of the height aforesaid is yet standing from the west bank into and partly across the said river, and is daily being extended further into and across the same. And plaintiff alleges that by reason of the natural embankments protecting her said lands from flood waters having been destroyed as herein alleged, and by reason of the continued diversion of said river from its natural course at seasons of flood, the remaining portions of her said lands will be destroyed and rendered valueless.

"(7) And plaintiff alleges that she has sustained injury and damage to the value of her said lands and the income and profits accruing therefrom by reason of the negligent and improper construction of the said dam and cofferdam, in disregard of her rights and of defendant's duty, to the amount of ten thousand dollars."

The complaint as amended reads as follows:

"(3) That prior to the 18th day of April, 1901 (as it was authorized by statute to do, subject to the provision that it should be liable for all damages caused by its so doing), the defendant herein began the construction of a dam across the said Catawba river from the east bank of the river about three hundred yards above plaintiff's lands, for the purpose of impeding and storing the waters of said river; and also to the west side of said river at a point a short distance below where the unfinished dam projected into the same, had built of stone and timber an extensive structure known as a 'cofferdam,' of a height of about thirty feet, which extended from the west bank of said river to and beyond the middle thereof one hundred and fifty feet.

"(4) That, owing to the construction of the said dam and cofferdam in the said navigable stream and to the wanton and negligent manner in which said dam and cofferdam were constructed, without due regard to the rights of plaintiff herein, the waters and flood waters of said Catawba river were, on or about the said 18th day of April, 1901, and days following, diverted from their proper channel by the obstructions aforesaid, and were turned with great force and in great volume upon and across the lands of plaintiff, tearing away protective embankments, tearing up and washing off the soil, and depositing sand and other worthless substances on the land, rendering a large part of the same unfit for cultivation, and of no value whatever.

"(5) That by reason of said continued cofferdam construction in said river, which was subsequently, in the early summer of 1901, built and extended yet further into and across said river, the flood waters of said river thereafter continued to be diverted from their proper channel, and were driven over and across plaintiff's said lands, tearing up and carrying away the soil of other portions of her said lands, and depositing other sand and worthless substance thereon, and rendering other large portions thereof unfit for cultivation or other use.

"(6) That said cofferdam obstruction of the height aforesaid is yet standing from the west bank into and partly across the said river, and is daily being extended further into and across the same. And plaintiff alleges that by reason of the natural embankments protecting her said lands from flood waters having been destroyed, as herein alleged, and by reason of the continued diversion of said river from its natural course at seasons of flood, the remaining portions of her said lands will be destroyed and rendered valueless.

"(7) And plaintiff alleges that she sustained injury and damage through the injury and damage to her said lands and the lessening of the income and profits accruing therefrom by reason (of the construction of the said dam and cofferdam), and the negligent and wanton manner of their construction, in disregard of her rights and of the defendant's duty, to the amount of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars."

In permitting the amendment the court said: "It is not intended by this order, nor is it the true meaning of the order, to add a third cause of action to the complaint, based upon the mere construction of the dam. The amendment is allowed for the purpose of stating more clearly the plaintiff's alleged causes of action for (1) constructing the dam and cofferdam without due regard to the rights of the plaintiff, and (2) constructing the dam and cofferdam in a negligent and wanton manner."

The question raised by the exceptions is whether the allowance of the amendment permitted plaintiff to insert a new cause of action. While the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 does not authorize the substitution of a new cause of action by way of amendment, yet section 194 gives very large powers of amendment, and the exercise of such powers will not be disturbed except for abuse of discretion. Ruberg v. Brown, 50 S. C. 397, 27 S. E. 873. The amendment proposed should be material to the case, which has been defectively stated, and must not substantially change the cause of action. Proctor v. Railway, 64 S. C. 49, 42 S. E. 427. We do not think that the amendment allowed amounts to the insertion of a distinctly new cause of action, but falls within the rule permitting amendments "by inserting other allegations material to the case."

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

FOSTER v. PHINIZY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

REOPENING DECREE—OBJECTIONS TO REMEDIES —WAIVER.

1. The facts disclosed by the record present a meritorious case for the reopening of the decree.

2. While parties cannot by consent confer jurisdiction upon a court which has none, they may, either expressly or by their conduct, waive objections to remedies pursued in courts having jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

3. The objection to the remedy pursued not being made in the proper manner, and not being insisted upon in the court below, and the case having been heard and determined upon its merits without reference to such objection, a waiver in reference to the remedy resulted.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by one Turnbull against F. C. Foster and others, in which one Phinzy was made a party. The application of Mrs. Pauline Foster to be made a party was denied, and decree rendered, and thereafter she filed an application praying that she be made a party, and that the decree be reopened and amended. This application was denied, and Foster brings error. Reversed.

Saml. H. Sibley, for plaintiff in error. Q. L. Williford and George & Anderson, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Mrs. Turnbull and three Fosters were tenants in common of a tract of land, in which each was entitled to an undivided one-fourth interest. It was agreed that F. C. and L. H. Foster should cultivate the land and make certain improvements, and from the rents and profits reimburse themselves for the sums which they might thus expend. Mrs. Turnbull filed an application for partition, and the two Fosters above referred to filed a plea in which they set forth the agreement that they had made improvements, and that they had not been reimbursed therefor. While this case was pending, Phinzy became the owner of the interest of F. W. Foster in the land, and was made a party, and the name of F. W. Foster stricken from the case. A decree was rendered providing for a division of the land into four parcels; the decree reciting the amount that was still unpaid for improvements, and providing that one-fourth of this amount should be chargeable against the parcel which had been set apart to Phinzy, and that F. C. and L. H. Foster should have a special lien on the land for its payment. There was no personal judgment rendered against Phinzy for the amount. To this decree Mrs. Turnbull and Phinzy excepted, and Mrs. Pauline Foster, the divorced wife of L. H. Foster, filed what purported to be a cross-bill of exceptions, complaining of the refusal of her application to be made a party to the proceeding. The decree was affirmed, and the bill of exceptions sued out by Mrs. Pauline

Foster was dismissed on the ground that no ruling had been made in the court below on her application to be made a party to the proceeding. Turnbull v. Foster, 116 Ga. 763, 43 S. E. 42. Subsequently, on January 27, 1903, Mrs. Foster filed an application to be made a party to the case, and prayed that the decree be reopened and amended so as to set up certain rights which she claimed against her former husband, L. H. Foster. Upon this application, scire facias was issued and served upon the parties to the decree. Phinzy filed an answer, in which he alleged that Mrs. Foster should not be allowed to become a party for the reason that the case had been disposed of by a final decree, and for the further reason that he was entitled, under a judgment against L. H. Foster, to the amount which the decree provided should be charged against the land set apart to him; the basis of this claim being fully set forth in the answer. Mrs. Foster filed a reply to Phinzy's answer, in which she set forth in detail the grounds upon which she claimed that the amount due her former husband should be decreed to her. Upon these pleadings the case came on to be tried by the judge upon an agreed statement of facts, and, after hearing argument, an order was passed denying and overruling the application of Mrs. Foster. From the agreed statement of facts, the following appears: L. H. Foster and his wife separated in May, 1894. Suit for divorce was thereafter filed, and on January 8, 1895, a judgment was rendered, awarding Mrs. Foster a specific amount per month as temporary alimony. On March 11, 1898, a final judgment was rendered, granting a divorce and decreeing to her the sum of $2,500 as permanent alimony, and that she have a special lien upon certain property embraced in the schedule filed with the application for divorce; the one-fourth interest in the land above referred to being embraced therein, as well as other property, including notes and accounts. The amount now in controversy (that is, the sum charged against the land set apart to Phinzy) was not, in terms, referred to in the schedule or the decree; and no language was broad enough to embrace it, unless a general reference to notes and accounts would accomplish this purpose. L. H. Foster had been insolvent since January 9, 1897, and all of his property, except the amount now in controversy, has been absorbed by judgments which have priority over the judgment of Mrs. Foster. The partition proceeding was filed March 3, 1896, and the answer of L. H. and F. C. Foster, claiming a lien on the share of F. W. Foster, was filed during the same month. On January 9, 1897, L. H. Foster executed four promissory notes, payable to F. C. Foster, which notes were indorsed by the latter to F. W. Foster, and by him to Phinzy, before maturity, as additional security for a pre-existing debt of F. W. Foster to Phinzy. These notes were made without consideration, merely for the accommodation of F. W. Foster, but Phinzy had no notice of this fact. Phinzy obtained judgment on these notes in March, 1900, and the execution issued thereon was entered on the general execution docket on March 16, 1900. On November 23, 1900, L. H. Foster made a written assignment to Mrs. Foster of the claim which he had under the partition decree against the land set apart to Phinzy. At this time Mrs. Foster had no actual notice of Phinzy's claim against her former husband. Written notice of this assignment was given to the then attorney of record of Phinzy on November 25, 1904. On November 11, 1902, Phinzy sold the land set apart to him, conveying the same with warranty, and the purchaser from Phinzy has since sold to others.

1. The claim which L. H. Foster had against F. W. Foster on account of improvements made under the contract above referred to, and which was in the partition decree asserted against the land set apart to Phinzy, was a mere chose in action. L. H. Foster, under the decree, recovered his full interest in the land as such; and his recovery for improvements was not a recovery of land in any sense, but a recovery of a debt which F. W. Foster owed to him, and which was, under the facts of the case, decreed to be chargeable against the interest of F. W. Foster in the land. Being a mere chose in action, no judgment lien attached thereto; and it was therefore under the control of L. H. Foster, as against his judgment creditors of every class, until they, either by garnishment or other appropriate remedy, either at law or in equity, brought the same before a court having jurisdiction to adjudicate the rights of creditors therein. Until this was done, L. H. Foster had the right, under the law, to dispose of the same for value, provided the transaction in which he did it was not entered into for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and there was no creditor who, at the time he disposed of it, had an equity against him which could be asserted against the transferee. If the assignment to his former wife was made in good faith and for value, it passed to her the title to the chose in action, but she took it subject to any existing equities which F. W. Foster or his assignee might have had against her former husband. There is no evidence that the assignment was made with any fraudulent intent. Mrs. Foster was a purchaser for value, the consideration being the judgment which she had against her former husband for alimony. Neither F. W. Foster nor Phinzy had any claim against L. H. Foster at the time the partition proceedings were begun, or at the time the plea setting up the claim for improvements was filed. Neither had a right of legal set-off, and, if Phinzy has any right of set-off at all, it is one which the aid of a court of equity is necessary to enforce. In the assertion of every equitable right, the one who asserts it must give effect to all the equitable rights of his adversary in the property in controversy, and hence this controversy is to be determined according to equitable principles. Mrs. Foster is the holder of the legal title to the chose in action under her assignment, and, if her equities are superior or even equal to those of Phinzy, the law will prevail, and the legal title acquired by the assignment will control the determination of the issue. The liens of none of the judgments have attached to the property in controversy, and the dates of the judgments are therefore immaterial. The case is to be dealt with as if the fund were before the court under a proceeding in the nature of an equitable garnishment. Mrs. Foster has acquired no superior right by being the older judgment creditor. She has acquired a right by her assignment which will be controlling in her favor unless Phinzy has an equity which would override her legal title. Mrs. Foster is a purchaser for value of the chose in action. So far as her rights are concerned, Phinzy is not to be treated as a purchaser for value of the note of L. H. Foster. It was taken as collateral security for a pre-existing debt. He paid no new consideration for it, he parted with nothing, and his status was not changed. No matter what might be his rights as against L. H. Foster in reference to a plea of no consideration, certainly as against the rights of Mrs. Foster he is to be treated as a mere volunteer. The contest, therefore, is between Mrs. Foster, as a purchaser for value, and Phinzy, as a mere volunteer; and, under such circumstances, the rule in equity is as old as equity jurisprudence itself. By the judgment against L. H. Foster he acquired no legal lien against the property in controversy, and, not having expended anything in order to obtain the note against L. H. Foster, he has nothing which would give him a standing in a court of equity. He has no rights, either legal or equitable, which would prevail over the legal right of Mrs. Foster as the assignee of the chose in action which her former husband had against the land formerly owned by F. W. Foster.

2, 3. If a proper objection had been made in a proper manner to the court's entertaining the application of Mrs. Foster to reopen the decree, to which she was not a party, and the judge had refused the application on this ground, an affirmance of the judgment would probably have resulted. While parties by consent cannot confer jurisdiction upon a court in reference to a matter of which the court has no jurisdiction, they may, either expressly or by their conduct, waive an objection to a remedy asserted in a court having jurisdiction, but which would be held to have been an improper remedy if a timely objection had been made. Coston v. Dudley, 65 Ga. 252. Phinzy, in his auswer to the scire facias, alleged that Mrs. Foster's application should not be granted, because she was not a party to the decree which she was seeking to reopen, but this was not proper subject-matter of an answer. All of the facts necessary to a determination of this question appeared upon the face of the proceeding, and objection to the remedy should have been made either by demurrer or motion to dismiss. Civ. Code 1895, § 5049; Jones v. McNealy, 114 Ga. 393, 40 S. E. 248; Mathis v. Fordham, 114 Ga. 369, 40 S. E. 324; Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 883, 43 S. E. 230. While the cases just cited related to an ordinary action begun by petition and process, the principle of the decisions is applicable to the pleadings in any proceeding; the general rule in all cases being that issues of law must be raised either by demurrer or motions in the nature of a demurrer, and that an answer is not the appropriate way to bring such matters before the court. In addition to this, it is clear from the record that the parties, by the way in which they dealt with the case in the court below, waived any objection to the remedy pursued, and that the judge acquiesced in this waiver. The fact that Mrs. Foster was not a party to the decree which she was seeking to reopen appears in her application, and the hearing was had upon an agreed statement of facts which was entirely foreign to the question that she was not properly in court; and in this court counsel for the defendants in error does not, in his brief, refer to that portion of the answer which raises objections to the form of remedy pursued. The waiver was complete in the court below, and no disposition was manifested in this court to avoid the effects resulting from its existence. The order of the judge is entirely consistent with the view that he passed upon the merits of the case, and did not refuse the application on the ground that the wrong remedy was pursued.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

EWART v. BOWMAN.*

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 13, 1904.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DEFENSES.

1. Under a contract to purchase a half interest "in remainder, reversion or of whatever nature the same may be," the purchaser cannot decline to comply, on tender of a deed not objectionable in form, on the ground that the title attempted to be conveyed is not good, where he knew at the time of making the contract the defect claimed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Newberry County; Aldrich, Judge.

Action by William F. Ewart against Katie E. Bowman. From an order dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Johnstone & Welch, for appellant. Lambert W. Jones, for respondent.

GARY, A. A. J. This is an action for the specific performance of a written contract, and was commenced on the 2d day of July, 1902, by service on the defendant of the summons and complaint. The agreement upon which the action is based is as follows:

"State of South Carolina, Newberry County. This memorandum witnesseth:

"(1) That I, Katie E. Bowman, do hereby promise, agree and bargain to purchase of William F. Ewart his one-half interest in remainder, reversion, or of whatever nature the same may be, in the following described real estate, to wit: * * *

"(2) That I agree, promise and bargain to pay to William F. Ewart for said one-half interest the sum of five hundred dollars, the same to be paid or secured to be paid whenever a proper deed of conveyance is tendered me, and conveying a valid title thereto.

"(3) That I, William F. Ewart, do hereby accept the foregoing offer of Mrs. Katie E. Bowman, and do hereby agree, promise and bargain to forthwith make a proper deed of conveyance to her for said one-half interest, she to pay the purchase price or secure the same whenever I tender to her said proper deed of conveyance.

"In witness whereof, we hereunto set our hands and seals, this 11th day of June, 1902. Katie E. Bowman, Wm. F. Ewart.

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of M. E. Abrams, J. W. Hipp."

The complaint, after reciting the facts of this agreement, alleges: "That thereafter the plaintiff tendered to the defendant a proper deed of conveyance for said interest in said land, which deed she declined to accept, and also declined to pay said consideration of $500, which she had agreed and promised to pay in said contract; her refusal to accept said deed and to pay said money being based upon the ground that good title to said interest could not be conveyed to her by the plaintiff, all of which will fully appear by reference to the grounds of her objection, hereto annexed, and marked 'Exhibit B,' and made a part of this complaint."

The grounds of objection referred to in the answer are contained in a letter written by the defendant on the 12th of June, 1902, which is as follows:

"Newberry, S. C., June 12, 1902. Mr. Wm. F. Ewart, Newberry, S. C.—Dear Brother: This is to inform you formally that I will not accept the deed tendered me for the property mentioned and described in the written agreement to purchase, signed by you and me on June 11th, 1902.

"The grounds for my refusal to comply with the terms of said memorandum are these:

"(1) I am advised that there is a serious question as to whether the title you tendered me to this property is good or valid; no objection, however, to the form and substance of your proffered deed, but to the title it attempts to convey.

"(2) I am advised, also, that there is a serious question as to your being able at this time to make a good or valid title to said property. The cloud upon this title above referred to is, so I am impressed, that this lot or premises has been held by the town of Prosperity, S. C., adversely to you for twenty years—indeed, over forty years.

"Yours very truly, K. E. Bowman."

The answer of the defendant admits the execution of the contract of purchase of the interest of the plaintiff in the lot described in paragraph 1 of the complaint. The answer also admits that the defendant refused to accept a deed from plaintiff, and gave her reasons in writing to plaintiff, as shown in Exhibit B, which she insists are good and sufficient reasons for her not accepting and paying for such title as plaintiff can now give or offer her to said lot, as shown in Exhibit C. The answer further alleges that plaintiff once had good and valid titles under the deed from James Graham to De Witt C. Graham, trustee, yet he has long since allowed said title to lapse and become extinct; by reason of the lapse of time the said premises have been used adversely to his interest, continuously, and to that of this defendant as well, amounting to 48 years nearly, from 1853, the date of deed to De Witt C. Graham, trustee, to present time; that she is advised that plaintiff cannot now give her good and valid and sufficient title to said lot, and hence cannot lawfully insist upon her accepting any title from him, nor paying him said sum of $500.

The cause was tried on circuit by Judge James Aldrich on an agreed state of facts, and on the 27th day of February, 1903, he filed a decree dismissing the plaintiff's complaint, with costs, upon the ground that the lot described in plaintiff's complaint had been held by others adversely to plaintiff for a statutory period, and that the right of plaintiff to the possession was barred, and that the title tendered by him to defendant is not a good and sufficient conveyance of said lot. From this decree the plaintiff appeals to this court upon five exceptions, as follows:

"(1) The court erred in decreeing that the title tendered by the plaintiff to the defendant was not a good and sufficient conveyance of the lot in question.

"(2) That the court erred in decreeing that the complaint herein be dismissed.

"(3) That the court erred in decreeing that the fee to the lot in question was in the trustee, and still remains in him, and that consequently all who claim through him are barred.

"(4) The court erred in not decreeing that the plaintiff, under the deed in question, had a good and sufficient title to the said lot, and, this being so, the defendant should comply with the terms of her purchase.

"(5) The court erred in not decreeing that the defendant should specifically perform her contract to purchase the said lot."

We think the circuit judge was in error in dismissing the plaintiff's complaint. The plaintiff, by his agreement, did not agree to tender to defendant a good and sufficient conveyance of said lot. On the contrary, the defendant obligated herself to pay the plaintiff $500 for the interest of the plaintiff in said lot; the agreement expressly reciting, "That I, Katie E. Bowman, do hereby promise, agree and bargain to purchase of William F. Ewart his one-half interest in remainder, reversion, or of whatever nature the same may be in the following described real estate, to wit: * * * (Italics mine.) The deed tendered certainly was sufficient in form to convey all the interest of the defendant in said lot. In fact, no objection is made to the deed on that ground, for, in the letter of defendant setting out her reasons for declining, she expressly states and disavows any objection to the form: "No objection, however, to the form and substance of your proffered deed, but to the title it attempts to convey." The defendant does not ask to be relieved from her contract on the ground that she was overreached or not informed as to the status of the plaintiff's title, nor that she had made a hard, unreasonable, or unconscionable bargain. Nor does she plead any equity that would entitle her to be relieved of her contract. She is a sister of the plaintiff, and equal owner then and now of whatever interest he had. She knew at the time she purchased the interest of plaintiff that the defect which she now sets up—adverse possession—existed. In the third paragraph of her answer she alleges: "That the said plaintiff once had good and valid titles under said deed from James Graham to De Witt C. Graham, trustee, yet he has long since allowed said title to lapse and become extinct. By reason of the length of time the said premises have been adversely used to his interest, continuously, and to that of this defendant as well, amounting to forty-eight years nearly, from 1853, the date of deed to De Witt C. Graham, trustee, to present time." In the absence of any allegation of concealment, misrepresentation, or fraud, we think the defendant should comply with her agreement.

From this view of the case, it is not necessary to pass upon the nature of the interest the plaintiff would take under the trust deed, nor whether title could be acquired by an adverse claimant holding prior to the death of the life tenant. Suffice it to say that whatever interest the plaintiff has or will have under the terms of the deed of James Graham, trustee, is conveyed by the deed tendered by him to the defendant in this case, and that interest is what she agreed to purchase.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case be remanded to the circuit court, with directions to issue such orders as may require the defendant to specifically perform her contract as prayed for in plaintiff's complaint.

DENNIS v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. R.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 28, 1904.)

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—RAILROAD EMPLOYEE—EXTENT OF REMEDY—LIMITATIONS.

1. The act of North Carolina of 1897 (Priv. Laws N. C. 1897, p. 83, c. 56) giving a remedy for death by wrongful act to any employé of a railroad company operated in the state is only an enlargement of the Lord Campbell act (Code N. C. §§ 1498-1500), and must be construed with it.

2. An action will lie in the state under a statute of a foreign state where its provisions are not contrary to those of the state, but, as to the extent of the remedy, plaintiff will be governed by the limitations of such foreign state.

3. The provision in Lord Campbell's act of North Carolina (Code N. C. § 1498) that a failure to commence an action of wrongful death in one year should extinguish the right conferred by the statute applies to an action under the act brought in South Carolina.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Gage, Judge.

Action by Cornelia A. Dennis, administratrix of Frank McGowan, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad. From judgment sustaining demurrer to complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Clayton, for appellant. Willcox & Willcox, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. Frank McGowan, a resident of South Carolina, was an engineer in the employment of the defendant, and was killed in North Carolina by the wreck of an engine he was running on the 10th November, 1900, more than one year before this action was commenced by his administratrix. It is alleged that the death of the intestate was caused by defects in the machinery and appliances he was operating, and that the defendant had notice of such defects.

An agreement between counsel is set out in the record, in which appears the following statement: "The issue is as to whether the plaintiff was barred of her right of action in this state, it being admitted that, under the Lord Campbell act of North Carolina, the action must be brought within one year, while in the state of South Carolina the limitation was two years, and that this action was brought after the lapse of one year and within two years; the object being to bring all matters before this court on this one appeal, and to save several appeals." The reason for the agreement was because this question would not otherwise at this time have been properly before the court.

The appellant contends that her action was brought under the statute of North Carolina passed in 1897; that it was independent of the Lord Campbell act (Code N. C. §§ 1498, 1500); that its provisions were comprehensive enough to afford relief in this action; that the statute of limitations pertains merely to the remedy, and is governed by the lex fori. That statute is as follows: "Section 1. That any servant or employee of any railroad company operating in this state, who shall suffer injury to his person, or the personal representative of any servant or employee who shall have suffered death, in the course of his service or employment with said company, by the negligence, carelessness or incapacity of any servant, employee or agent of the company, or by any defect in the machinery, ways or appliances of the company, shall be entitled to maintain an action against such company." Priv. Laws N. C. 1897, p. 83, c. 56. The other section has no application to this case. The respondent contends that this statute is but an enlargement of the provisions of the Lord Campbell act; that they are in pari materia, and must be construed together; that the time within which the action must be brought under the Lord Campbell act is in no sense a statute of limitations; and that any facts that would have destroyed the right of recovery if the suit had been instituted in North Carolina will defeat the action in this state.

The Lord Campbell act of North Carolina is as follows: "Whenever the death of a person is caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of another, such as would, if the injured person had lived, have entitled him to an action for damages therefor, the person or corporation that would have been so liable, and his or their executors, administrators, collectors or successors, shall be liable to an action for damages, to be brought within one year after such death, by the executors, administrators, or collectors, and this notwithstanding the death, and although the wrongful act or neglect causing death, amount in law to felony." Code N. C. § 1498. The statute of 1897 has been declared by the Supreme Court of North Carolina, in the case of Hancock v. N. & W. R. R., 124 N. C. 222, 32 S. E. 679, to be constitutional. Our construction of the statute of 1897 is that it was merely intended to enlarge the provisions of the Lord Campbell act, that it was in the nature of an amendment to that act, and that they must be construed together.

This action could not have been maintained in North Carolina after more than one year had elapsed from the death of the person suffering the injury. In Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 670, 13 Sup. Ct. 224, 228, 36 L. Ed. 1123, the court says: "In order to maintain an action for an injury, some courts have held that the wrong must be one which would be actionable by the law of the place where the redress is sought, as well as by the law of the place where the wrong was done. * * * But such is not the law of this court. By our law a private action may be maintained in one state, if not contrary to its own policy, for such a wrong done in another and actionable there, although a like wrong would not be actionable in the state where the suit is brought." See, also, 16 Harv. L. Rev., No. 1, p. 63 (Nov., 1902). As we have a statute which gives an action for wrongfully causing death, it is not against public policy to enforce such a liability here, although it arose in another jurisdiction. Stewart v. B. & O. R. R., 168 U. S. 445, 18 Sup. Ct. 105, 42 L. Ed. 537. When such a liability is enforced in a jurisdiction other than the place of the wrongful act, it does not mean that the act, in any degree, is subject to the lex fori, with regard either to its quality or its consequences. Slater v. R. Co., 194 U. S. 120, 126, 24 Sup. Ct. 581, 582, 48 L. Ed. 900. In the case last mentioned the court uses this language: "The theory of the foreign suit is that, although the act complained of was subject to no law having force in the forum, it gave rise to an obligation—an obligation which, like other obligations, follows the person, and may be enforced wherever the person may be found. Stout v. Wood, 1 Blackf. 71; Dennick v. Central R. Co., 103 U. S. 11, 18, 26 L. Ed. 439, 442. But as the only source of this obligation is the law of the place of the act, it follows that that law determines not merely the existence of the obligation (Smith v. Condry, 1 How. 28, 11 L. Ed. 35), but equally determines its extent. It seems to us unjust to allow a plaintiff to come here, absolutely depending on the foreign law for the foundation of his case, and yet to deny the defendant the benefit of whatever limitations on his liability that law would impose. In Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 199, 38 L. Ed. 958, 961, 14 Sup. Ct. 978, an action was brought in the district of Minnesota for a death caused in Montana, and it was held that the damages were to be assessed in accordance with the Montana statute. Therefore we may lay on one side, as quite inadmissible, the notion that the law of the place of the act may be resorted to so far as to show that the act was a tort, and then may be abandoned, leaving the consequences to be determined according to the accident of the place where the defendant may happen to be caught."

The two statutes of North Carolina must be construed together in determining the consequences of the wrongful act. The action in this state is incumbered with all the burdens arising out of either of said statutes. In Taylor v. Cranberry Iron & Coal Co., 94 N. C. 525, 526, the court thus construes the provision of the Lord Campbell act limiting the time within which the action must be brought: "This is not strictly a statute of limitation. It gives a right of action that would not otherwise exist, and the action to enforce it must be brought within one year after the death of the testator or intestate, else the right of action will be lost. It must be accepted in all respects as the statute gives it. Why the action was not brought within the time does not appear, but any explanation in that respect would be unavailing, as there is no saving clause as to the time within which the action must be begun. The nature of the cause of action, when it occurred, and when this action began, plainly appeared from the complaint and summons; and, as more than a year elapsed after the death of the intestate, and before the bringing of the action, it is clear it cannot be maintained, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed."

It is well settled in this state that the statute of limitations relates to the remedy, and is enforced according to the lex fori. Sawyer v. Macaulay, 18 S. C. 543. But the requirement that the action shall be commenced within one year after the party is killed is not a statute of limitations. At common law there was no right of action for death caused by wrongful act. The requirement as to the time of commencing the action is a part of the statute creating this right. It is incumbent on those seeking the benefit of the statute to show that their action conforms to all the requirements thereof, one of which is that the suit must be instituted within a certain time. In North Carolina the failure to commence the action within one year did not simply extinguish the remedy, but was an extinction of the right conferred by the statute. When such is the case the action cannot be maintained in this state. Sawyer v. Macaulay, 18 S. C. 543. The North Carolina decision is in harmony with the principle announced in Walker v. Chester County, 40 S. C. 342, 18 S. E. 936. That case was an action under the statute which gave a right of action for damages caused by a defect in the repair of a highway. The statute contained a proviso limiting the right of action to cases, inter alia, where the plaintiff had not brought about his injury by his own act or negligently contributed thereto. There was a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it failed to allege that the plaintiff did not in any way bring about her injury by her own act, or negligently contribute thereto. A county was not liable at common law in an action for injuries received from defects in the repair of a highway. This court held that the demurrer was properly sustained. Mr. Chief Justice McIver concurred on the ground that the conditions upon which the right is conferred must appear in the complaint, as otherwise no right of action is stated. These authorities are conclusive of the question under consideration.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

PARKS v. LAURENS COTTON MILLS.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1904.)

LANDLORD'S LIEN—ACTION TO ENFORCE—COMPLAINT.

1. In an action by a landlord to recover from defendant, who had purchased cotton from plaintiff's tenant, on which cotton plaintiff held a lien, a complaint alleging the lien, purchase of the cotton, notice of the lien soon after the purchase, and refusal to deliver the cotton on demand, and refusal on the demand of the officer to allow inspection of books required to be kept by law on purchase of cotton, states a cause of action.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; J. H. Hudson, Special Judge.

Action by John W. Parks against the Laurens Cotton Mills. From an order dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. P. Park and Simpson & Cooper, for appellant. Ferguson & Featherstone, for respondent.

JONES, J. The appeal in this case is from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency, and dismissing the complaint. The action was for damages, based upon the following allegations:

"(1) That the defendant is now, and at the times herein stated was, a corporation duly chartered, organized, and doing business under the laws of the state of South Carolina, with its principal place of business at Laurens, S. C., and is engaged in the business of buying cotton from the initial seller, and in the manufacture of cotton goods.

"(2) That the plaintiff is the owner of real estate near Park Station, in Laurens county, and said state, and rented a part of his said land to W. K. McDowell for agricultural purposes for the year 1902; the said rent being payable in the fall of the year 1902.

"(3) That on the — day of November, 1902, the said W. K. McDowell sold to the defendant, Laurens Cotton Mills, one bale of cotton, of the value of forty-five dollars, on which the plaintiff held a lien for his said rent, and the said McDowell failed within ten days thereafter to pay the said rent, or to deposit the amount of the same with the clerk of court for Laurens county.

"(4) That, soon after the sale of the said cotton to the defendant by the said W. K. McDowell, the plaintiff notified the defendant that he held a lien on the said cotton for rent, and requested and demanded of the defendant the possession of the said cotton, and also demanded of the defendant an inspection of its books wherein is kept a record of all cotton bought from the initial seller, which demand and request the defendant willfully, maliciously, and in wanton disregard of the rights of the plaintiff, and in open violation of the laws of the state of South Carolina, refused. That the plaintiff then applied to Magistrate John M. Hudgens for a warrant of seizure against the said cotton, which warrant was duly and regularly issued, directed to the sheriff of Laurens county, South Carolina. That the said sheriff, by his duly and legally appointed deputy, went to the office of defendant, in the city of Laurens, S. C., for the purpose of executing the said warrant of seizure, and demanded of the president and secretary of the defendant an inspection of its books, wherein is kept a record of all cotton bought by the defendant from the initial seller; but the defendant, through its officers and agents, willfully, maliciously, and in wanton disregard of the rights of the plaintiff, and in open violation of the laws of South Carolina, refused to allow the said deputy to inspect its books, and thereby prevented him from executing the said warrant.

"(5) That by reason of the defendant's refusal to deliver the said cotton to the plaintiff, and its refusal to allow either the plaintiff or the sheriff to inspect its books as aforesaid, the plaintiff has suffered damage to the amount of two thousand dollars."

The specifications of insufficiency were:

"(1) Because the complaint fails to allege that the defendant was in possession of the bale of rent cotton at the time that plaintiff demanded its possession or an inspection of the books, or that defendant was in possession thereof at the time lien warrant was issued, or at the time the action was brought.

"(2) Because the said complaint fails to allege any actual damage sustained by the plaintiff.

"(3) Because the complaint fails to connect the plaintiff with any tort committed by the defendant, or to show that plaintiff was damaged by any tort committed by the defendant."

The exceptions impute error in sustaining the demurrer upon the above grounds.

When a fact is pleaded, whatever inferences of law or conclusions of fact may properly arise from it are to be regarded as embodied in such averment. Mason v. Carter, 8 S. C. 103. The following from Pomeroy on Code Pleading has been several times approved in our decisions (Childers v. Verner, 12 S. C. 1; Jerkowski v. Marco, 56 S. C. 241, 248, 34 S. E. 386): "The true doctrine to be gathered from all the cases is that if the substantial facts which constitute a cause of action are stated in a complaint or petition, or can be inferred by reasonable intendment from the matters which are set forth, although the allegations of these facts are imperfect, incomplete, and defective—such insufficiency pertaining, however, to the form rather than to the substance—the proper mode of correction is not by demurrer, nor by excluding evidence at the trial, but by a motion before the trial to make the avements more definite and complete by amendment." Applying this rule in connection with the rule that pleadings should be liberally construed with a view of substantial justice between the parties, we think it was error to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the complaint. In Graham v. Seignious, 53 S. C. 132, 137, 31 S. E. 51; Michalson v. All, 43 S. C. 459, 21 S. E. 323, 49 Am. St. Rep. 857, and Drake v. Whaley, 35 S. C. 187, 191, 14 S. E. 397, it is shown that one who receives and disposes of cotton subject to lien, with notice of the lien, is liable in damages to the lienor. The complaint alleges the plaintiff's lien, the purchase of the cotton by defendant, notice of the lien soon after the purchase, and refusal to deliver the cotton upon demand of plaintiff, and refusal of the demand of the officer having warrant of seizure, to prevent inspection of books, required by law to be kept, containing a record of cotton bought from the initial seller, in willful disregard of plaintiff's rights, thereby preventing the execution of the warrant of seizure. That defendant had possession of the cotton soon after the sale of it to defendant by the lienor, when notice of the lien was given, is a reasonable inference from the purchase of the cotton for manufacturing purposes, and refusal to produce it on demand of the plaintiff, or to permit the use of means provided by law for the identification of cotton purchased. It is not probable that defendant had sold the cotton before notice of the lien, as it was not bought for sale, but for manufacture. If the cotton, after notice of the lien, was sold or used in manufacturing, that would be a conversion, rendering defendant liable in damages. So that it follows, as a reasonable inference from facts alleged, that defendant either had possession of the cotton as purchased soon after the purchase, or had converted it into some manufactured product, in either of which cases, liability in damages would attach after notice of the lien.

The second specification is disposed of by reference to the allegations as to the loss and value of the cotton subject to plaintiff's lien.

That the third specification could not be sustained, follows from what has been already said.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

SIMS et al. v. DAVIS et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 3, 1904.)

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL—TRESPASS—DEATH OF DEFENDANT—SUBSTITUTION OF HEIRS—RES JUDICATA.

1. An action for trespass on lands in possession of plaintiff prior to Act 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 18) did not survive against the heirs of the defendant on his death pending the action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Abatement and Revival, §§ 257, 282.]

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 142, providing that on the death of a party the court, on motion, within one year or after on supplemental complaint, may allow the action to be continued against the representative or successor in interest, an action against an ancestor for trespass may be continued against an heir more than one year after death of the ancestor, by service of supplemental complaint, without summons, but on rule to show cause.

3. Where a rule to show cause adjudged nothing, it cannot be pleaded as a former adjudication.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Townsend, Judge.

Action by James C. F. and Frank E. Sims against George W. Davis. On the death of the defendant the action was continued against his heirs and administrators. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

The plaintiffs commenced an action on September 5, 1891, against the defendant, George W. Davis, for damages for trespass on lands in possession of plaintiffs, and to which they claimed title. Defendant answered, denying the allegations in the complaint, and alleging title in himself to the land. In April, 1899, the following notice of motion and affidavit was served upon Mrs. Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis, individually, and as administrator of George W. Davis, deceased:

"To Mrs. Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis, and to G. Wilmot Davis, as administrator of the estate of George W. Davis, deceased: Take notice that Frank E. Sims will apply to the presiding Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for Richland County in open Court, on Monday, April 24, 1899, at 10 A. M., or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, for an order granting to said Frank E. Sims leave to serve and file a supplemental summons and complaint reviving said action in his name against you and all of you. The motion will be based upon the original summons, complaint and answer in the cause and upon the affidavit herewith served. Respectfully, Robt. W. Shand, Attorney for Frank E. Sims."

"Affidavit. State of South Carolina, Richland County. Before me personally comes Frank E. Sims, and says on oath that he is one of the plaintiffs in this action; that the action was commenced on the 31st August, 1891, by leaving summons and complaint with the sheriff of Richland county for service, the said complaint being for injury to and trespass upon real estate of the plaintiffs; that the said George W. Davis served his answer to said complaint on June 24, 1892, claiming title in fee to the said real estate; that the said James C. F. Sims died intestate in October, 1891, and deponent has since acquired all the rights, title and interest of all the distributees in and to the land upon which the said trespasses are alleged to have been committed, and to which a title in fee was claimed by said G. W. Davis: that the defendant, George W. Davis, died intestate on July 5, 1895, leaving him surviving as his heirs at law his widow, Mary E. Davis, and his son, G. Wilmot Davis, and the said G. Wilmot Davis is administrator of his estate; that no settlement nor adjustment of the issues raised by the said pleadings has ever been made, and the case is still on the calendar of this court. Frank E. Sims.

"Sworn to before me, this April 18, 1899. Robt. W. Shand, Notary Public for S. C. [L. S.]"

This motion was heard at the November, 1899, term by his honor, Judge James Aldrich. Messrs. W. D. Melton and J. S. Muller, disclaiming in so doing to represent either Mrs. Mary E. Davis or G. Wilmot Davis, or G. Wilmot Davis as administrator of George W. Davis, deceased, and appearing as amici curiae only, resisted the motion. On November 8, 1899, Judge Aldrich filed the following order:

"This was a motion for leave to serve and file a supplemental summons and complaint, reviving the above-entitled action in the name of Frank E. Sims, as surviving plaintiff, against Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis as heirs at law, and G. Wilmot Davis as administrator of the estate, of the defendant George W. Davis, who is alleged to have died in October, 1891. After reading and filing the affidavit of Frank E. Sims and the notice of said motion, and the pleadings on file in said action, and after hearing argument by Robert W. Shand, Esquire, for the motion, and by William D. Melton and J. S. Muller, attorneys, against the motion, it appearing that more than a year has elapsed since the death of said George W. Davis, it is ordered that the said motion be, and the same is hereby, refused, upon the ground that the matter cannot properly be brought before the court by motion. James Aldrich, Presiding Judge. November 8th, 1899."

In August, 1902, the following supplemental complaint was served upon G. Wilmot Davis individually, and as administrator of George W. Davis, deceased, and upon Mrs. Mary E. Davis:

"Frank E. Sims, one of the plaintiffs above named, by way of supplement to and revivor of the action herein below stated, complains and says:

"First. That an action was commenced in this court on 1st September, 1891, by the plaintiffs above named against the defendant above named, the summons wherein was personally served on the defendant on 5th September, 1891, and the complaint whereof was in words and figures as follows:

"The State of South Carolina, Richland County. In the Court of Common Pleas. James C. F. Sims and Frank E. Sims, Plaintiffs, against George W. Davis, Defendant. The plaintiffs, complaining of the defendant, allege:

"(1) That they are tenants in common, are the owners in fee of all that certain tract of land, situate, lying, and being in the county of Richland and state aforesaid, on the Stateburg or Garner's Ferry Road, about two and one-half miles from the city of Columbia, butting and bounded toward the north on the road from Columbia to Stateburg, east on lands of Dr. Fisher, formerly of the estate of Wade Hampton, south partly on lands of Dr. L. J. Hancock, and partly on lands now or formerly known as the "Race Track Field," which said last-mentioned tract of land now belongs to one Newsum.

"(2) That during the fall of the year 1890, on the ——— day of November therein, while these plaintiffs were in possession thereof as owners as aforesaid, defendant wrongfully and unlawfully entered upon plaintiffs' said land, and without their consent, and after being forbidden so to do, trod down the grass, plowed up the soil, and otherwise injured said premises, to plaintiffs' damage one thousand dollars.

"Wherefore plaintiffs demand judgment against the defendant for the sum of one thousand dollars, and the costs of the action.

"Andrew Crawford,

"Plaintiffs' Attorney.

"31st August, 1891."

"Second. That on 24th June, 1892, the defendant duly served his answer, whereby he asserted and claimed title in fee and right of possession to the parcel of land described in said complaint, and the cause was duly docketed on the calendar of this court.

"Third. That the plaintiff James C. F. Sims died intestate in October, 1891, and his surviving copartner has since acquired by purchase and devise all of the said James C. F. Sims' estate in said parcel of land.

"Fourth. That the defendant, George W. Davis, died intestate on 5th July, 1895, leaving him surviving, as his distributees, his widow, Mary E. Davis, and his son, G. Wilmot Davis, and the said G. Wilmot Davis is the duly appointed administrator of his father's estate.

"Fifth. That no settlement or adjustment of the issues raised by said pleadings has ever been made, and the cause is still on the calendar of this court.

"Wherefore the plaintiff Frank E. Sims prays that the said action may be continued in his name against the said Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis, as heirs at law of George W. Davis, deceased, and against G. Wilmot Davis, as administrator of the estate of said George W. Davis, deceased, and that he have judgment against said administrator, as prayed for in said original complaint, and against the said Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis, on the issue raised by the answer of their intestate.

"Robt. W. Shand,

"Attorney for Frank E. Sims.

"August 20, 1902."

At this stage of the proceeding, the case was called up by Mr. Robert W. Shand, plain-tiff's attorney, before Judge Hudson, as special judge, holding a special term of the court in March, 1903. Mr. Shand moved the court for an order continuing the action in the name of Frank E. Sims against the said G. Wilmot Davis and Mary E. Davis, as heirs at law of George W. Davis, deceased, and against G. Wilmot Davis, as administrator of the estate of George W. Davis, deceased. Mr. J. S. Muller resisted the motion, stating that he had been attorney for the deceased defendant, and disclaiming to represent in so doing either Mary E. Davis or G. Wilmot Davis, or G. Wilmot Davis, as administrator of the estate of George W. Davis, deceased, and appearing as amicus curiæ only. Judge Hudson refused Mr. Shand's motion for an order of continuance, and thereupon the following ex parte order was applied for by Mr. Shand and granted by Judge Hudson:

"On hearing the supplemental complaint in this case, dated August 20, 1902, signed by Robt. W. Shand, attorney for Frank E. Sims, and served personally on Mrs. Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis, on 4th September, 1902, as shown by proof of service indorsed thereon, and on application of Frank E. Sims, by his attorney, Robt. W. Shand, it is ordered that the said Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis show cause before this court, within twenty days after the service of a copy of this order upon them, why the said action should not be continued by Frank E. Sims against them as heirs at law of George W. Davis, deceased, on the supplemental complaint heretofore served upon them as aforesaid. J. H. Hudson, Special Judge. March 23, 1903."

This order to show cause was served upon the parties named, and within the time limited therein the following return was served:

"Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis, upon whom has been served an order of this court, dated March 23, 1903, requiring them to show cause before this court, within twenty days after the service of a copy of said order upon them, why the said action should not be continued by Frank E. Sims against them as heirs at law of George W. Davis, deceased, on a supplemental complaint heretofore served upon them as aforesaid, appearing by their attorneys, W. D. Melton and J. S. Muller, for the purposes of this return only, for cause why the said action should not be continued against them as aforesaid, respectfully submit: (1) That they are not parties to this action; that the only mode of making them parties to this action is by the service of the summons herein upon them; that they are not named in the original summons herein; that said original summons has never been served upon them, or either of them; and that no amended or other summons has been issued with the said supplemental complaint, or served upon them or either of them. (2) Because the application to continue the said action against these respondents is not based on a proper showing by affidavit, and is wholly unsupported by affidavit. (3) Because the cause of action did not survive or continue. (4) Because, if the cause of action did survive or continue, the action should be continued against the administrator of the said George W. Davis, deceased, only, and not against these respondents as heirs at law. Wherefore they pray that the said rule against them may be discharged. Wm. D. Melton, J. S. Muller, Attorneys for the said Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis for the purposes of this return only. April 8, 1903."

The proceeding came up before his honor, Judge D. A. Townsend, at the July, 1903, term of the court for Richland county. At this hearing, in addition to the grounds set out in the return, it was urged that the motion of plaintiff had been finally passed upon by the order of Judge Aldrich of November 8, 1899, and was res judicata.

On August 1, 1903, Judge Townsend filed the following order:

"In this case the action was commenced 1st September, 1891, by J. C. F. Sims and Frank E. Sims against George W. Davis. The complaint alleged that plaintiffs were owners as tenants in common of a parcel of land, and were in the possession thereof, and that defendant had committed certain alleged acts of trespass thereon; and judgment was demanded for $1,000. The defendant answered, making a general denial, and alleging further that he was seised in fee of this land, and was entitled to the possession of it. The cause was docketed for trial, but, before trial had, James C. F. Sims died intestate in October, 1891, and the defendant died intestate 5th July, 1895. In August, 1902, the cause being still on the calendar of this court, Frank E. Sims served upon Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis a supplemental complaint, in which he alleged the above facts, claimed to be now the successor in interest of the share of J. C. F. Sims, deceased, and prayed 'that the said action might be continued in his name against the said Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis, as heirs at law of George W. Davis, deceased, and against G. Wilmot Davis, as administrator of the estate of George W. Davis, deceased, and that he have judgment against said administrator as prayed for in said original complaint, and against the said Mary E. Davis and G. Wilmot Davis on the issue raised by the answer of their intestate.' This supplemental complaint was not verified. The matter was brought up before Judge Hudson, as special judge, holding a special term of the court of common pleas for Richland county, in March, 1903. At the hearing Mr. J. S. Muller appeared in opposition, declaring that he did so not as attorney for Mrs. Davis and her son, but only as amicus curiæ. After argument, Judge Hudson passed the following order [already set out herein]. The respondents, Mary E. Davis and G. W. Davis, having been served with copies of Judge Hudson's order, made return, 'appearing by their attorneys, W. D. Melton and J. S. Muller, for the purposes of this return only, for cause why the said action should not be continued against them as aforesaid' [which return is previously set out herein in full]. Upon these papers the case was heard before me at the July term of the Richland court. The first ground of the return objects that the action could not be continued against the heirs of Geo. W. Davis without the issue and service of an amended summons. In the case of a supplemental complaint where the parties are all living, no additional summons is required, because the parties are already in court. To revive an action against the heirs of one deceased, Code, § 142, requires the service of a supplemental complaint, but says nothing about serving an amended summons. If the action descends ipso facto to the heirs of one deceased, so that no summons is necessary within a year to make them parties to the cause, for the reason that they are already parties, I cannot see how they cease to be parties at the expiration of a year. But however that may be, notice was given to these respondents that the action would be pressed against them, and application made to the court for judgment under the supplemental complaint. Without any appearance by them, but after hearing Mr. J. S. Muller, contra, as the professed amicus curiæ, Judge Hudson passed the order above quoted. It certainly was not passed without full notice to them, and from it no appeal has been taken. Besides, as said by the court in Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 403, 14 S. E. 832: 'We find no express requirement that in a case continued by order there must also be a summons; and as the order as served contained substantially all the elements of a summons, we cannot say that the absence of a formal summons was a jurisdictional defect.' While, therefore, I think Judge Hudson was right in granting this order, I am sure that it is too late now to object, and that I am without power to treat his order as a nullity on the return now under consideration. And that order disposes of all the objections raised by the return of the respondents. I will add, however, that I think the cause of action survived. In an action for trespass to real estate, the plaintiff is required to prove title or possession according to the nature of the defense. If the defendant does not raise the issue of title, plaintiff need prove only possession and the trespass; but if defendant raises the issue of title by denial or affirmation, then the plaintiff is bound to prove title as a part of his cause of action, as stated in his complaint, and a judgment in such action settles the question of title. The plaintiffs alleged title in themselves; the original defendant denied this allegation and claimed title, and made it an issue in the cause, tendered by the plaintiffs, with the burden of proof on plaintiffs, and thus a part of plaintiffs' cause of action. This interest in the title descended by operation of law to the respondents, and is the subject of this action. It is therefore ordered that the return of the respondents is insufficient, and is hereby overruled, with leave to them to make proper answer to the allegations contained in the supplemental complaint within twenty days from notice of the filing of this order."

From this decree defendants, G. Wilmot Davis, in his own right and as administrator, and Mary E. Davis, appeal.

W. D. Melton and J. S. Muller, for appellants. R. W. Shand, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The pleadings and the several notices and orders which are involved in this appeal are set out in full in the report of the case. The exceptions will not be considered in detail. The two main questions involved are: First, Did the cause of action stated in the complaint survive or continue against the heirs of the defendant upon his death during the pendency of the action? Second, If it did survive, was it necessary, upon the filing of a supplemental complaint more than one year after the death of the defendant, to issue a new summons directed to the heirs, in order to continue the action against them?

It is clear that at the time of the death of the ancestor, in 1891, no judgment for damages could be recovered against the heir on account of the trespass of the ancestor. Huff v. Watkins, 20 S. C. 477; Jenkins v. Bennett, 40 S. C. 397, 18 S. E. 929. The act of 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 18) establishing a different rule has no retroactive effect, and hence does not affect this case. If this complaint were for the recovery of real estate, it would then be founded on a cause of action which would survive; and the action would be continued against the heirs of defendant, because they would, by operation of law, have the ancestor's claim to the land, the title to which would be adjudicated by the result of the action. But the complaint is not for the recovery of real estate, but for a distinct trespass alleged to have been committed on the land in the possession of the plaintiff. It is therefore an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. It is quite true, when the plaintiff alleged that he was not only in possession, but was the owner of the land at the time of the trespass, and the defendant denied this allegation, the question of title was raised, and, if the defendant had lived to have a verdict and judgment for damages entered against him, the question of title would have been effectually determined. Parker v. Leggett, 12 Rich. Law, 200; Parker v. Leggett, 13 Rich. Law, 172; Heyward v. Farmers' Company, 42 S. C. 138, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, 28 L. R. A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702. But neither a verdict nor a judgment for the recovery of the land could have been entered. The adjudication of the title would not have been direct, but it would have followed by necessary implication from the fact that the plaintiff recovered a judgment for damages for a trespass, the judgment for damages depending on his claim of title which the defendant denied. "A point which was actually and directly in issue in a former suit, and was there judicially passed upon and determined by a domestic court of competent jurisdiction, cannot be again drawn in question in any future action between the same parties or their privies, whether the cause of action in the two suits be identical or different." 2 Black on Judg. § 504. No judgment could be recovered in this action except for damages, and damages cannot be recovered against the heirs for the trespass of the ancestor, merely because the result of the action, as it originally stood, would have incidentally involved the title. On this ground the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed. This is decisive of the case, but the other question concerns an important matter of practice, and is therefore considered.

The supplemental complaint was filed more than a year after the death of the defendant, under the following provision of section 142 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902: "In case of death, marriage or other disability of a party, the court, on motion, at any time within one year thereafter, or afterwards, on a supplemental complaint, may allow the action to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest. * * *" In Arthur v. Allen, 22 S. C. 432, 444, the court says: "But it is said that there was no necessity or authority for issuing a summons with such supplemental complaint. The object was to make the representatives of the deceased persons parties to the action, and as the only mode of effecting that object is by the service of a summons, unless in the case where the application is made by motion within a year from the death of such parties, it would seem to follow necessarily that a summons must issue, or such representatives never would become parties. It does not appear, therefore, that the objections urged to the validity of the summons of June, 1882, and the supplemental complaint issued thereon, can be sustained. More than a year had elapsed from the death of the several parties, and hence the action could not be continued by motion, and only by supplemental complaint, for the filing of which no leave of the court was necessary, as we have seen." It was insisted in argument that this conclusively establishes the proposition that a summons must always be issued when a supplemental complaint is filed under section 142. It will be observed in the case of Arthur v. Allen, supra, upon filing the supplemental complaint the summons was issued and served, and the defendants moved to set aside the services on the ground that section 142 does not contemplate the service of a summons when a supplemental complaint has been filed, and that such service was not effectual to require those against whom the action was continued to answer the complaint. The issuing and service of a summons was held to be sufficient and proper. The point was not involved in that case whether an order to show cause would not have been equivalent to a summons, or sufficient notice to the heirs to require them to answer. Whether we regard the continuance of the action against the heirs as bringing in entirely new and independent parties, or merely a substitution of the heirs in the stead of the ancestor whose rights have descended to them, it is manifest in either case the summons would be proper and sufficient. In the one case it would be necessary to commence the action against the heir, and in the other it would be adequate notice to him to answer the supplemental complaint. We do not think, however, the proceeding is to be regarded as a new action or as bringing in independent parties, but as the continuance of the old action against the heir in right of his ancestor. It is to be observed that the statute does not require the service of a formal summons, and it would be carrying technicality to its utmost limit to hold that an order of the court giving notice of the supplemental complaint and requiring the heir to answer would not suffice to bind the heir and give the court jurisdiction, in the absence of an express provision requiring a formal summons. Taking this view, it was said in Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 891, 402, 14 S. E. 829, 832, after quoting the provision of the Code of Procedure here under consideration: "This was done within a year by Judge Hudson's order of June 7, 1883, and a copy of the same was served on each of the heirs, with a notice that, if they did not within twenty days appear and answer the complaint, the plaintiff might apply to this court for an order appointing a guardian ad litem for the infants, etc. It is contended, however, that a summons was indispensable. We find no express requirement that in a case continued by order there must be also a summons, and, as the order served contained substantially all the elements of a summons, we cannot say that the absence of a formal summons was a jurisdictional defect." It is true that there the cause was continued by order, the defendant not having been dead more than one year, while in this case a supplemental complaint was necessary, more than a year having elapsed after death. But in neither case is a formal statutory summons expressly required, and therefore the views expressed by the court apply in one case as well as the other. The order of Judge Hudson only required the parties to show cause why the action should not be continued against them "on the supplemental complaint heretofore served upon them." It adjudged nothing. Upon the coming in of the return, Judge Townsend ordered the case to be continued against the heirs, with leave to answer within 20 days. All this must be regarded sufficient, in the absence of an express requirement for the service of a summons.

On the first ground above stated, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

(70 S. C. 309)

JONES et al. v. BOYKIN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 30, 1904.)

ACTION TO RECOVER LAND—TAX DEED—COM-PLAINT—LIMITATIONS—INFANCY.

1. In an action to recover land, the complaint alleged that defendant claimed under a tax deed based on a sale of taxes under circumstances rendering the deed null and void for fraud. Held not to render the complaint demurrable for insufficiency.

2. Code 1902, § 423, provides that a sheriff's deed shall be prima facie evidence of good title in the holder, and that all proceedings have been regular, and that no action to recover land sold by the sheriff shall be brought after two years. Held a pure statute of limitation, and affected by the disability of infancy of plaintiffs.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; Klugh, Judge.

Action by Mary L. Jones and others against Burrell H. Boykin. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

A. B. Stuckey, for appellants. Kirkland & Moore, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiffs in this case appeal from an order of Judge Klugh sustaining a demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency, in so far as it attempted to set up a legal cause of action for the recovery of land. The complaint is as follows:

"First. That many years since, James Ammons, of said county and state, departed this life intestate, seised and possessed and being the owner in fee of all that tract of land situate in said county and state, containing seventy-two acres, more or less, bounded by lands owned by persons now or formerly, as follows: * * * That Mrs. M. A. Ammons departed this life intestate on the 11th day of June, 1900, leaving the three daughters of the said James Ammons, deceased, being also her daughters, as her sole heirs at law. That the said Janie Boykin also departed this life intestate on the — day of April, 1902, leaving as her sole heirs at law her husband, the plaintiff Ellie Boykin, and her son, the plaintiff Otis A. Boykin, the latter being an infant under the age of twenty-one years. His father, the said Ellie Boykin, has been appointed his guardian ad litem for the purposes of this action by L. A. Wittkowsky, Esq., the master for said county.

"Second. That the plaintiffs herein are seised in fee and entitled to the immediate possession of the tract of land above described.

"Third. That the defendant, Burrell H. Boykin, is in possession of said tract of land, and unlawfully withholds the same from the plaintiffs, to their damage in the sum of one hundred dollars.

"Fourth. Plaintiffs further allege that in or about the year 1887 the said Mrs. M. A. Ammons, being then in possession and control of said tract of land, each of her daughters aforesaid being under the age of twenty-one years, placed the defendant in possession of said premises under an agreement to collect the rents, account to her for the same, and pay the taxes upon said premises; that the said defendant continued for one or two years to collect the rents and account to the said Mrs. M. A. Ammons therefor, and paid the taxes upon said premises; that afterwards, while he was thus in possession, and while it was thus his duty to pay the taxes upon said premises, the defendant neglected and failed to pay the same, and, although the said land had been duly assessed, prior thereto on the taxbooks of said county in the name of the said Mrs. M. A. Ammons, the auditor for said county neglected and failed to bring the same forward on the books as an assessment against Mrs. M. A. Ammons, but procured the said land to be advertised and sold for delinquent taxes as belonging to person or persons unknown; that under such sale the defendant herein became the purchaser, well knowing that the said tract of land was known to belong to the said Mrs. M. A. Ammons and her daughters aforesaid, and while he was in possession of the same, and while it was his duty to pay the taxes thereon, and he received a deed therefor from the sheriff of said county, dated June 23, 1892; that said defendant neglected and failed to record the said deed in the office of the clerk of the court for said county until the present year, 1902, soon after the plaintiffs required of him the possession of said lands; that the said tax sale, the assessment of said taxes, and the said deed executed to the defendant are null and void under the law.

"Fifth. That the defendant has received and enjoyed all the rents, incomes, and profits from the said premises since June 23, 1892, aggregating the sum of two hundred dollars, and should be required to pay the same to the plaintiff.

"Wherefore the plaintiffs demand judgment against the defendant (1) for the possession of said property; (2) for the sum of one hundred dollars damages against the defendant for his unlawful withholding the same from the plaintiff; (3) that said sheriff's tax deed may be canceled and set aside; (4) for the sum of two hundred dollars, the rents and profits unlawfully received and enjoyed by the defendant; (5) for such other relief as may be just and for costs."

The order appealed from is as follows:

"This cause was called for trial, jury impaneled, and pleadings read. Upon motion of defendant's attorneys, the trial by jury was confined to the legal cause of action alleged, and the equitable issue reserved for subsequent disposition. The defendant's attorney then interposed a demurrer, with written specifications, upon the ground that the complaint, as to the legal cause of action, failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained for the reason that the complaint showed upon its face that the plaintiffs had no right to recover the land, which was alleged therein to have been sold by the sheriff for taxes delinquent between 1887 and 1892, and title deed thereto made by the sheriff to B. H. Boykin, June 23, 1892. It also appeared by the complaint that B. H. Boykin had been in possession of the land since 1892 under the sheriff's deed. All presumptions of validity of prerequisites are by statute in favor of the sheriff's tax deed and title thereunder, and after the lapse of two years, with possession under such deed, all presumption became absolute and conclusive. The two-years limitation as to tax title is not as the ordinary or Code limitations. No disability is made an exception in this special limitation, which is a limitation upon the right and title, rather than of the remedy and right of action.

"The causes of action being mingled in the complaint, it may be read and taken as a whole as to each cause of action. The legal cause being separated for trial, the demurrer applies to that cause, and as to that it is sustained. The equitable cause is left for future consideration and determination."

The exceptions, seven in number, impute error in the action of the court, and in the several reasons assigned therefor.

We think the order must be reversed. The first three paragraphs unquestionably state a cause of action for recovery of land, and damages for unlawfully withholding the same. While it is true that a complaint may state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and then state other facts which in law defeat a recovery, so as to make the complaint demurrable for insufficiency (Jarrell v. R. Co., 58 S. C. 491, 36 S. E. 910), we do not think such has been done in this case. The fourth paragraph of the complaint does state that the defendant received a deed from the sheriff under a tax sale of said land dated June 23, 1892, and it is true that under section 426, Civ. Code 1902, vol. 1, such a deed is prima facie evidence of a good title; but the same paragraph proceeds to state other facts, which, if established (and on demurrer they are to be treated as admitted), must overthrow such prima facie evidence, and make the deed null and void for fraud, or estop the defendant from asserting his deed against the plaintiffs. Association v. Waters, 50 S. C. 460, 27 S. E. 948. It must be remembered that courts of law have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of equity in matters of fraud, and it is accordingly well settled that in an action to recover real estate a party may, on the trial of the legal issues, attack for fraud a deed relied on by his antagonist. McCreery Land Investment Co. v. Myers, 49 S. E. 848. The plaintiffs here may have done this in reply to defendant's tender of the sheriff's deed, without specially pleading the fraud. If so, the mere allegation of the sheriff's deed as defendant's claim of title, coupled with facts which, if true, would overthrow it as a defense, could not operate to destroy plaintiff's cause of action, whatever effect such allegations may have in shifting the burden of proof in the first instance.

Nor do we think that plaintiff's cause of action for the recovery of the land in question is defeated by the allegation that defendant received the sheriff's deed under tax sale in June, 1892; the action having been commenced in May, 1902. Section 426, Civ. Code 1902, vol. 1, provides as follows: "In all cases of sale, the sheriff's deed of conveyance, whether executed to a private person, a corporation, or the sinking fund commission, shall be held and taken as prima facie evidence of a good title in the holder, and that all proceedings have been regular, and all the requirements of the law have been duly complied with. No action for the recovery of land sold by the sheriff under the provisions of this article, or for the recovery of the possession thereof, shall be maintained unless brought within two years from the date of said sale." It is asserted with reference to this statute that the two-years limitation is a limitation affecting the right and title, rather than the remedy and right of action, and that, after two years' possession under the sheriff's deed, all presumption that prerequisites have been complied with is conclusive. "Where time is of the essence of the right created, and the limitation is an inherent part of the statute, there is no right of action independent of the limitation. Such special limitation extinguishes the right, rather than affects the remedy." 19 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 151, and cases cited in note 6; Dennis, Adm'r v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., 49 S. E. 869. This distinction, however, does not apply to the statute quoted. The statute creates no right of action, but is a mere limitation on the assertion of a right of action existing at common law and independent of the statute. Hence the statute is a pure statute of limitation, affecting the remedy, not the right, and must be affected by the disability of infancy of plaintiffs, as alleged in the complaint.

These views render it unnecessary to further consider the grounds of appeal.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

HYLAND v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 2, 1904.)

OPINION EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR—OBJECTIONS WAIVED—MORTALITY TABLE—INJURY TO SERVANT—SAFE APPLIANCES—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—FELLOW SERVANT.

1. A nonexpert witness may testify that after examination he thought a person was seriously hurt and knocked senseless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig., Evidence, §§ 2187, 2238, 2239.]

2. The admission of hearsay evidence is harmless where the same fact is established by competent evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig., Appeal and Error, §§ 4161, 4165, 4172.]

3. Where evidence is brought out by the suggestion of appellant's counsel, he cannot object thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig., Appeal and Error, § 3597.]

4. Where no objection is made to incompetent evidence, and other witnesses testify to the same fact, it becomes competent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig., Trial, § 261.]

5. Where a witness testified to knowledge of a custom, and stated what it was, an objection thereto cannot be first raised on appeal.

6. Under 24 St. at Large, p. 96, establishing a mortality table, it is admissible in all cases when necessary to establish the expectancy of the life of any person from any period of his life, whether he be living at the time or not. Held, that such table is admissible in evidence as to expectancy of life in an action for injuries to a living person where there is any evidence that the injuries are permanent.

7. An indefinite exception will be overruled.

8. The duty of a master to furnish proper tools and appliances so far as appliances are concerned embraces human instrumentalities as well as mechanical devices.

9. A servant does not assume the risk of negligence of the master in conducting the work nor in selecting servants.

10. Where a master has exercised due care in the employment of a fellow servant, and the negligence of such servant results in an injury to the plaintiff, his fellow servant, the master is not chargeable therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig., Master and Servant, §§ 336, 352.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Jos. A. McCullough, Special Judge.

Action by Philip H. Hyland against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nelson & Nelson and Hunt Chipley, for appellant. Thomas & Gibbs, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. The following statement of the action is made by the plaintiff, which we adopt as a proper statement of the issues, thus presenting a copy of the pleadings: "This is an action for the recovery of damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the employment of the defendant on the 20th day of March, 1902. In the afternoon of the said day the plaintiff, with several other workmen, was engaged, under the direction of a foreman, in erecting poles, stringing wires, and doing other work incident to the construction of a telephone line for the defendant along the southern side of Gervais street, a public highway much traveled by pedestrians, bicycles, and vehicles, near its intersection with Pine street, in the eastern suburbs of the city of Columbia, about one square beyond the corporate limits. At this point a private telephone line had been constructed along Pine street and across Gervais street, and in order to facilitate the stringing of the wires of the defendant's proposed line the defendant's foreman had caused the wires of the private line to be cut and lie across Gervais street. The wires of the defendant's proposed line having been strung across Pine street, the foreman directed the plaintiff, who was just then returning to his work from the city of Columbia, whither he had gone on an errand for the defendant, to reconnect the said wires of the private line across Gervais street. This the plaintiff undertook to do, and with that end in view had climbed the telephone pole, upon which the desired connection was directed to be made, to a height of about 25 feet above the ground, carrying one of the said wires coiled about his right arm and shoulder, when a bicyclist, approaching the city on his bicycle along Gervais street, ran against and became entangled with the said wire, causing the plaintiff to be precipitated from his position on the pole to the ground with great force, whereby the plaintiff's collar bone was broken, his shoulder and back wrenched, bruised, and strained, and his person otherwise seriously injured. It is alleged in the complaint that the said injuries were caused by the negligence and recklessness of the defendant in failing to provide and put in charge of the work of constructing said line, with plaintiff, careful and competent workmen, and in providing and putting in charge of the work careless, ignorant, and incompetent workmen, and in failing to furnish safe, suitable, and proper tackle, tools, implements, and appliances to raise, or enable plaintiff to raise, said wire to said pole, and in requiring plaintiff to carry said wire up said pole as aforesaid with the end thereof looped about his arm and shoulder, and in requiring plaintiff to raise and attach said wire in the manner aforesaid while the slack thereof lay upon and was suspended over said Gervais street, in imminent peril to plaintiff and to passengers along said street, and in failing to take proper precautions or keep a proper lookout to prevent such passengers from colliding with said wire, and in causing and permitting said bicycle and its rider to run into and become entangled with said wire as aforesaid.' The answer, for a first defense, denies the negligence, recklessness, and extent of injuries as alleged; and for a second defense avers that the alleged accident and injuries to the plaintiff were caused by his contributory negligence in not exercising due care and caution, and, if there was any risk connected with the work in which plaintiff was engaged at the time of his alleged injuries, he (the plaintiff) voluntarily assumed the same."

Upon these issues the action was tried before Special Judge Joseph A. McCollough and a jury at the fall term of the court of common pleas of Richland county, at Columbia, S. C., and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. After entry of judgment upon said verdict, the defendant appealed to this court upon the following grounds, to wit:

"(1) Because, against the objection of defendant, his honor admitted in evidence the statement of the witness Hiller L. Leadford in the words: 'He [the plaintiff] seemed to be very seriously hurt, was knocked senseless, and, I understood, had his collar bone broken, and was otherwise injured;' such statement being incompetent, because: First, it embodied a mere opinion of a non-expert witness; and, second, it was hearsay.

"(2) Because, against the objection of defendant, his honor admitted in evidence the statement of the witness Philip H. Hyland in the words: 'I took them [the defendant's employes] to be experienced men; that is, for all-round workmen;' such statement being incompetent, because it embodied a mere opinion of a nonexpert witness.

"(3) Because, against the objection of defendant, his honor admitted in evidence the statement of the witness Philip H. Hyland in the words: 'The practice is to leave a man on the crossing, and to guard them, to look out for wagons and whatever may be the traffic;' such statement presenting to the jury a practice or custom as a rule of conduct in a matter in which, according to law, the practice or custom raises no rule of conduct.

"(4) Because, against the objection of defendant, his honor admitted in evidence the statement of the witness Wm. Perry in the words: 'It is the custom, when wires block either the street or sidewalk, to have somebody there to notify people coming along, either pedestrians or vehicles;' such statement presenting to the jury a practice or custom as a rule of conduct in a matter in which, according to law, the practice or custom raises no rule of conduct.

"(5) Because, against the objection of defendant, his honor admitted in evidence the statement of the witness Wm. Perry in the words: 'I have noticed other people and vehicles being stopped on account of wires across the street; have been stopped myself;' such statement constituting no evidence competent to establish practice or custom.

"(6) Because, against the objection of defendant, his honor admitted in evidence the mortuary table passed by the General Assembly of South Carolina (24 St. at Large, p. 96); such table being incompetent in a case where the wrong complained of did not result in the death or total disability of the party injured.

"(7) Because, against the objection of defendant, his honor admitted in evidence the opinion of the witness R. H. Smith as to the duty of the defendant's foreman in a given case; such opinion being incompetent, because, first, it related to a matter in which opinion evidence is not competent; second, and witness gave no reason for his opinion; and, third, it purported to establish the relations of parties to a contract to which the witness was a stranger, and of which he had no knowledge.

"(8) That his honor charged that the master must furnish the servant with appropriate and suitable tools and appliances; such unqualified statement being erroneous in its application to this case, for the reason that the undisputed proof on the trial was that the plaintiff had contracted with the defendant to furnish himself the tools and appliances needed in the work in which he was, when injured, engaged as an employé of the defendant.

"(9) For that his honor submitted to the jury the question, 'Did the master discharge that duty in furnishing safe, suitable, appropriate appliances?' the undisputed proof on the trial being that the plaintiff had contracted with the defendant to furnish himself the tools and appliances needed in the work in which he was, when injured, engaged as an employé of the defendant.

"(10) For that his honor refused to charge that 'a servant having consented to serve in the way and manner in which the business was being conducted, has no ground of complaint, even if reasonable precautions have been neglected; and will be deemed to have assumed all risks naturally and reasonably incident to his employment, and to have notice of all risks which to a person of his experience and understanding are, or ought to be, obvious'—the proposition thus rejected being correct in law, and applicable to the issues herein.

"(11) For that his honor refused to charge that, 'To show negligence in the defendant, it must be made to appear that the danger was such that the plaintiff could not be presumed to know it, and that the defendant did not give him information of it. If he knew and appreciated the danger, he cannot recover'—the proposition thus rejected being correct in law and applicable to the issues herein.

"(12) For that his honor refused to charge that: 'If the place is obviously unsafe, so as to charge the servant with knowledge thereof, and he nevertheless enters upon the work, he assumes the risk. As a general rule, if the servant injured knows that the force for work is insufficient, he will be held to have assumed the risk, and waived the obligation of the company in this respect as to himself, and if injured by means of such delinquency he is without remedy—the propositions thus rejected being correct in law, and applicable to the issues herein.”

We will now consider defendant's ground of appeal, and will adopt the grouping of these exceptions. We will therefore divide the exceptions into two or three classes, viz., 1 to 7, inclusive, relating to alleged errors of the circuit judge in relation to the admission of testimony; second, 8 and 9, relating to alleged errors in the circuit judge's charge to the jury; and, third, the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth exceptions relating to alleged errors of the circuit judge in refusing to charge certain requests to charge.

1. (a) Objection to Hiller L. Leadford's testimony: We do not attach much attention to this allegation of error. The witness saw plaintiff immediately after his fall. He examined him, and found him in a senseless condition. So far, no error. The witness thought him seriously hurt. No objection to this. He heard that plaintiff's collar bone was broken and was otherwise injured. This was hearsay. But no harm resulted to the defendant therefrom. Dr. R. A. Gibbs, an expert, told the same facts in his testimony, and the plaintiff explained his injuries in his testimony. Garrick v. R. R. Co., 53 S. C. 451, 31 S. E. 334, 60 Am. St. Rep. 874; Rakestraw v. Floyd, 54 S. C. 293, 32 S. E. 419; Perry v. Jefferies, 61 S. C. 304, 39 S. E. 515; Watts v. R. R. Co., 60 S. C. 70, 38 S. E. 240; Mathis v. R. R. Co., 53 S. C. 246, 31 S. E. 240; Youngblood v. R. R. Co., 60 S. C. 9, 38 S. E. 232, 85 Am. St. Rep. 824, and Smith v. Brabham, 48 S. C. 340, 26 S. E. 651.

(b) Objection to testimony of plaintiff for the reason that he testified that he took his fellow workmen to be experienced men—that is, for all-round workmen—“such statement being incompetent because it embodied a mere opinion of a nonexpert witness.” Now, here is what occurred when the witness testified: “Can you tell the jury whether they [the hands] were old, experienced men, or whether new hands? Mr. Nelson: We object. He says he does not know how long they were at work. He can testify as to whether they did work in a workmanlike manner and as men of experience. The Court: He can tell whether they worked as an experienced man. Answer: I took them to be experienced men; that is, for all-round workmen.” Nothing was said by defendant's attorneys after this answer. Other testimony of a similar character was given by defendant's witnesses. We see no objection to this examination of the witness. It was caused by the suggestion of Mr. Nelson, and was in favor of his client, the defendant.

(c) So far as this ground of appeal is concerned, we cannot support it, because Hyland testified that it was the practice and custom to leave a man on the crossing to guard them, to look out for wagons and whatever may be the traffic. No objection was taken as to this testimony. It was thus made competent in this case. On pages 9 and 10, the whole matter is made clear. Besides, other witnesses testified as to this custom. See, also, 27 Ency. of Law, pp. 899 to 902; 20 Ency. of Law (2d Ed.); 21 Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) at page 524. Our own case of Bodie v. R. R., 61 S. C. 488, 39 S. E. 715, and 66 S. C. 303, 44 S. E. 943, seems to be conclusive.

(d) The objection to the testimony of Wm. Perry is of a kindred nature. This witness testified that he knew the custom, and no objection was taken. This ground of appeal is untenable.

(e) The objection here raised as to the testimony of witness Wm. Perry is to the same effect as that to which we have already ruled. The question was competent.

(f) This objection relates to the competency of the mortuary table provided by the General Assembly of this state. 24 St. at Large, p. 96. It was objected to on the ground that this act only related to cases where there was loss of life, and not applicable where the person injured is still living. By the express language of the statute it is admissible in all cases in which “it shall be necessary to establish the expectancy of continued life of any person from any period of such person's life, whether he be living at the time or not.” (Italics ours.) In 20 Enc. Law (2d Ed.) at page 883, this language is used: “Mortality tables are admissible in evidence whenever the probable duration of a person's life is a material issue in a case. Thus, in actions for personal injuries, when the injury is of a permanent character, and in actions for death by wrongful act, in estimating damages, the expectancy of life of the person injured is an essential element, and to show such expectancy standard mortality tables are admissible in evidence.” The United States Supreme Court, in Vicksburg Railroad Company v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545, 555, 7 Sup. Ct. 1, 30 L. Ed. 257, held: “In the present case it was not suggested by the defendant at the trial that the life tables admitted in evidence were not standard tables, or not duly authenticated. The only ground assigned for the objection to their competency was that ‘the plaintiff has not shown a case in which such evidence is admissible, the plaintiff not having been killed or permanently disabled.’ It is a sufficient answer to this objection that there was evidence from which the jury might conclude that the plaintiff's disability was permanent.” We overrule this ground of appeal.

(g) This exception is too indefinite. “In a given case”—what case is given or meant? It is therefore overruled.

2. Exceptions 8 and 9 relate to alleged errors in judge's charge. Eight refers to the charge of his honor touching the duty of the master in supplying the servants with appropriate tools and appliances. It was only in proof here that the servant who was required himself to possess certain tools; not, however, "hand ropes" or appliances. In the two cases—Bodie v. R. R. Co., supra, and Hicks v. R. R. Co., 63 S. C. 560, 41 S. E. 753—it has been held that tools and appliances, so far as appliances are concerned, embrace or include human instrumentalities as well as mechanical devices. The duty of the master to the servant is elementary law. We cannot, therefore, sustain the eighth exception. Exception 9, from the foregoing views, is untenable, for under the issues here raised it was the duty of the circuit judge to submit this question to the jury, "Did the master discharge that duty in furnishing safe, suitable, appropriate appliances?" See our views expressed under eighth ground of appeal. It is overruled.

3. This division refers to the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth grounds of appeal. "(10) A servant, having consented to serve in the way and manner in which the business was being conducted, has no ground of complaint, even if reasonable precautions have been neglected, and will be deemed to have assumed all risks naturally and reasonably incident to his employment, and to have notice of all risks which to a person of his experience and understanding are, or ought to be, obvious." The judge said: "I can't charge you that way, because it is a question for you to determine, under the charge as I have given you, whether or not the risk was assumed under the particular circumstances of the case." Now, what had the presiding judge said to the jury? "There is another defense. The telephone company says, 'You assumed this risk.' What does that mean? That means when the servant enters the employment of the master there are certain risks necessarily incident to that employment, certain hazards he must necessarily run. The law says he assumes those risks, and it says, furthermore, if there are patent, glaring hazards, obvious dangers, and the servant enters upon the employment of the master with knowledge of these hazards—knowledge of these dangers—and continues in his employment, the jury may say, under these facts, that the servant, while he may not have expressly agreed to do so, but by his conduct tacitly agreed to relieve the master of the consequences of the defects. In other words, the question of waiver, the question of assumption—that the servant has assumed these risks: 'I knew of these dangers; I knew of these defects; I, by my conduct, agreed to assume the dangers necessarily incident to this employment.' If he does that, he cannot complain. It is an assumption of risk. The telephone company says, 'You are injured by the negligence of a fellow servant, and I did not agree to guaranty you against the result of the negligence of a fellow servant.' What does that mean? It means this: Here are two men engaged in an ordinary avocation of duty under charge of a superior. Now, these two men, when they are thus engaged, are fellow servants; and common sense comes in there. One of these servants knows that the master is not responsible for the act of negligence of a fellow servant. If the master has exercised due care in the employment of the fellow servant, if he has discharged his duty there, then the negligence of the fellow servant, if it result in injury to the other servant, the master is not chargeable with. But, gentlemen, that 'fellow servant' means one servant does not assume the risk of another servant if not engaged in the business for which he was employed; neither is he responsible for it; neither is he responsible for the negligence of the person who represents the master—the man who has the right to control and direct the services of the injured party; in other words, that person, like a centurion, says to this man, 'Go, and he goeth; 'Come, and he cometh; 'Do this, and he doeth it.' If such person had that kind of authority, his negligence—the servant does not assume the consequences of his negligence." It seems to us the circuit judge made no mistake in his charge. This exception is overruled.

(11) The circuit judge, in his charge to the jury, correctly laid down the law as referred to in this exception, and it is therefore overruled.

"(12) For that his honor refused to charge that, if the place is obviously unsafe, so as to charge the servant with knowledge thereof, and he nevertheless enters upon the work, he assumes the risk. As a general rule, if the servant injured knows that the force for work is insufficient, he will be held to have assumed the risk and waived the obligation of the company in this respect as to himself, and, if injured by means of such delinquency, he is without remedy." There is no necessity to consider this exception at any length, for there are no facts developed in the testimony which bear even remotely upon this proposition of law. If there is no testimony supporting this proposition of law, the circuit judge had no business making any such charge. The issues in this action are clear cut, but amongst those issues the one now referred to does not appear. This ground of appeal is overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

LEWARK et al. v. NORFOLK & S. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1905.)

CARRIERS—LOSS OF GOODS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. In an action against a carrier for loss of a consignment of ice shipped by plaintiffs to themselves, plaintiffs were not entitled to recover for the loss of fish, for the packing of which they intended to use the ice, in the absence of any evidence that the carrier knew or should have known that the ice was intended for that purpose; the damages being limited to the value of the ice at destination at the time it should have arrived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by H. Lewark and others against the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for less than the relief demanded, they appeal. Affirmed.

E. F. Aydlett, for appellants. Pruden & Pruden, for appellee.

BROWN, J. On November 14, 1902, the plaintiffs had shipped from Norfolk, Va., to themselves, at Church Island, N. C., two tons of ice, over the defendant's line. The ice was never delivered, although, by due course, it should have reached Church Island the same day it was shipped. It was admitted the plaintiffs were dealers in fish, and desired the ice for their own use. The sole exception in the record presents the question as to the measure of damages. His honor in the court below charged the jury that the measure of damages was the value of the ice at Church Island on November 14, 1902. To this instruction the plaintiffs excepted. We find no error in the instruction. The general rule for the measure of damage is tersely stated in Ashe v. De Rosset, 50 N. C. 299, 72 Am. Dec. 552: "When one violates his contract, he is liable only for such damages as are caused by the breach, or such, as being incidental to the act of omission or commission, as the natural consequences thereof may reasonably be presumed to have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made." In the well-known case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exc. 341, the plaintiff sought to recover damages which grew out of the special circumstances under which the contract was made, i. e., the stopping of plaintiff's mill in consequence of the non-delivery of a shaft which was necessary to, and was ordered for, its operation. This was refused, and the court says in respect to it: "If the special circumstances under which the contract was made were communicated to the defendant, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract in the special circumstances so known and communicated. But on the other hand, if these special circumstances were unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at most, could only be supposed to have had in contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally and in the great number of cases, not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract." See, also, Boyle v. Reader, 23 N. C. 607; Foard v. Railroad, 53 N. C. 235, 78 Am. Dec.

277. The plaintiffs' contention is that the measure of damage is the loss on fish. Such damages are too remote, and could not have reasonably been within contemplation of the defendant company when it accepted the ice for shipment. "If every one were answerable for all the consequences of his acts, no one could tell what were his liabilities at any moment." 3 Parsons on Cont. (5th Ed.) 179. "Every defendant shall be liable for those consequences which might have been foreseen and accepted as the result of his conduct, and not for those he could not have foreseen, and therefore was under no moral obligation to take into his consideration." Id. 5. When the defendant accepted the ice at Norfolk for shipment, it could not foresee that the plaintiffs' fish would be spoiled, or that the ice could be used for packing fish. The defendant did not know that plaintiffs had any fish at the time the ice was shipped, nor is there any evidence that defendant knew it at any time. If the plaintiffs had shown by evidence that the defendant knew or should have known, from facts and circumstances connected with the shipment, or otherwise, that the ice was intended by the plaintiffs for packing fish, the plaintiffs would have brought their case within the exception to the general rule. We have examined the evidence with care, and fail to find any which could reasonably bring to the defendant's knowledge the fact that the shipment was other than an ordinary shipment. It had no knowledge of the special purpose. Neal v. Hardware Co., 122 N. C. 105, 29 S. E. 96, 65 Am. St. Rep. 697, pressed upon our attention by the plaintiffs' counsel in his brief and oral argument, differs materially from the case at bar. Tobacco flues are different commodities. Ice is something of general, everyday use all the year round, and required for many different purposes. Persons living in localities where tobacco is cultivated are presumed to know what a tobacco flue is intended for, and that, if tobacco is not cured promptly when cut, serious loss will result. In Sledge v. Reid, 73 N. C. 440, Mr. Justice Bynum says: "The loss of the crop, though following the loss of the mule, was neither a necessary nor natural consequence. * * * The value of the mule taken, and the hire of another, is the measure of the plaintiff's damage. Anything beyond this would be too remote and conjectural, and would lead the courts into a boundless field of investigation." See, also, Wood's Mayne on Damages, §§ 26, 40. It is useless to multiply authorities, as the measure of damages in contracts for the sale or delivery of personal property has been discussed in many cases in the recent Reports of this court, and we find nothing in any of them to support the plaintiffs' contention.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

CONNOR, J., concurs in result.

WARD v. GAY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1905.)

EVIDENCE—WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS—ALTERATION—EXPLANATION—PAROL TESTIMONY—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

1. A contract conveying standing timber is a contract concerning realty, which must be in writing, and which cannot be altered or added to by parol testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Frauds, Statute of, § 117.]

2. Descriptive words in a contract for the sale of timber, "All the pine, poplar and cypress trees now standing and growing on in the swamp on the following lands," situated in a certain township and county, and containing a certain number of acres, while sufficient to pass the property, are so indefinite in relation to an island in the swamp as to require the aid of parol testimony in order to ascertain and declare their true meaning.

3. Where descriptive words in a contract conveying timber are sufficient to pass the property, but are so indefinite as to require parol testimony to ascertain their true meaning, the question as to what is actually conveyed is one for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

On the 7th of April, 1900, the plaintiff, by writing, sealed and delivered, conveyed to the defendant all the timber trees standing and growing in a certain swamp, "down to and upwards of 12 inches across the stump." This swamp contained about 50 acres, and within the boundary of the swamp was an island from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 acres, on which, and above high-water mark, were growing trees of the above dimensions, sufficient to make from 19,000 to 21,000 feet of lumber. The defendant, claiming to act under this deed, cut the timber growing in the swamp, including that growing on the island above high-water mark, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use. Plaintiff then instituted the present action, and filed his complaint, alleging that it was not the contract between the parties that the timber on the island growing above high-water mark should pass, and that the clause excepting such portion of the timber was omitted from the deed by mistake; second, that, in any event, the portion of the timber on the island above high-water mark was wrongfully cut and carried away by the defendant, because, by the terms of the deed, as it stood, this portion of the timber was excepted. The defendant, admitting the conveyance, denied the allegation of mistake, and claimed the right under the contract to cut all the timber within the swamp, including the timber on the island. On the pleadings three issues were submitted to the jury: (1) Was the provision excepting the trees on the ridges omitted by mutual mistake of the parties, or by mistake of the draftsman? (2) Did defendant wrongfully cut timber from lands of plaintiff not included in the contract? (3) If so, what damage has plaintiff sustained? Both parties introduced evidence, and, under the charge of the court, the jury, as appears from the record, responded to the first issue "No," and to the second "Yes," and to the third "\$57." The defendant excepted to the charge of the court on the second issue, and moved for a new trial for the alleged error. Motion was overruled, the defendant again excepting. There was judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

HOKE, J. (after stating the case). The descriptive words of the instrument are as follows: "All the pine, poplar and cypress trees now standing and growing on in the swamp on the following lands, situated in Mintonville Township, Gates County, State of North Carolina, and known as a part of the Jordan lands in the swamp bounded by the lands of Leander Howard and Elijah Modlin, leading from said A. J. Ward's grist mill to Old Town on Cathron Creek, and others, and containing 50 acres, more or less." The jury, having answered the first issue "No," and thereby found that there was no mistake in the deed, the question of the defendant's liability was made to turn on the instrument as now written. In that aspect of the case, and in his charge to the jury on the second issue, the court instructed them that "the timber growing on the island above high-water mark did not pass under the contract, and that the defendant would be liable for timber cut, unless it was agreed between the parties that the timber on the island was to be included under the contract," and to this instruction the defendant excepted.

In this charge, as we understand it, the court instructed the jury that by the terms of the instrument, as now expressed, the timber on the island above high-water mark would not pass to the defendant, and that, if such timber did pass, it must do so by an agreement to that effect between the parties not now contained in the written agreement, and in this we think there was error to the prejudice of the defendant, which entitles him to a new trial. Where parties have reduced their contract to writing, and the instrument contains their entire agreement, it is not permissible for them to alter or add to same by parol testimony of contemporaneous expressions, or alleged contemporaneous agreements, which change or conflict with their written agreement. Where the written terms contained in the contract are sufficient to pass the property, but are ambiguous or indefinite, then parol evidence of the expressions of the parties, and attendant facts and circumstances, may be heard to aid in ascertaining the correct meaning of the terms used, but not to alter or add to what has been written. In the present case the verdict of the jury finds, in response to the first issue, that there was no mistake in the terms of the contract. Apart from this, the contract itself, conveying, as it does, the timber standing and growing on the ground, is a contract concerning realty, its terms are required to be in writing, and it was not permissible to alter or add to these terms by parol evidence. This doctrine on contracts concerning realty is very clearly expressed in the case of Miles v. Barrows, 122 Mass. 581. In this case the court said: "A conveyance of land can only be by deed, and parol evidence is not admissible to control or vary a deed. If the description in it is certain and unambiguous, it is not competent to prove that the parties had any intention different from that expressed. But if, upon applying the deed to the land, it is found to be ambiguous, parol evidence of the surrounding circumstances and of the acts of the parties is competent to aid in the interpretation of the deed, and to enable the court to ascertain what was the intention of the parties in the words they have used." An interesting discussion of the general question will be found in the opinion of Mr. Justice Walker in the case of Cobb v. Clegg, 137 N. C. —, 49 S. E. 80.

Again, the descriptive words, "All the pine, poplar, cypress trees," etc., as set out in the beginning of this opinion, while sufficient to pass the property and permit parol testimony in order to aid in their interpretation, are at the same time so indefinite as to require the aid of such testimony in order to ascertain and declare their true meaning. They are ambiguous and uncertain, and present a case for the jury to determine what the deed conveys, after hearing all the pertinent facts and attendant circumstances. Rowe v. Lumber Co., 133 N. C. 433, 45 S. E. 830; Brooks v. Britt, 15 N. C. 481. Similar decisions on ambiguous terms of like import will be found in Sargent v. Adams, 3 Gray (Mass.) 72; a. c., reported in 63 Am. Dec. 718; also in Doolittle v. Blakesley, 4 Day (Conn.) 265; a. c., 4 Am. Dec. 218. In telling the jury that the timber growing on the island did not pass under the contract, his honor withdrew from the jury the very question they should have been required to determine.

There will be a new trial on all the issues arising on the pleadings, with the words "not included in the contract" eliminated from the second issue, and in case it is again found that there was no mistake in the deed, and the question of the defendant's responsibility is again submitted on the contract as now written, it must be left to the jury to determine on all the pertinent facts and circumstances whether the timber in dispute was included in the descriptive terms of the deed.

New trial.

BREWSTER v. ELIZABETH CITY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—DEFECTIVE STREETS —INJURIES—PEDESTRIANS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

1. In order to show contributory negligence, both the commission of a negligent act and a connection of that act with the injury as the proximate cause thereof must concur.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, §§ 83, 112-114.]

2. One approaching a bridge on a highway is not guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in stepping on the bridge, where the planking was defective, while looking to one side observing a workman cutting down a tree; but whether he is guilty of negligence in so doing, or not, is a question for the jury.

3. Whether the act of a pedestrian in stepping on a defective bridge in the highway while looking to one side watching a workman cutting down a tree was the proximate cause of injury to her, held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Matilda Brewster against Elizabeth City. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. F. Aydlett and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellant. J. Heywood Sawyer and R. W. Turner, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover damages for an injury alleged to have been sustained in crossing a bridge which was out of repair, and which constituted a part of a public street of the defendant. Among other defenses, contributory negligence is pleaded, and all of the plaintiff's exceptions relate to the charge of the court upon that issue. The evidence was in substance as follows: The plaintiff lives in Danielson, Conn., and is 72 years of age. While in the defendant town on a visit, she was walking along Cypress street on the 22d of April, 1903, with two other ladies, and they came to a bridge at the corner of Cypress and Road streets. One of her companions was in the middle, the other on the outside, and the plaintiff was on the inside of the sidewalk leading up to the bridge. Her companion who was on the outside stepped on the end of the middle plank of the bridge, the other end flew up and tripped the plaintiff, and she fell and injured herself. The bridge was composed of three stringers and three planks, each an inch thick, about eight inches wide, and eight feet long. The bridge, according to the finding of the jury, though there was evidence on both sides of that question, was out of repair and in an unsafe condition. The plaintiff was seriously injured. At the time of the injury a tree was being cut down in a yard adjacent to the bridge. The plaintiff and her two companions were coming down Cypress street towards the bridge, and all three of them were looking away at the tree being cut down, when her outside companion stepped on the end of the middle plank of the bridge and tipped up the other end, which tripped the plaintiff, and she fell and was seriously injured.

The jury answered the issue as to negligence "Yes," and the second issue as to contributory negligence "Yes." The court gave five separate instructions upon the second issue, to all of which the plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff offered no requests for particular instructions, and therefore cannot well complain of "errors of omission."

The court instructed the jury: (1) "If you find by the greater weight of evidence that the plaintiff in crossing the bridge, even though you find that the bridge was unsafe and defective, failed to exercise that caution and care which a person of ordinary prudence should, and which it is their duty to do, in using the streets and sidewalks of the city, and because of her failure to exercise this caution and prudence she was injured, then she would be guilty of contributory negligence, and you would answer the second issue 'Yes.'" (3) The court further instructed the jury that "if the plaintiff could have passed over the bridge safely by exercising ordinary care, or could have stopped in time to avoid the injury, and failed to do so, then her injury was caused by her own negligence, and the plaintiff cannot recover."

We find error in the above instruction numbered 3, as well as in Nos. 2, 4, and 5, for which a new trial must be granted. Had his honor given instruction No. 1, with the addition that the jury must find that the plaintiff's negligence was the immediate or proximate cause of the injury, and explain what is meant by proximate cause, such instruction would have been plainly within the rule of the "prudent man," as laid down in Hinshaw v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1047, 24 S. E. 426, Ellerbe v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1024, 24 S. E. 808, and Sheldon v. Asheville, 119 N. C. 610, 25 S. E. 781. The third instruction given above is erroneous, in that it assumes that if the plaintiff failed to exercise reasonable care, then her neglect was the proximate cause of her injury.

In order to constitute contributory negligence, the plaintiff must have committed a negligent act, and such negligent conduct must have been the proximate cause of the injury. The two must concur, and be proved by the defendant by the clear weight of evidence. A failure to establish proximate cause, although negligence be proved, is fatal to the plea. That walking on a bridge, a part of a public street, with the head momentarily turned, observing workmen trimming a tree, is per se negligence, we are not prepared to hold. It is exceedingly difficult for a court to define and prescribe every act which one, using the public thoroughfares of a city, may do without being guilty of such carelessness as constitutes negligence, and it is equally difficult to determine what acts such persons may not do. "It is essentially the province of the jury to pass on such conduct under proper instructions, and to such acts it is best to apply the rule of the 'prudent man,' unless only one inference can be drawn. * * * When the negligence is not so clearly shown that the court can pronounce upon it as matter of law, the case should go to the jury with proper instructions." Walker, J., in Graves v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 3, 48 S. E. 508. Where reasonable minds may come to different conclusions upon considering the facts in evidence, the jury are at liberty to apply the rule of the "prudent man." Sheldon v. Asheville, supra. The court below practically charged that the plaintiff's alleged conduct was the immediate cause of her injury. That was erroneous.

The first requisite of proximate cause is the doing or omitting to do an act which a person of ordinary prudence could foresee might naturally or probably produce the injury complained of, and the second requisite is that such act or omission did actually cause the injury. Coley v. Statesville, 121 N. C. 301, 28 S. E. 482. The proximate cause is the last negligent act without which the injury would not have resulted. Schwartz v. Shull, 45 W. Va. 405, 31 S. E. 914. Assuming that the plaintiff was looking back at the moment the defective plank flew up and, by tripping her, caused her to fall, how could his honor determine that if she had been looking ahead she would not have been injured? She had a right to assume that the bridge was safe and in good repair when she entered on it. The entire evidence shows the three ladies were walking side by side; that Mrs. Wilson stepped on the end of a defectively fastened plank; that instantly the other end flew up and threw the plaintiff down just at the moment she had lifted her foot and was about to step on that end of the plank. Suppose the plaintiff had been looking the usual distance ahead that prudent persons generally look when walking, is it probable she would have seen the end of the plank "pop up" at her feet in time to have prevented being thrown to the ground? Where there were no guard rails to a bridge, and injuries resulted to a runaway mule and its driver by falling from the bridge, it was held that the absence of guard rails, and not the conduct of the driver or the running away of the mule, was the proximate cause of the disaster. Augusta v. Hudson, 94 Ga. 135, 21 S. E. 289. There is no evidence of facts or circumstances from which we can infer that the injury would probably not have resulted from the "popping up" of the defective plank had the plaintiff walked with "Argus eyes," looking forward, and had not turned her head to observe the workmen trim the tree. It is highly probable that many prudent persons would have done just what the plaintiff did, in the confident belief that the highways of the city were kept in safe condition. The most active and alert of men, much less an aged lady, may have stepped on that bridge with most vigilant outlook for obstacles ahead, and yet have been unable to observe the plank "pop up" at the feet, just as he was about to step on it, in time to avoid injury.

Tested by the definition given, as well as by the general principles of the law of negligence and by everyday experience, we are unable to see how the plaintiff's conduct was necessarily the proximate cause of her injury. In practically so charging, the court below erred, for which reason there must be a new trial.

New trial.

(137 N. C. 287)

BRAY v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1905.)

PENALTIES—RELEASE BY LEGISLATURE—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT—ESTOPPEL—STATUTES—PASSAGE—CONSTITUTIONAL FORMALITIES—COSTS.

1. The court will not hear testimony showing a noncompliance with Const. art. 2, § 12, forbidding the General Assembly to pass any private law unless 30 days' notice of application for the law shall be given; but testimony showing noncompliance by the Legislature with the provisions of the Constitution in the passage of bills will be heard only in the case of bills pledging the faith and credit of the state, and imposing, or permitting municipalities to impose, taxes, which article 2, § 14, requires to be read three several times on three different days in each house.

2. It is always within the power of either branch of the General Assembly to suspend its rules, and pass ordinary bills through their several readings on the same day.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, §§ 12, 13.]

3. Where a special bill for the relief of a defendant in an action for a penalty was introduced in the Legislature, it was not necessary for either defendant or the General Assembly to notify the plaintiff in the action of the introduction of the bill.

4. Defendant in an action for the penalty prescribed by Code, §§ 1818, 1819, on a register of deeds who fails to record marriage licenses, procured, through his attorney and the representative from his county in the General Assembly, the passage of a special act (Pub. Laws 1903, p. 132, c. 108) releasing him from all penalties imposed by such sections. Held, that the fact that the act was prepared by defendant's attorney, and given to the county representative, and passed under an agreement that it was to be introduced and passed through its several readings on the same day, and sent to the Senate and passed on the following day, and that plaintiff in the action should have no time to be heard, did not estop defendant from pleading its provisions or availing himself of its benefits.

5. Pub. Laws 1903, p. 132, c. 108, releasing and discharging a register of deeds from penalties incurred by his failure to comply with Code, §§ 1818, 1819, requiring that official to record marriage licenses, is not violative of Const. art. 1, § 7, providing that no man is entitled to exclusive emoluments or privileges from the community except in consideration of public service, nor of any other constitutional provision.

6. Plaintiff sued a register of deeds for penalties incurred for failure to comply with Code, §§ 1818, 1819, requiring such official to record marriage licenses. After the institution of the action defendant procured the passage of Pub. Laws 1903, p. 132, c. 108, releasing him from the penalties incurred for his noncompliance with such sections. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover the costs in the action which had accrued prior to the passage of the act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; H. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by W. H. Bray against G. W. Williams and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This action was instituted for the recovery of $12,800 alleged to be due the plaintiff by the defendant, register of deeds of Currituck county, by reason of his failure to comply with the provisions of sections 1818 and 1819 of the Code. By the first of these sections the register is required to make a record of marriage licenses and returns thereto. For failing to make such entry within 10 days after the return of the license he forfeits a penalty of $200 "to any person who shall sue for the same." The plaintiff alleged that the defendant failed to make entry of 50 marriage licenses and the returns thereon within the time prescribed. The defendant, among other defenses, pleaded specially an act of the General Assembly ratified on the 12th day of February, 1903, entitled "An act for the relief of G. W. Williams, register of deeds of Currituck county." The terms of the act are:

"Whereas G. W. Williams, who was register of deeds of Currituck county, N. C., for the term ending December, 1902, and is now serving as such by re-election during his term of office now expired, by inadvertence and oversight failed to record the marriage licenses issued by him, within ten days, as required by section 1819 of the Code, and may have failed in other respects to comply strictly with sections 1818 and 1819 of said Code, and by such failures and omissions incurred the penalties prescribed by said sections; and whereas said Williams carefully filed and preserved in his office such licenses and recorded the same during each year in a book furnished him for that purpose by the commissioners of said county, and no harm has come to any one because of any such failure and omission; and whereas action has been brought by W. H. Bray against said Williams and his sureties to recover of them the penalties prescribed by said sections, aggregating a large sum, which action is now pending in the superior court of Currituck county, but in which no judgment has been rendered: Therefore the General Assembly of North Carolina do enact:

"Section 1. That G. W. Williams and his sureties on his official bond for the term ending December, 1902, and each of them, be and they are hereby released and discharged from any and all penalties imposed by said sections, for failure to comply with the provisions of said sections and any amendments to the same during the term of said Williams now expired.

"Sec. 2. That this act shall be in force from and after its ratification and shall apply to actions now pending and which may be brought to enforce such penalties." Pub. Laws 1903, pp. 132, 133, c. 108.

This action was instituted on November 18, 1902. The plaintiff introduced testimony tending to show that the defendant failed to enter the licenses, etc., within 10 days. The defendant introduced the statute and rested. The plaintiff proposed to show by the representative from said county in the General Assembly at the session of 1903 that the statute was prepared by the defendant's attorney, and given to the witness; the agreement that it was to be introduced and passed through its several readings, if possible, on the same day, and sent to the Senate and passed on the following day; that the plaintiff should have no time to be heard; and that the statute was passed in accordance with the agreement. Upon defendant's objection the testimony was excluded, and plaintiff excepted. Judgment for defendant, to which plaintiff excepted and appealed.

E. F. Aydlott and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellant. Pruden & Pruden and A. M. Simmons, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the case). The learned counsel for the plaintiff concede that the validity of the statute of 1903 may not be called into question collaterally, and that the testimony offered was not competent for such purpose. They say, however, that the purpose of the proposed testimony was to show that by reason of the conduct of the defendant in procuring its introduction and passage he is estopped from pleading its provision or availing himself of its benefits. For this proposition they cite Bigelow on Estoppel, § 689. Mr. Bigelow, referring to the case in which it is held that persons who have procured the passage of an act of the Legislature, under which they have acted and obtained benefits, are estopped to show that the statute is unconstitutional, says that it is "a remarkable case, and to be received with hesitation." Ferguson v. Landram, 5 Bush (Ky.) 230, 96 Am. Dec. 850. It must be conceded that cases may be found in which it is held that parties are estopped from averring the unconstitutionality of a statute after accepting and appropriating the benefits conferred by it. They are, however, of very narrow scope and application. The general rule is otherwise. While not in all respects in point, the language of Bradley, J., in South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260, 24 L. Ed. 154, states the general principle:

"That which purports to be a law of a state is a law or it is not a law, according as the truth of the fact may be, and not according to the shifting circumstances of the parties. It would be an intolerable state of things if a document purporting to be an act of the Legislature could thus be a law in one case and for one party, and not a law in another case and for another party; a law to-day, and not a law to-morrow." Without undertaking to review the authorities, we are of the opinion that the case before us does not come within the principle upon which the cases cited by Mr. Bigelow are based. There was no misrepresentation of any fact to the General Assembly, nor was the act, so far as the record shows, passed in violation of any constitutional provision. It has been frequently held that, except in the case of bills coming within the provisions of section 14, art. 2, this court will not hear testimony for the purpose of showing that the notice required by Const. § 12, art. 2, was not given. Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244; Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119; Wilson v. Markley, 123 N. C. 616, 45 S. E. 1023. It is always within the power of either branch of the General Assembly to suspend its rules and pass ordinary bills through their several readings on the same day. Unless objection is made, it is usual to do so. The fact proposed to be shown, that the member introducing the bill agreed that the plaintiff should not be notified, was a matter between him and his constituents. There was no duty imposed upon the defendant or the General Assembly to notify the plaintiff. The testimony was properly rejected.

The effect of the statute upon the plaintiff's right to proceed with his action was considered and settled by this court in Dyer v. Ellington, 126 N. C. 941, 36 S. E. 177. We can add nothing to what was said in that case by Mr. Justice Douglas. The question is discussed and the authorities reviewed in an able argument by Mr. Chase in Norris v. Crocker, 54 U. S. 429, 14 L. Ed. 210.

It is suggested that the act violates section 7, art. 1, of the Constitution. Such legislation is not in harmony with the genius of our Constitution, but we find no express provision prohibiting the General Assembly from passing such statutes. In Dyer v. Ellington, supra, this court upheld an act substantially like the one before us. The defendant presented a hard case to the General Assembly. That it should have given the relief is not surprising.

The plaintiff contends that, in any point of view, he is entitled to the costs which accrued prior to the passage of the act. We find no direct authority upon the question. The language of Mr. Justice Douglas in Dyer v. Ellington, supra, indicates an opinion against the plaintiff's contention. The act makes no reference to costs. The recovery of costs is regulated by statute. The plaintiff brought his suit knowing that the Legislature had the power to destroy his cause of action at any time before judgment. He took chances, and must abide the result. The judgment must be affirmed.

PERRY v. GREENWICH INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1905.)

ARBITRATION—INADEQUACY OF AWARD — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—INSURANCE—WAIVING PROOF OF LOSS.

1. All that is required to justify the setting aside of an award of arbitrators on the ground of fraud, bias or undue influence is that the evidence satisfies the jury of the truth of the allegations in the complaint.

2. An agreement to arbitrate the loss under a policy of insurance is a waiver of the want of due proofs of loss.

3. Where the verdict of a jury of $750 for loss under a policy of insurance is supported by sufficient evidence, an award of $73.50 by arbitrators for the same loss is so grossly inadequate as to require setting the same aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Moore, Judge.

Action by E. A. Perry against the Greenwich Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Busbee & Busbee, for appellant. E. L. Travis, Claude Kitchin, W. E. Daniel, and Howard Alston, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This is a civil action to recover a loss upon a policy of insurance on account of damage to plaintiff's dwelling by lightning, and to set aside an award of arbitrators because of fraud, corruption, bias, and undue influence. These issues, which were submitted to and answered by the jury, sufficiently disclose the nature of the action: "(1) Has there been an arbitrament and award as to the amount of damages to which plaintiff is entitled under the insurance policy attached to the complaint? Yes. (2) Was the appraiser Ellington, at the time of the alleged arbitration, disinterested? No. (3) Was the appraiser Faucette unduly, fraudulently, and corruptly influenced and controlled in the interest of the defendant by said Ellington? Yes. (4) Were said appraisers partial to and strongly biased and prejudiced in favor of the defendant? Yes. (5) Did plaintiff file with defendant notice and proof of loss as required by said policy? No. (6) Did defendant waive notice and proof of loss? Yes. (7) What were the damages done by lightning and fire to the property included in the policy? $750, with interest from the time it was due until paid." The defendant appealed from the judgment rendered, and assigned 18 exceptions in the record as error.

Exceptions 1, 2, and 3 relate to the admission of evidence, and, in our opinion, are without merit. Boggan v. Horne, 97 N. C.

270, 2 S. E. 224. The contentions of defendant (appellant), as summarized from the numerous exceptions, are: (1) That in this case the plaintiff must establish the allegations of the complaint by clear, strong, and convincing testimony before the award can be set aside. (2) That, it being admitted that no proof of loss has been furnished defendant by plaintiff, he cannot maintain this action. (3) That there is no evidence in the record sufficient to go to the jury upon the issues 2, 3, and 4 relating to the fraud, interest, and bias of the arbitrators.

The first contention cannot be sustained. In this state the degree or intensity of proof required in civil actions has been divided into two classifications only: (1) Those facts which must be established by a preponderance of the evidence or to the satisfaction of the jury. A jury is not justified in finding any fact unless the evidence is sufficient to satisfy their minds of its truth, or, what is equivalent and practically the same thing, creates in their minds a belief that the fact alleged is true. This we take to be substantially what is said by Chief Justice Pearson in Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 77. (2) Those facts which must be established to the satisfaction of the jury by clear, cogent, and convincing proof. Ely v. Early, 94 N. C. 1. We take those to be the two classifications of evidence applicable to civil actions, as settled by numerous decisions of this court. Lee v. Pearce, supra, and Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 9 S. E. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, represent the first named class, and Ely v. Early, supra, and many other similar cases, represent the second. That class of cases wherein it is sought to set aside deeds, decrees of judicial tribunals, and awards of arbitrators upon the ground of fraud, belongs to the first class. "In order to establish fraud, it is not necessary that direct affirmative or positive proof of fraud be given. In matters that regard the conduct of men, the certainty of mathematical demonstration cannot be required. Like much of human knowledge, fraud may be inferred from facts established. This means no more than that the proof must create a belief, and not merely a suspicion." Kerr on Fraud & Mistake, pp. 384, 385. This subject is discussed with great clearness and learning by Avery, J., in Harding v. Long, supra, which case is cited and approved in many subsequent opinions. We would be but "threshing old straw" to discuss this contention of the defendant further.

The second contention cannot be maintained. We admit that it is settled law that an action for damages for loss on a "standard" fire insurance policy cannot be maintained unless it is alleged and proved that proof of loss has been made before action brought. In accordance with the terms of the policy. But proof of loss can be waived. We are of opinion that it has been, in this case, by the agreement to arbitrate, and that his honor was correct in so charging the jury. It has been generally held that a provision in a policy requiring proof of loss before commencing action is a reasonable one. The object is to give the insurer notice of the loss, and of its extent and character, so the insurer may have an opportunity to investigate and settle the loss without being subjected to an action. When the insurer agrees to arbitrate, it is presumed he has investigated and is unwilling to pay the loss as claimed by the insured. In this case there was not only an agreement to arbitrate, but an actual award of arbitrators, one of whom was selected by the defendant. If the award is abortive, it is not the fault of the plaintiff. In Pretzfelder's Case such a defense is characterized by the present chief justice as "technical, and not meritorious." 123 N. C., at page 166, 31 S. E. 470, 44 L. R. A. 424. In Insurance Co. v. Holking, 115 Pa. 416, 8 Atl. 586, it is held that, where arbitrators fail to agree upon an award, the plaintiff is not compelled to submit to another arbitration, but may forthwith bring his action in the courts. Where the insured claims that arbitration has failed because of fraud, there is no reason whatever why he should be required to go through the empty form of filing a proof of loss before he can commence his action to establish the fraud and recover his damages. The Holking Case is approved in Pretzfelder's Case, and we again give the decision the indorsement of this court.

The third contention: After a careful examination of all the evidence, we agree with the defendant that there is no sufficient evidence that Ellington had any interest in the subject-matter of the award. There is no sufficient evidence that Faucette was corruptly influenced and controlled by Ellington in the interest of the defendant. Prayers for instructions numbered 10 and 12, directed to the second and third issues, should have been given. But these are not reversible errors.

We are of the opinion that there was evidence proper to be submitted to the jury upon the fourth issue, and that the finding of the jury upon that issue is amply sufficient to support the judgment rendered by the court setting aside the award. There are two kinds of fraud which will vitiate an award—positive, as by some act that can be proved; or inferential, where the circumstances so strongly point to dishonesty that the court will consider the fact of its existence to be clearly indicated. "A common case of inferential fraud is when the award is obviously and extremely unjust." Morse on Arbitration & Award, 539. "Where there is a charge of fraud or partiality made against an award, the fact that it is plainly and palpably wrong would be evidence in support of the charge, entitled to greater or less weight, according to the extent or effect of the error and the other circumstances of the case. There might be a case of error in an award so plain and gross that a court or jury could arrive only at the conclusion that it was not the result of an impartial exercise of their judgment by the arbitrators." Goddard v. King, 40 Minn. 164, 41 N. W. 639. The settled rule, which is applicable not only to awards, but to other transactions, is that mere inadequacy alone is not sufficient to set aside the award; but, if the inadequacy be so gross and palpable as to shock the moral sense, it is sufficient evidence to be submitted to the jury on the issues relating to fraud and corruption or partiality and bias. Ostrander on Fire Insurance (2d Ed.) 596; 8 Cyc. 749; Bispham, Eq. (6th Ed.) 312; Dorsett v. Mfg. Co., 131 N. C. 260, 42 S. E. 612.

The jury have assessed the damage to the house at $750. The arbitrators, Ellington and Faucette, assessed the damage at $73.50—not one-tenth of the sum awarded by the jury. Dr. Perry, one of the plaintiffs, testified that he had known Faucette 12 or 15 years; that Faucette advised witness to take him as an arbitrator; that Faucette is a good contractor and builder, and had examined the house, and told witness that the damages were $750, and advised witness not to take less, and for this reason the witness selected him. There was evidence offered by plaintiff tending to prove that the actual damage to the house was fully $750. The court below charged the jury that the award is presumed to be legal and valid; "that, if the award is so grossly and palpably inadequate—that is, so grossly and palpably small and out of all proportion to the amount of actual damage—as to shock the moral sense and conscience and to cause reasonable persons to say 'he got it for nothing,' then the jury may consider this as evidence tending to show fraud and corruption or strong bias and partiality on the part of the arbitrators." This charge is not only sustained by the law, but is expressed in well-chosen language, for the use of which his honor has the authority of the great names of Pearson and Thurlow. "An inequality so strong, gross, and manifest that it must be impossible to state it to a man of common sense without producing an exclamation at the inequality of it," are the words in which Lord Thurlow expresses the idea (Gwynne v. Heaton, 1 Bro. O. C. 8; Bispham, Equity [6th Ed.] 312); and many cases cited by that author in the notes sustain his honor's clear and well-expressed language.

The judgment is affirmed.

(137 N. C. 408)

VINSON v. KNIGHT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1905.)

APPEAL FROM JUSTICE'S COURT—RETURN—NATURE OF ACTION — TRESPASS OR TROVER — PLEADING—QUESTIONS INVOLVED—TITLE TO PROPERTY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The statement of the testimony heard by a justice of the peace in a trial before him is no part of his return on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 31, Cent. Dig. Justices of the Peace, § 611.]

2. A justice's summons stating the cause of action to be "for the recovery of the possession of one steer" this day forcibly taken by defendant from plaintiff's servants "of the valuation of $20, alleged by plaintiff to be in the possession of defendant, and unlawfully detained by him from plaintiff," etc., and an oral complaint alleging practically the same facts stated in the summons, states a cause of action in trover or detinue, and not in trespass.

3. Where plaintiff alleged in justice's court that defendant forcibly and with violence took a steer from plaintiff's servants, an answer denying "plaintiff's title to this steer and his right to recover possession of the same or its value," is sufficient to put plaintiff on notice that the real issue on the trial would be one of title, and not the trespass in taking possession.

4. To sustain an action in trover or detinue, plaintiff must allege and prove title to the property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Detinue, § 5; vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trover and Conversion, § 119.]

5. In trover or detinue, if defendant denies plaintiff's title to the property he may set up title in a third person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Detinue, § 14; vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trover and Conversion, §§ 121, 166.]

6. In trover or detinue, defendant has the burden of disproving plaintiff's title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Hoke, Judge.

Action by J. C. Vinson against M. J. Knight. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in the summons stated the cause of action to be "for the recovery of the possession of one red steer, * * * it being the steer the defendant took from Jacob Everett and Jordan Hill on the road to-day, of the value of $20, alleged by the plaintiff to be in the possession of the defendant, and unlawfully detained by him from the plaintiff; the plaintiff further claiming to be entitled to the immediate possession of said property." The cause was heard by a justice of the peace, who in his return upon the appeal stated that "the plaintiff complained for the possession of one red steer, described in the summons, of the value of $20, and alleged that the said steer was in his actual possession, and that the defendant * * * forcibly took said steer by force and violence from * * * the servants of the plaintiff on the public highway in N—— county, and that said defendant unlawfully detained the possession of said steer from the plaintiff." The defendant, answering the complaint, "denied the plaintiff's title to the steer, and his right to recover possession of the same, or its value." The defendant, in testifying, admitted that the steer was not his, and that he claimed no interest in it, and that he, with his son, forcibly took the steer from the possession of the plaintiff's servants on the public highway. The plaintiff in the superior court moved for judgment upon the return of the justice of the peace. The motion was denied, and the plaintiff excepted. Without objection the court submitted the following issues to the jury: "(1) Is the plaintiff the owner of the steer sued for? Ans. No. (2) Does defendant wrongfully detain said steer from plaintiff? Ans. No. (3) What is the value of the steer? Not answered. (4) What damage has plaintiff sustained by wrongful detention of same by defendant? Not answered." There was judgment, for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the case). The plaintiff's motion for judgment upon the return of the justice is based upon the oral pleadings. The statement of the testimony heard by him is not properly a part of his return. Considered from this point of view, it becomes necessary to inquire whether the summons and complaint, construed together, set forth a cause of action in trespass, or whether, by the allegations, it is confined to an action for the recovery of the possession of the property. The plaintiff's contention that in an action for trespass—an injury to his possession—the question of title is not involved, save on the quantum of damages, is sustained by the authorities cited in his brief. The difficulty confronting him, however, is that he has stated a cause of action in trover or detinue, and not in trespass. The action is for the possession of the property or its value; that was the judgment which he recovered before the justice. There is nothing in the summons, pleadings, or return of the justice, or in his motion, to indicate that he was asking any other relief. While it is well settled that under the Code system, wherein forms of action are abolished, the plaintiff may have such judgment as, upon the facts stated, he is entitled to, it is equally true that the facts must be so stated that the defendant and the court may see what relief the plaintiff seeks. The plaintiff expressly tells the court that he is complaining "for the possession of one red steer," and that such possession is unlawfully detained by the defendant. It is true he says that the property was forcibly taken from the possession of his servants. The character of the action and of the relief sought is fixed by the language used in both the summons and complaint. In Clark v.

Langworthy, 12 Wis. 444, it is said: "The trespass, if one is relied on, should be so distinctly set forth that it may be seen with reasonable certainty what is the principal act complained of, and not of facts which might furnish ground for several different actions, stated in one count, leaving it impossible for the other party to know which to reply to." The trespass should not be laid by way of recital. 21 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 810. It is evident from an inspection of the entire record that the plaintiff believed the steer to be his. He says that it is in his mark. His declared purpose is to recover the possession of the property. The answer of the defendant put him upon notice that the real issue was the question of title. He does not deny the trespass. The plaintiff takes his judgment before the justice in strict accordance with the summons and complaint. There can be but one reasonable construction put upon the record. His honor would have permitted him either to amend his complaint or make it more definite, if he had so requested. Our view is strengthened by the fact that, after the refusal of the judge to render judgment upon the pleadings, he submitted issues, without objection, appropriate to an action in the nature of trover or detinue. His honor properly denied the motion.

The plaintiff objected to the introduction of testimony by the defendant tending to show the property in a third person. He says to do so would permit the defendant to take advantage of his own wrong. This assumes the very fact in controversy. If the steer was not the property of the plaintiff, the wrong done was in the trespass, and for this he could only recover such damage as he sustained in that respect. For the purpose of showing his actual damage, the question of title was material; but, as we have seen, the action being in trover or detinue, it is well settled by a long line of authorities that he must allege and show title. Russell v. Hill, 125 N. C. 470, 34 S. E. 640, in which the authorities are reviewed. It was open to the defendant upon this issue to show that the property belonged to a third person, otherwise he might be subjected to an action for conversion by the true owner. This principle is elementary, and recognized and enforced in this state since the case of Laspeyre v. McFarland, 4 N. C. 620, 7 Am. Rep. 705. The plaintiff says that the defendant should have set up in his answer the outstanding title. We have examined the cases cited to sustain this proposition. Rowland v. Mann, 28 N. C. 38, was an action of replevin, in which the defendant pleaded the general issue. Nash, J., said: "Under the plea of non cepit, all that the plaintiff has to do is to prove the taking or having the goods, or part of them, in the place specified. As the defendant under this plea merely denies the taking, he cannot controvert the plaintiff's title." In the case before us the defendant expressly denied the plaintiff's title. The distinction is obvious. In Craig v. Miller, 84 N. C. 375, Ruffin, C. J., clearly points out the distinction between a case wherein it did not appear that the property belonged to a third person, as in Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Str. 505 (1 Smith, L. C. 631), and where it was shown that the title to the property was in a third person. In Barwick v. Barwick, 33 N. C. 80, discussing Armory v. Delamirie, wherein it was held that the finder of a jewel could maintain trover against one taking it out of his possession, there being no evidence as to the true owner, it is said: "But the result of that case would have been very different if the owner had been known. * * * The distinction between that case, where the possessor was the only known owner, and the ordinary case of one who himself has the possession wrongfully and sues another wrongdoer for interfering with his possession, the true owner being known and standing by ready to sue for the property, is as clear as daylight." We could not make the distinction clearer by further discussion of citation of authorities. The plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title.

The same questions are raised by exceptions to the charge of his honor. He properly put upon the defendant the burden of showing that the steer was not the property of the plaintiff, the admitted possession at the time of the taking raising a presumption in his favor. Boyce v. Williams, 84 N. C. 275, 37 Am. Rep. 618.

The plaintiff seeks to distinguish the case before us from those cited for that the steer was taken from the possession of the plaintiff's servants by violence, and for this he cites Lain v. Gaither, 72 N. C. 234. In that case the property sued for was borrowed by the defendant from the plaintiff, and he sought to prevent its recovery by showing that the plaintiff had been adjudged a bankrupt. The court held that, having acquired possession under the plaintiff, he was estopped to show an outstanding title in another, unless he should connect himself with it. This is elementary learning. In an action for trespass the violence of the defendant in taking the property should be considered in fixing the damages, either actual or punitive, but does not affect the right of action. The slightest trespass is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to an action—as, in the case of realty, treading upon the grass. Chaffin v. Mfg. Co., 135 N. C. 95, 47 S. E. 226.

We have carefully examined the authorities cited by the plaintiff's counsel in his excellent and exhaustive brief. The disposition of the case turns upon the cause of action set forth in the pleadings, and which, as we have seen, involved the title to the property, and upon the strength of which the plaintiff must recover, if at all. This having been decided against him, the court below properly rendered judgment for the defendant. We find no error in the record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

HOKE, J., took no part in the decision of this case.

ELKINS NAT. BANK v. SIMMONS et al.
MOORE v. SIMMONS et al. HANS-
FORD v. SIMMONS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 24, 1905.)

APPEALABLE DECREE — QUASHING ATTACHMENT
—RENEWAL OF MOTION—CLAIMS OF THIRD PARTY—LIMITATIONS.

1. Under subsection 8 of section 1 of chapter 185 of the Code of 1899, a decree overruling a motion to quash an attachment is an interlocutory, but appealable, decree, and does not preclude a renewal of the motion at the same or any subsequent term before final decree, and in a suit in which an attachment is sued out, and some of the defendants appear and move to quash the attachment, and their motion is overruled, a creditor who files a petition under section 23, c. 106, Code 1899, disputing the validity of the plaintiff's attachment, and stating a claim to or interest in the property attached, and is made a formal party thereto, has the right to move to quash said attachment, and the statute of limitations as to his right to appeal begins to run at the date of the decree overruling his motion.

2. An affidavit for an attachment, after stating the material facts relied upon, states, "And therefore the affiant says they fraudulently contracted the debt and incurred the liability for which the said suit is about to be brought." Held to be a sufficient statement of the ground for an attachment under subsection 8, § 1, c. 106, Code 1899.

3. Where an affidavit for an attachment, after stating the material facts relied upon, and after stating the liability of the defendants, states, "Affiant says that the said J. H. and Chas. Simmons fraudulently incurred the liability aforesaid, for which suit is about to be brought," this is a sufficient statement of the ground for the attachment under subsection 8, § 1, c. 106, Code 1899.

4. Where the ground for an attachment is that the defendants fraudulently contracted the debt or incurred the liability for which the suit is about to be or is brought, the affiant should state the material facts relied upon to show the existence of such ground, and, if the facts are stated in a vague and uncertain manner, and not sufficient to show that the debt was fraudulently contracted, or the liability fraudulently incurred, the attachment should be quashed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by the Elkins National Bank against Jesse H. Simmons and others and by B. W. Moore against J. H. Simmons and others, and by Lloyd Hansford, trustee, against Jesse H. Simmons and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and W. E. Hedrick and other defendants appeal. Reversed.

Harding & Harding and J. L. Wamsley, for appellants. L. D. & J. F. Strader, C. W. Dalley, and E. D. Talbott, for appellees.

SANDERS, J. The first two of these causes were instituted in the circuit court of Randolph county, that of the bank against Simmons and others being first instituted, and attachments were sued out in each of them and levied upon the real estate of the defendants J. H. and Chas. Simmons, situated in Tucker and Pendleton counties. A short time thereafter the defendants J. H. and Chas. Simmons, by deed of trust, conveyed to plaintiff in the last-named case, L. Hansford, trustee, all their property, including that which had been levied upon as aforesaid, to secure all their indebtedness to their creditors ratably. After the execution of said trust deed, Hansford, trustee, instituted a chancery suit in the circuit court of Tucker county against J. H. Simmons and others for the purpose of settling up the estate of J. H. and Chas. Simmons, which suit was, by an order entered on the 12th day of March, 1900, removed to the circuit court of Randolph county, and by a decree in the circuit court of the last-named county, on the 16th day of May, 1900, these three causes were consolidated, and ordered to be heard together. And on the 16th day of May, 1900, E. A. Cunningham, counsel for Timothy Simmons and certain other creditors of J. H. and Chas. Simmons, other than the appellants, appeared, and moved to quash said attachments, which motion was, by the court, overruled; and on the 21st day of May, 1900, and again on the 16th day of October, 1900, J. H. and Chas. Simmons appeared, and moved to quash each of said attachments, which motions were likewise overruled. There is nothing in the record to show just when L. Hansford, trustee, moved to quash said attachments, except in the decree entered on January 27, 1903, it appears that the joint motion to quash of L. Hansford, trustee, and others, had been filed, but when filed the record does not state; but this is immaterial, for the decree of January 27th does show that the motion was made and on that date overruled. The appellants W. E. Hedrick and E. D. Wamsley filed their petitions in the two first-mentioned causes disputing the validity of said attachments, and were made formal parties to these proceedings, the petition of Hedrick being filed on the 16th day of October, 1900, and that of Wamsley at the January term of said court, 1901. After petitioners were made formal parties to these suits, they each moved to quash said attachments, which motions were, by decree entered on the 27th day of January, 1903, overruled, and on the 21st day of January, 1904, the appellants Hedrick, Wamsley, and Hansford, trustee, presented their petition for an appeal from the decree overruling their motions to quash said attachments, which was allowed.

There are only two questions presented by the record. One is, was the right of appeal barred by the statute of limitations at the time the appellants presented their petition therefor, and the other is, if the appeal was not barred, did the court err in overruling the motions to quash said attachments? The appellants contend that at the time the petition was presented for the appeal that more than two years had elapsed since the motions to quash said attachments were made and overruled. It is true the record shows that the petition was presented for an appeal on the 21st day of January, 1904, and that more than two years had expired since each of said motions to quash was overruled. When the motions to quash on the 16th and 21st days of May, 1900, were made, neither Hedrick nor Wamsley were parties to these suits—Hedrick not becoming a party until the 16th day of October, 1900, and Wamsley not becoming a party until the January term of court, 1901. It is insisted that the order entered overruling the motions to quash the attachment was an appealable decree, and that the appellants became parties before the right to appeal therefrom was barred. Subsection 8 of section 1 of chapter 135 of the Code of 1899 provides that a party to a controversy in any circuit court may obtain an appeal in any case where there is a judgment or order quashing or abating or refusing to quash or abate an attachment, and, of course, under this provision of the statute, the orders entered overruling the motions to quash were appealable; but certainly not by parties who at that time were not parties to the suit, but only those persons could appeal from such order whose motions had been passed upon adversely to them. It certainly does not require argument nor the citation of authorities to show that appellants could not have appealed from these orders, which were entered before they became in any way identified with the suits, and, not being entitled to appeal from the orders entered before they became parties, it is difficult to understand how their rights could be in any way affected by such orders. It is said they became parties before the appeal was barred. What if they did? This would give them no right to appeal from the decree of the court refusing to quash an attachment upon the motion of some other defendant. The appellants could not be heard to complain in this court that the circuit court had refused to quash the attachments when they had not asked this to be done. They must first make such motion, and it must be passed upon adversely to them. The statute allows an appeal from an order quashing or abating or refusing to quash or abate an attachment. This applies to the parties directly interested in the motion, not to some one who may be a party to the suit, and have an interest in its ultimate result, and does not make such motion, or join therein. The appellants clearly had no right to appeal from either of the orders refusing to quash the attachments upon the motion of the other defendants. If they had done so, they would have been met, and properly so, in this court, with a motion to dismiss their appeal on the ground that the lower court had made no adverse ruling to them. But appellees say that the orders entered overruling the motions to quash the attachments were final, and could not be set aside after the term of court at which they had been entered, and that, if the appellants desired to be relieved against these orders, they should have filed their bill of review. This position is not sound, for an order overruling a motion to quash an attachment is interlocutory, and does not prevent a renewal of the motion, and the appellants, as soon as they became parties to the suits, moved to quash the attachments, which was not acted upon till the 27th day of January, 1903, and therefore they had no appealable interest in the case until that time, and the statute did not begin to run against them until that date. An order entered in a case overruling a motion to quash an attachment is like an order entered overruling a demurrer. There is no reason, because a court enters an order at one term overruling a demurrer, that it cannot, at the next term, consider the demurrer, and sustain it; and the same rule will apply to motions to quash attachments. Although an order refusing to quash an attachment is appealable, still it is not a final decree. The fact that the court refused at one term to quash the attachment is no reason why at a subsequent term it could not, upon the motion of the same person who had previously made it, or upon the motion of some other defendant, made at a subsequent time, quash the attachment. The very late case decided by this court of Simmons v. Simmons, 48 S. E. 833, decided that an order overruling a motion to quash an attachment is interlocutory, and does not preclude a renewal of the motion; and certainly a party who had never made such motion would have the right to do so at any time before the final decree in the cause, and his right to appeal would date from the time the court passed upon it. Clearly this court has jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

The next question is, should the circuit court have quashed the attachments? It is claimed that the affidavits are defective, because they fail to show what ground is relied upon. In the case of Bank v. Simmons et al. the affidavit, after stating the material facts relied upon, contains this language: "Affiant says that they fraudulently contracted the debt and incurred the liability for which the said suit is about to be brought;" and in Moore v. Simmons et al., after also stating the material facts, and after describing the liability, it says: "Affiant says that the said J. H. and Chas. Simmons fraudulently incurred the liability aforesaid, for which suit is about to be brought." The ground stated in the affidavits is as provided for in subsection 8 of section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, and comes clearly within its provisions. Are the facts relied upon in these affidavits sufficient? The affidavit should, by some direct and positive averment, show a fraudulent act upon the part of the debtor in contracting the debt, and it must be such an act as to constitute and show a fraudulent intent. Now, in the first above mentioned case—Bank v. Simmons et al.—the affidavit does not show by that positive and clear language which is required that when J. H. Simmons presented the draft for $4,000 to Warfield, the cashier, and had it placed to his credit in the Elkins National Bank, that Kunkle Bros. were indebted to him, and it certainly does not show that he stated that they owed him enough to pay the draft. The affidavit, in this respect, is vague and uncertain. What did Simmons say? The affidavit does not show. His language ought to be given, so the court can see that he made such statements as amount to a fraudulent contraction of the debt, and not leave it to the affiant to form his conclusions as to what would amount to fraud. Then, again, there is a statement in the affidavit that the draft for $4,000 was sent to the Merchants' National Bank of Baltimore, Md., for collection, and the said draft was promptly presented to the said Kunkle Bros. for payment, but the same was dishonored and protested, and payment thereof refused, upon the ground of no funds, or not sufficient funds for the purpose. Now, it is certainly material, even if Simmons had stated to Warfield that Kunkle Bros. owed him a sum sufficient to pay the draft, to negative the fact that he did owe him. Simply an allegation in the affidavit to the effect that the draft was presented to Kunkle Bros. for payment, and that it was dishonored and protested, and payment thereof refused, for the reasons above given, does not say that Kunkle Bros. did not owe Simmons that amount of money. It simply says that Kunkle Bros. refused to pay it, and gives their reasons for refusing to pay it, but does not, in positive and direct language, state that Kunkle Bros. did not owe it. The refusal to pay for certain reasons is simply the statement of Kunkle Bros. They may have owed the debt or they may not have owed it, but it is certain that the affiant does not state that they did, and, so far as affiant is concerned, the statement that he made in the affidavit as to him can be perfectly true, and yet still there may have been ample funds in the hands of Kunkle Bros. to pay the draft.

Now, as to the affidavit in the case of Moore v. Simmons, made by B. W. Moore. This affidavit is very much like the one just referred to. Its language is vague, uncertain, and indefinite. There is no positive and direct statement of facts which shows that the debtor fraudulently contracted the debt. The substance of it is that Moore sold to J. H. Simmons 28 head of cattle and 315 head of sheep at a given price. These cattle and sheep were to be weighed and received by J. H. and Chas. Simmons, and paid for where plaintiff resides, at such time as the Simmonses should indicate in the month of October, 1899; that in October, 1899, the 28 head of cattle were delivered to the Simmonses at the price agreed upon, and part of which had already been paid, and, without receiving the residue of the money the affiant, as directed by the Simmonses, drove the cattle to the pasture of E. Hutton, and left them there for the purchaser; that on another date in October, 1899, the Simmonses directed the 315 head of sheep to be sent to Huttonsville, and they were sent to the Simmonses at that place, from where they were the next morning shipped to Baltimore, Md.; and not receiving the pay for either the cattle or sheep, as affiant says Simmonses had promised him, he went to Huttonsville, and the Simmonses gave him a check for $1,000; that this check was drawn on the Elkins National Bank, and was deposited by the payee in the First National Bank of Grafton; that it was presented for payment, and payment thereof refused, and the check was protested for the reason no funds in said bank. In the first place, the contract had already been made between the parties, price agreed upon, and stock weighed and delivered, and the sale actually consummated, before the check was given. Even if there were no funds in the bank to meet the check, that could not be urged as a reason to show the fraudulent contraction of the debt. And not only that, but this affidavit in one respect is subject to the same objection as the one above considered; that is, there is no statement of fact showing that Simmons did not have the money in the bank to meet the payment of this check. And again, these affidavits not only fail to show that Simmons did not have the money in the hands of Kunkle Bros. and the bank to meet the draft and check, but there is nothing in them to show that, even if Simmons made the statements that he had the money there, he did so knowing his statements to be false in fact, knowing that he did not have it. And neither do the affidavits show that the credit was extended to him believing in the truthfulness of his statements and relying thereon, and not knowing his statements were false. The facts stated in the affidavits should be fraudulent in fact, and if Simmons made the statements that he had the funds to meet these debts in the hands of Kunkle Bros. and the bank, yet, unless he made the statements falsely, knowing that he did not have the money there, then there is no actual fraud; and his statements must have been accepted as true and relied upon and confided in by the persons who extended the credit.

But, inasmuch as counsel for appellees in their brief contend that they should be given a day, under section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, to file a supplemental affidavit, we therefore reverse the judgment of the circuit court refusing to quash said attachments, and remand these causes, with directions to the circuit court to quash the same, but with leave to the appellees, if they so desire, to file a supplemental affidavit, as provided by section 1 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899.

KLINE v. McKELVEY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 24, 1905.)

MANDAMUS — ADMISSION TO OFFICE — EXPIRATION OF TERM — VACANCY.

1. Mandamus lies to compel the admission or restoration to office of the party having a clear prima facie right thereto, shown by a commission, certificate, or other legal evidence thereof.

2. Such writ will be awarded directly against one who, under section 2 of chapter 7 of the Code of 1899, holds over after the expiration of the term for which he was elected or appointed, to compel him to yield the office to the person elected or appointed to succeed him.

3. Incumbency of an office by holding over under said statute does not preclude the existence of a vacancy as a basis for the exercise of the appointive power under section 5 of chapter 45 of the Code of 1899.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by Joseph Kline against R. C. McKelvey. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and mandamus awarded.

C. O. Strieby, Conley & Smith, and P. J. Crogan, for plaintiff in error. Cunningham & Stallings, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. This case presents, upon a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Tucker county, the question whether mandamus lies to obtain admission to an office by a person elected or appointed thereto against another person holding over under the claim that his successor has not been elected and qualified. The controversy arises between Joseph Kline, who, in November, 1903, was elected to membership in the board of education for the district of Davis, in Tucker county, but failed to qualify within the time required by law, and was afterwards appointed by the superintendent of free schools of said county to the same position for the term for which he had been elected, on one side, and R. C. McKelvey, who, at the time of the election, held the office by appointment to fill a previous unexpired term thereof, and refused, upon the demand of Kline, to surrender the office to him, on the other. McKelvey's only claim of title is the authority given by the statute to every officer to hold his position "until his successor is elected or appointed and qualified." Section 2, c. 7, Code 1899. The scope of the writ of mandamus in controversies concerning the title to office has not been very clearly defined in this state, though there are several cases illustrating such use of it. The most important of these are Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 562; Goff v. Wilson, 32 W. Va. 393, 9 S. E. 23, 3 L. R. A. 58; Schmulbach v. Spedel, 50 W. Va. 553, 40 S. E. 424, 55 L. R. A. 922; and Dew v. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 639. It has often been judicially declared that mandamus is a proper remedy for the trial of title to office, and will lie where there is another appropriate remedy, because it is a more speedy, and therefore a more adequate, remedy. Banton v. Wilson, 4 Tex. 400; Lindsey v. Luckett, 20 Tex. 516; Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 83; Strong's Case, 20 Pick. 484; Conlin v. Aldrich, 98 Mass. 557; Dew v. Judges, cited. On the contrary, it is more generally declared that mandamus is not the remedy for trial of title to office. People v. Olds, 3 Cal. 167, 53 Am. Dec. 898; Meredith v. Supervisors, 50 Cal. 433; Warner v. Myers, 4 Or. 72; People v. New York, 3 Johns. Cas. 79; People v. Stevens, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 616; Matter of Gardner, 68 N. Y. 467; Denver v. Hobart, 10 Nev. 23; Brown v. Turner, 70 N. C. 93; Fitch v. McDiarmid, 26 Ark. 482; Underwood v. White, 27 Ark. 382; People v. Treasurer, 36 Mich. 416; State v. Auditor, 34 Mo. 375; People v. Detroit, 18 Mich. 338; People v. Head, 25 Ill. 325; State v. Dunn, 12 Am. Dec. 25. For the purposes of this case it suffices to say that the writ of mandamus is a proper remedy for the admission or restoration to office of one who holds the clear, legal, prima facie right to it. Upon this proposition all the authorities agree. See State v. Dunn, 12 Am. Dec. 25, and the able and exhaustive note reviewing the cases at page 28. No case decided by this court seems to go beyond this limit, nor is any instance recalled in which the jurisdiction by mandamus has been held to stop short of it. A mandamus was refused in State v. McCallister, 88 W. Va. 485, 18 S. E. 770, 24 L. R. A. 343, but the decision turned upon the peculiar nature of the controversy, it being one in which a town council had refused to admit one who had been elected to membership in that body on the ground of his ineligibility. As that case materially differs from this in its facts and the relations subsisting between the parties, the principle there announced does not bar the remedy in this case, and may not contravene the general principles above announced. Often the conditions under which the writ is awarded are different from those presented in this case. In Dew v. Judges, cited, it was directed, not to the wrongful incumbent of the office, but to the court, whose duty it was to admit or restore the clerk. This relationship is characteristic of the larger number of the reported cases. But the writ may be invoked directly against the person holding the office, requiring him to admit thereto his successor; for it is a part of his official duty to turn over to his successor the books, papers, and property belonging to the office and the insignia thereof. Thus, in Bridges v. Shallicross, cited, and in Goff v. Wilson, 32 W. Va. 393, 9 S. E. 26, 3 L. R. A. 58, the respondents were, respectively, Shallicross and Wilson, the parties holding the offices in question. In the former, Shallicross was in office by appointment of one board, and Bridges claimed the office by a subsequent appointment of another board, and the test of the right of the petitioner was the constitutionality of the legislative act in pursuance of which his appointment was made. Neither of the two boards, asserting conflicting authority respecting the appointment, was made a party to the proceeding, and the whole matter was settled upon the issue made between the incumbent of the office and the party who claimed as his successor. In the former case the office in question was independent of the power of appointment by any inferior board or tribunal. In these cases the remedy was invoked against persons who had lawfully and rightfully occupied the offices and were holding over after the expiration of their terms, awaiting the election or appointment and qualification of their successors. Such also is the present case, and the authorities uniformly hold that under such conditions the writ of mandamus will go, at the instance of the person entitled to the office, directly against the incumbent thereof, to compel him to yield to his successor. Walter v. Belding, 24 Vt. 658; Burr v. Norton, 25 Conn. 103; Warner v. Myers, 4 Or. 72; People v. Head, 25 Ill. 323. In this respect the case of Schmubach v. Speidel, 50 W. Va. 553, 40 S. E. 424, 55 L. R. A. 922, may be regarded as going further, since the respondents therein were not holding over, but had ousted the petitioners from their offices. Whether, by holding mandamus to be a proper remedy in such case, any rule was violated, it would be useless now to inquire, but authority is not wanting for the proposition that the writ will go against an intruder under color of authority. Banton v. Wilson, 4 Tex. 400; Lindsey v. Luckett, 20 Tex. 516; People v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 492, 60 Am. Dec. 769; Kimball v. Lamprey, 19 N. H. 215. Why should it not go against a de facto officer? His acts are valid, and to allow them efficacy as regards the public generally, and then deny that he has any official power, so as to deprive the person entitled to the office of the benefit of an expeditious remedy against him on the technical ground of want of legal right to the office, savors of inconsistency, and sacrifices substance to technicality. Moreover, it allows the intruder to set up in his own behalf, and for his own protection, his own want of title and his own wrong, contrary to well-settled principles of law. "The act of an officer de facto, where it is for his own benefit, is void, because he shall not take advantage of his want of title, which he must be cognizant of." Building Ass'n v. Sohn, 54 W. Va. 101, 114, 46 S. E. 222, 227. However, we are not to be understood as reaffirming the holding in Schmubach v. Speidel. What is said here on that subject is necessarily obiter, since the state of the case does not raise the question.

On what ground the court based its action in refusing a peremptory writ of mandamus does not very clearly appear. The motion to quash the writ, the motion to dismiss the petition and the demurrer to the writ, as stated in the order, were all overruled, and yet the court refused the peremptory writ, and dismissed the proceeding. The return does not controvert the election of the petitioner, his qualification after the time had expired, his subsequent appointment by the county superintendent, nor his qualification after appointment. It does deny that there is any vacancy in the office because it says the respondent is in the office holding over. It is further objected by the demurrer to the writ that it asserts conflicting claims to the office, that it fails to show that Kline was appointed to succeed McKelvey, that it failed to show whether he is claiming by election or appointment, that it sets up a double claim to the office, and that it shows McKelvey to be in the office, exercising the duties thereof, at the time of Kline's appointment. The respondent's incumbency of the office after the expiration of his term could be no bar to the right of appointment. For the purposes of appointment there is a vacancy notwithstanding his occupancy. Section 2 of chapter 7 of the Code of 1899 virtually says this, for it provides that the term of every officer shall continue until his successor is elected or appointed and qualified. To say the least, it implies that an appointment may be made while the officer is awaiting the selection of his successor. The allegations of Kline's election and appointment are proved by certificates exhibited with the petition. It is further asserted that he was elected and appointed as successor to McKelvey, and this last allegation is not denied by the return. The averment must therefore be taken as true. Though the petition does not set up conflicting claims to the office, it clearly shows the legal title to be in Kline. In law it shows no conflicting rights. Moreover, it is immaterial that he asserts two titles to the office, one by election and the other by appointment. Though they cannot stand together, it is manifest that either the election or the appointment vests the right to the office in Kline. In the brief there is much discussion as to whether or not the failure to qualify as an elected officer, within the time limited by the statute, forfeited the of-rice, but it is unnecessary to decide that question.

The conclusion resulting from the foregoing authorities and reasoning is that the court erred in refusing the writ and dismissing the petition. Therefore the judgment will be reversed, and a peremptory writ of mandamus will be awarded, commanding the respondent, McKelvey, to yield possession of the office in question to the applicant, and turn over to him the insignia thereof.

CAIN et al. v. CITY OF ELKINS et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 24, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — SEWERS — ASSESSMENTS — INJUNCTION.

1. The city of Elkins has no authority, under its charter act (chapter 151, p. 420, Acts 1901), to collect the whole or any part of the cost of the public sewers placed by it in its streets and alleys from the owners of the real estate abutting on such streets and alleys, by means of the levy of a special tax or assessment against them for that purpose.

2. If a municipal corporation acts ultra vires in the levying of a tax or assessment, and attempts to collect it, equity has jurisdiction, upon proper bill filed by the party or parties subject to such tax or assessment, to enjoin its collection.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by James Cain and others against the city of Elkins and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Bent & Spears and J. L. Wamsley, for appellants. W. B. Maxwell and B. M. Hoover, for appellees.

COX, J. On the 29th day of July, 1903, the common council of the City of Elkins adopted an ordinance which in part is as follows:

"Be it ordained by the council of the city of Elkins:

"(1) That the expense of all sewers hereafter put in any of the streets and alleys of the city shall be paid for as follows: One-third of the actual cost thereof shall be paid out of the city treasury, and the residue of said cost shall be assessed upon the real estate bounding and abutting upon the street or alley where such sewer is located and built in the proportion of the one-third of such cost upon property abutting on each side of the street or alley where such sewer is located, and the said expense so taxed upon said real property shall be collected from the owner of said property as other taxes assessed thereon and collected.

"(2) The expense of all such sewers may be paid out of the city treasury as the work is done, and subsequently, but within the same fiscal year that the work is completed, the two-thirds of the said expense assessed and collected from the owners of the adjoining and abutting real estate as provided in the first section of this ordinance."

After the adoption of the ordinance the city proceeded to construct sewers in a number of the streets and alleys of the city, and paid the cost thereof out of the city treasury; and, upon report of its engineer of the cost of the work, the common council assessed against the owners of the real estate abutting the streets and alleys so sewer-ed according to said ordinance two-thirds of the cost of the construction of such sewers, proportioned according to the number of feet the real estate of each owner abutted on such streets and alleys; and the city of Elkins, by its collector, was, at the time of the institution of this suit, proceeding to enforce the collection of such assessment against the plaintiffs and those for whom they sue. Plaintiffs James Cain and M. H. Harvey, suing on behalf of themselves and on behalf of the property owners of said city subject to such assessment, filed their bill in the circuit court of Randolph county, setting up these facts, and making other proper allegations against the city of Elkins, and its mayor, members of its common council, and its collector and treasurer, to enjoin and restrain them from collecting from the plaintiffs and those for whom they sue the said assessment, or any portion of it, and from selling the property levied on by the collector thereunder, and to declare such assessment void. On the 15th day of February, 1904, the judge of the circuit court of Randolph county, in vacation, upon presentation of said bill, awarded to the plaintiffs a temporary injunction, substantially as prayed for therein. Depositions were taken by the plaintiffs in support of the bill. At the May term of said circuit court, 1904, the defendant city of Elkins filed its demurrer and answer. The other defendants did not answer. The answer of the city of Elkins admitted substantially the allegations of the bill in relation to the levy and attempted collection of the special assessment complained of, but claimed that the city of Elkins and its officers had the right and authority to so levy and collect said assessment under its charter act. After the filing of the answer, the city of Elkins made its motion to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill, and the case was heard by said circuit court in term on the 14th day of May, 1904, upon the bill and exhibits, separate answer of the city of Elkins, general replication, and upon said motion to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill, but not upon the depositions; and on that day a decree was entered by said circuit court wholly dissolving the injunction and dismissing the plaintiffs' bill, from which decree the plaintiffs appealed to this Court.

The first question raised by the record, which we desire to notice, and which is vital to this case, is, had the city of Elkins, under its charter act, the authority to levy the special tax or assessment complained of in the plaintiffs' bill? This question goes to the very foundation of the case. If the city of Elkins had no such authority, then it has no defense to this suit appearing in the record, and all its acts in adopting the ordinance in pursuance of such supposed authority, and in attempting to collect such special tax or assessment, are without authority. The authority claimed by the city of Elkins to levy and collect such special tax or assessment can only be exercised under the authority of the Legislature. It is in its nature an extraordinary power sometimes delegated by legislative authority to municipal corporations. Under such authority, where it exists, the individual, in addition to the payment of general taxes for the support of municipal government, is required to pay a special or local tax or assessment not levied generally upon all taxable property of the municipality. The charter act under which the authority is claimed in this case is chapter 151, p. 420, of the Acts of the Legislature of 1901. Under the powers conferred by this act the special tax or assessment complained of must be justified, if at all. Section 28, p. 430, of this act, is relied upon to show the existence of the authority to levy this special tax or assessment. This section is voluminous, but for the purposes of this case we deem it necessary to refer only to such parts of it as are considered material in determining the authority of the city of Elkins to levy and collect the special tax complained of. The parts considered material are as follows: "The council of said city shall have power to lay off, vacate, close, open, alter, grade, and keep in good repair the roads, streets, alleys, pavements, sidewalks, crosswalks, drains, sewers and gutters therein, for the use of the citizens or of the public, and to improve and light the same, and keep them free from obstructions of every kind; to regulate the width and kind of pavements and sidewalks, footways, drains and gutters and cause the same to be kept in good order, free and clean by the owners and occupants of real property next adjacent thereto; * * * to cause to be filled up, raised or drained, by or at the expense of the owner any town lot or tract of land covered or subject to be covered by stagnant water; * * * and for the proper draining of city lots and other parcels of land by or at the expense of the owner or occupant thereof; * * * and generally to have power to take such measures as are deemed necessary or advisable to protect persons and property, public or private, within the city, to preserve peace, quiet and good order therein, and to promote the health, safety, comfort and well-being of the inhabitants thereof."

In considering this question of authority

we are guided by well-settled rules of construction. From the many decisions and authorities on this subject, we deduce the following as applicable to this case: Municipal corporations can exercise only such powers as by their charters are granted in terms expressed, or by necessary or fair implication, regard being had to the purpose of the grant. The authority is not inherent in any public corporation to levy assessments upon property. Such authority cannot be inferred from the general welfare clause of the charter, or from similar general provisions, or from the general words of an act, unless the words employed clearly grant the authority. The authority to levy assessments will not be extended by construction, for, as against the corporation, the construction is strict, and nothing in its favor will be inferred, except such matters as are clearly implied from the express words of the act. If any reasonable doubt arises as to the existence of the authority, it will be resolved against the corporation assuming it. The rule of strict construction is applied rigidly when the right and authority to exercise an extraordinary power are assumed by the corporation. Applying these rules to the charter act of the city of Elkins, and the parts above referred to, we do not think that the authority to levy the special tax or assessment complained of can be inferred from the first clause of section 28, which simply grants power to the council to do certain things generally, and makes no provision for the payment of the cost of doing those things by the abutting property owners. Nor do we think such authority can be inferred from the second clause of said section, which provides that the council may cause drains and gutters, etc., to be kept in good order, free and clean, by the owners and occupants of the real property adjoining thereto. Nor do we think such authority is granted or can be inferred from either of the two clauses of said section, one of which provides for the draining of a lot covered or subject to be covered by stagnant water by or at the expense of the owner, and the other for the proper draining of city lots by or at the expense of the owner or occupant thereof. A lot abutting a street or alley may be covered by stagnant water, or liable to become so, and may need draining; but this would not justify the inference that the city can build a public sewer in the street, and assess all or any part of the cost of such public sewer upon all the abutting lot owners, regardless of whether all the lots are covered or liable to be covered by stagnant water, or needed draining, or not. Public sewers in a street or alley are not alone for the purpose of draining lots or lands, although it is true lots or lands may be drained by them if connection therewith be made for that purpose, but they are for many other purposes, such as draining the streets, and providing a proper way to dispose of the refuse and rubbish collecting thereon, and others; and the size, character, and cost of such sewers are governed by the many uses for which they are designed. It does not seem reasonable that the Legislature intended that the owners of abutting real estate should be made to pay, in whole or in part, the cost of such sewers, on the ground alone that the lots of such owners might be drained thereby. We do not think such authority can be maintained under the general welfare clause of said section. If the city of Elkins desires to protect persons and property, public or private, within the city, or promote the health, safety, comfort, and well-being of the inhabitants, by the exercise of this extraordinary power of levying special assessments upon part of the taxable property therein only, it must have clear, and not doubtful, authority to do so. And we think this clause does not even purport to give such authority. The right to pass ordinances not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or of this state, necessary to carry into effect the powers granted by the charter act of the city of Elkins, does not create power or authority, but only permits the city to carry into effect the powers granted. An ordinance is without authority unless made pursuant to the powers granted by the Legislature. Neither by the provisions of the charter act above referred to, nor by any other provisions of the act, is the authority to levy the special tax or assessment complained of expressly given, and we think no such authority is clearly implied from the language used. Therefore we conclude that the city of Elkins has no authority under its charter act (chapter 151, p. 420, Acts 1901) to collect the whole or any part of the cost of the public sewers placed by it in its streets and alleys, by means of the levy of a special tax or assessment against them for that purpose.

We do not deem it necessary, from the view we take of this case, to decide the question of whether or not such tax or as-essment, if the same had been levied pursuant to authority given by the Legislature, could legally be collected from property other than the real estate abutting the streets and alleys in which sewers were placed.

The only other question presented by the record is whether or not a court of equity has jurisdiction in this case. We think the jurisdiction of a court of equity is clearly established under the circumstances of this case, and that it lies in all cases where a municipal corporation acts ultra vires in the levying of a tax or assessment, and attempts to collect it. This question was thoroughly discussed and considered by Judge Snyder in delivering the opinion of the court in Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 667, and was also discussed and considered in the case of Crim v. Town of Philippi, 38 W. Va. 122, 18 S. E. 466, and in the case of Tygart's Valley Bank v. Town of Philippi et al., 38 W. Va. 219, 18 S. E. 489, and in other cases before this court. We think these cases uphold the jurisdiction where the act of levying the tax or assessment is ultra vires, and its collection is attempted, upon proper bill filed by the party or parties subject to such tax or assessment to enjoin its collection.

For the reasons above stated, the plaintiffs' bill in this cause is sufficient, and the motion to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill should not have been sustained by the circuit court, but the injunction should have been made perpetual. Therefore the decree entered by the circuit court of Randolph county in this cause on the 14th day of May, 1904, wholly dissolving the injunction awarded by the judge of the circuit court on the 15th day of February, 1904, and dismissing the plaintiff's bill, is reversed, and, this court proceeding to enter such decree as the circuit court should have entered, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the injunction awarded by the judge of the circuit court of Randolph county in vacation, on the 15th day of February, 1904, be, and the same is, made perpetual.

BILLMYER v. HAMBURG-BREMEN FIRE INS. CO.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 24, 1905.)INSURANCE—ACTION ON POLICY—FORFEITURE—DEFENSES—WAIVER—PROOF OF LOSS—ARBITRATION—AMOUNT OF LOSS—AWARD—MISCONDUCT OF ARBITRATORS.

1. An award under an insurance policy—the submission limited to the amount of loss by fire—does not prevent action on the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, § 1431.]

2. No specification having been filed in the trial court of the defense that the policy of insurance was forfeited by the assignment of the right of the assured, that defense cannot avail on writ of error.

3. A fire insurance policy provides for notice of loss, and proof of loss and arbitration, and contains the independent provision that "the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required have been received by this company, including an award by appraisers, when appraisal has been required." A preliminary proof of loss having been furnished, this clause does not require another after an award upon the amount of loss.

4. An insurance policy provides, in case of disagreement as to amount of loss to goods by fire, for arbitration as to such amount, as a condition precedent to suit on it, and provides that the award shall "determine the amount of such loss." A valid award under it is final and conclusive as to the amount of loss.

5. Awards—effect of.

6. An award under a submission in the country—not a statutory award—cannot be impeached at law by evidence of misconduct of the arbitrators in becoming intoxicated while performing their duties, or other cause not apparent on the face of the award.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Arbitration and Award, §§ 322, 325, 399.]

7. An award has the same effect whether the submission is by writing under seal or not under seal. It may be not so if award is to pass title to land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Arbitration and Award, § 269.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Jefferson County;
E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Action by J. D. Billmyer against the Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. T. Barton and Forrest W. Brown, for plaintiff in error. Geo. M. Beltzhoover and D. C. Westenhaver, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Action on a policy of insurance by J. D. Billmyer against the Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Company for loss by fire to a stock of store goods, in which the court gave judgment for the plaintiff for $873.30 upon a demurrer to the evidence filed by defendant.

A primary question is whether this action, which is based on the policy, can be maintained; the defendant contending that the action cannot be on the policy, but must be on an award made in the case. The policy provides: "In the event of disagreement as to the amount of loss the same shall, as above provided, be ascertained by two competent and disinterested appraisers, the insured and this company each selecting one, and the two so chosen shall first select a competent and disinterested umpire; the appraisers together shall then estimate and appraise the loss, stating separately sound value and damage, and, failing to agree, shall submit their differences to the umpire; and the award in writing of any two shall determine the amount of such loss." The policy also provides: "No suit or action on this policy, for the recovery of any claim, shall be sustained in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements." The declaration goes only on the policy, not on the award. "It is a general rule that a valid award operates to merge and extinguish all claims embraced in the submission. Thereafter the submission and award furnish the only basis by which the rights of the parties can be determined, and constitute a bar to any action on the original demand; and the defendant cannot, in an action to enforce the award, set up in defense thereto any matters embraced in the award." Such is the force of an award upon all matters in controversy in a given transaction, but in this instance the submission was limited to the arbitration of only one matter under the contract of the policy; that is, the amount of the loss by fire. It did not include or close other points of controversy under the contract, but only provided a process of settling one matter—the ascertainment of one element of settlement. We find in 3 Cyc. 585, the following: "Where the whole matter of dispute is referred to quasi judicial determination, the original cause of action is merged by the judgment; but a mere appraisal, valuation, or the like act, does not destroy the original cause of action. At most, it affects the evidence rather than the remedy." "Technically, to constitute a valid common-law award, it is necessary that there should be a submission by the parties of an existing matter of difference, for the purpose of terminating or concluding the parties as to the entire subject-matter in issue between them, as distinguished from a submission for the ascertainment of a single fact or the settlement of a particular question in the chain of evidence constituting a mere appraisal, valuation, or reference not designed to terminate the whole controversy between the parties, which proceeding is said not to be an arbitration." Though the finding on such one matter has the attribute of finality of an award, yet it does not cover all the rights under the contract, does not drown or merge the whole contract, and therefore does not forbid action on it, but only gives evidence in that action as to that one matter. Judge Tucker expresses this view in Bierly v. Williams, 5 Leigh, 700, 703. And there are several instances where the matter of measurement or estimate of work done for pay under a contract was submitted to a person, making his finding final; but it was not supposed to merge the contract, so as to limit action to the award, as, in its nature, it is only an item of evidence in adjudicating the rights of the parties in an action on the contract. Condon v. South Side, 14 Grat. 302; N. & W. R. Co. v. Mills, 91 Va. 613, 22 S. E. 556; Railroad Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035, 29 L. Ed. 255. We conclude that the action was properly brought on the policy, and the award evidence in it. It adds much to the force of this holding to note that the words above quoted of the clause of the policy itself look to a suit on the policy after the award.

The next question comes up on the defendant's claim that the policy was assigned to other parties by Billmyer in violation of its conditions forfeiting it for that cause, and barring the action for that cause. It is enough to say that this defense is first made in this court. No statement of the breach of that clause was filed in the circuit court, as demanded by Code 1899, c. 125, § 64, and it is not involved in the case in this court. Rosenthal v. Ins. Co., 46 S. E. 1021, 55 W. Va. —. Moreover, the assignment, being after loss, is valid. Nease v. Ins. Co., 32 W. Va. 283, 9 S. E. 233.

We take up next the defense that Billmyer failed to furnish proof of loss. He did furnish a proof of loss. It is said to be defective in being too general. The policy called for a statement giving "the cash value of each item thereof and the amount of loss thereon," whereas this statement specified "men's overcoats," "suits," "coats," and other items; giving not even the number of the articles; not giving each item or classes, with their separate values and losses, but total values and losses of classes of goods. The company returned this proof to Billmyer, simply saying that it was not "in proper form," but not specifying defects. The law requires that defects in a proof of loss shall be specified; else it avails nothing. May on Ins. § 469b. But the court has come to the conclusion that the proof of loss is substantially good, as it gives the different classes of goods, and gives value and loss to each class. It also states that it is "a summary of detailed inventory duly certified as correct and true, now in the possession of Billmyer open to inspection and verification, or copy by said insurance company." Now, concede that Billmyer should have furnished that list or a copy; yet he informed the company that it was in the town, open to inspection, or that a copy could be had. The agent in the town did not ask for it; did not say the proof was defective for want of it. Justice would say that he should have called for it, if the proof was not sufficient in itemization. It was so easy to do this. The inventory was right at hand. He contented himself with the declaration, in general terms, that it was not good; not telling Billmyer that he wanted that inventory. It seems hard and technical to hold that Billmyer be defeated under these circumstances; but, as the policy denied power in agents to waive conditions, we do not place our decision on this ground, but say that the proof was sufficient, though it adds to the equity of our holding to mention the omission of the agent to point out defect, which in this respect was remediable, as it shows that Billmyer had the goods inventoried, and that the inventory was near the spot where the agent returned to Billmyer the proof of loss as bad. We have not failed to note that the company's agent states that he told Billmyer that the proof of loss was bad, and that, unless withdrawn, exceptions to it would be filed, and that the attorney of Billmyer, in his presence, agreed to withdraw the proof of loss. Of course, he could withdraw the proof of loss, and it would then be incumbent upon Billmyer to furnish another proof; but, under all the circumstances, we cannot hold that there was such real, intentional withdrawal. The agent told Billmyer that the proof was bad, and, unless withdrawn and an arbitration agreed to, exceptions would be made to the proof of loss, and then the arbitration was agreed to. This means only that Billmyer agreed to arbitrate the loss, substituting arbitration for the proof of loss; not really considering that he withdrew his proof; not intending to do so. We do not say that the agent did by arbitration waive proof of loss, but we say that the proof was sufficient to answer the policy demand for it, and worked its office, and that its legal effect was not nullified by its withdrawal.

But the contention is that after the award there must be a second furnishing of proof of loss. The policy says that, in case of disagreement as to amount of loss, it should go to arbitration, and in another clause provides that "the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of the loss herein have been received by the company, including an award by appraisers when appraisal has been required." It is not the object of this independent clause to require a second proof of loss. Its object is to bind the company to pay within a specified time, and, to guard against any inference of absolute obligation to pay, it reiterates that, precedent to payment, the requirement of certain things found in other clauses must be met. Why a second proof of loss? It is not reasonable to suppose that the intent was to repeat the same thing. Cui bono? The last clause is intended to demand the presentation of an award, if any.

The award: The policy says that, in the event of disagreement as to the amount of loss, the same shall be ascertained by the appraisers and an umpire, "and the award in writing of any two shall determine the amount of such loss." In this case there was an arbitration and award under this clause. The plaintiff contends that it is not binding on him. He gave evidence, over protest, of the cost of the goods by cost marks, and entered into a general inquiry by general evidence as to the value of the goods, and the loss, as if there had been no such award; and this is asserted to be error. The final effect of an award is shown by the quotation above from 3 Cyc. See, also, Turner v. Stewart, 51 W. Va. 493, 41 S. E. 924; Martin v. Rexroad, 15 W. Va. 512; 4 Minor's Inst. 170. The award in this case must finally fix the one matter submitted—the amount of loss. Joyce on Insurance, § 3247; Dickinson v. Railroad, 7 W. Va. 390; Lunsford v. Smith, 12 Grat. 554; Condon v. South Side, 14 Grat. 302; B. & O. v. Polly, Id. 447; M. & P. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035, 29 L. Ed. 255. The defendant says that the award does not appraise the property article by article, or find sound values, as required by the submission. It states on its face that the property was so appraised, and the inventory accompanying it gives columns for sound value as well as loss, and the oral evidence proves that it was so appraised. The award says the appraisal was article by article, and the inventory so shows. A third objection against the award is that the arbitrators were intoxicated when acting. Evidence was admitted to prove this. We think this evidence was not admissible, because the award could not be set aside at law for cause not apparent on its face. This can be done only in equity. 4 Minor's Inst. 184; Dickinson v. Railroad, 7 W. Va. 390. At common law "no extrinsic circumstances or matter of fact dehors the award can be pleaded or given in evidence to defeat it. Thus, for example, fraud, partiality, misconduct, or mistake of the arbitrators is not admissible to defeat it." Story, Eq. § 1452. See Morse on Arbitration, 542; 3 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 154; 3 Cyc. 750. It must not be thought that because Code 1899, c. 108, § 4, gives a court of law power to set aside certain awards for causes not apparent on the face, the principle above stated is wrong. That statute applies only to awards in pending suits, or where the submission provides that the award shall be returned to a court for judgment or decree. This submission is in the country, not in court, and does not provide for return of the award to court. There is a distinction between such awards found in the books. Moore v. Luckess' Next of Kin, 23 Grat. 168; Hogg, Eq. Principles, § 32. 4 Minor's Inst. 188, draws the distinction by saying that an award under a submission in pais can only be affected in equity for matters not disclosed by its face, but it is different as to statutory awards. See Mathews v. Miller, 25 W. Va. 817; Rogers v. Corrothers, 26 W. Va. 238. The submission in this case was by parol—by writing not under seal—and it is said that the award had not finality, for this reason. Authority cited does not sustain this distinction. It is without reason. It is against modern law. "At this day an award under a parol submission operates as a merger of the original cause as fully as one by bond." 3 Cyc. 731. Mere want of seal does not change the nature of the act. See 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 543; Jordan v. Westerman (Mich.) 28 N. W. 826, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836; 1 Bacon, Abridg. 306; Morse on Arbit. 50. It may be different when title to land is to be passed by the award itself, which is rarely the case. I have no doubt a writing not sealed would be good to submit title, as a court would compel performance of the award, as it would of an unsealed written contract. We think it was error to disregard the award, open up the question of amount of loss, and hear evidence of the misconduct of the arbitrators in drinking intoxicants. If the award were for any cause invalid, it would be the worse for the plaintiff in this action, because, where an award is bad, that does not end the submission, but the party must ask another arbitration, which Billmyer did not do; and, the submission still being valid, and the policy making an award a precedent condition to action, the action could not be supported. Billmyer could not arbitrarily disregard it and sue. Ostrander on Insurance, 275; Westenhaver v. German, 113 Iowa, 726, 84 N. W. 717; May on Ins. § 496b.

The award being valid, we reverse the judgment, which disregarded the award, and give judgment for the plaintiff according to it for $486.86, with interest from the 19th day of February, 1903, and costs in the circuit court.

GEORGE v. ZINN et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 24, 1905.)APPEAL — REVIEW — DECREE PRO CONFESSO — TRUST DEED—SALE—EQUITY—JURISDICTION—POWER OF SALE.

1. An appeal from a decree upon a bill taken for confessed, after a motion to correct the same, under section 5 of chapter 134 of the Code of 1899, specifying certain errors therein, and charging generally the existence of others, has been overruled, brings before the appellate court all the errors of law in the decree.

2. A trustee in a deed of trust cannot, as a matter of course, resort to a court of equity to have a sale made under its decree, instead of selling under the power vested in him by the deed of trust; and, unless he shows such impediment to the exercise of his powers as renders it inequitable for him to proceed without the aid of the court, he will not be entertained.

3. The existence of prior or subsequent liens, or both, on real estate which a creditor desires to have sold under a deed of trust held by him, constitutes no impediment to the execution of the power of sale vested in the trustee, unless it be shown that there is such uncertainty, dispute, or controversy as to the amounts or priorities of some or all of them as may deter bidders from offering full and fair prices for the property.

4. The possibility of a right of subrogation and marshaling of assets in the trust creditor desiring such sale confers upon the trustee no right to the aid of a court of equity in the execution of the power of sale vested in him.

5. The rights, powers, and duties of a trustee in a deed of trust executed to secure the payment of a debt are limited and defined by the instrument under which he acts; and he does not control the debt secured, and cannot assert the equities, rights, and powers of the cestui que trust respecting it, to any extent, beyond the powers expressly conferred upon him by the deed of trust, and such incidental and implied powers as are included in the authority so expressly conferred.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by W. T. George against Nannie E. Zinn and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Talbot & Hoover, for appellants. W. T. George, pro se.

POFFENBARGER, J. In the disposition of this appeal, all the questions which it is necessary to determine may be resolved into the following: (1) When a motion in the trial court to correct errors in a decree upon a bill taken for confessed, made as a preliminary step to the taking of an appeal from such decree, specifies certain alleged errors therein, and contains a general charge of other errors apparent on the face of the record and decree, does it affect errors not specifically pointed out? (2) Do a prior judgment lien, a prior vendor's lien, which is alleged and subsequently shown to have been satisfied, and subsequent trust deed and judgment liens, constitute an impediment to a fair execution of the powers of a trustee in a deed of trust executed to secure a debt, authorizing a resort by him to a court of equity for relief? (3) Does a prior judgment lien, covering not only the lot on which the trust debt is secured, but other real estate, constitute such an impediment?

W. T. George, as trustee in a certain deed of trust executed by Nannie E. Zinn and A. W. Zinn, her husband, to secure, upon a town lot owned by Mrs. Zinn, a note for $1,500, executed by the grantors to H. A. Monahan, brought this suit in the circuit court of Randolph county to have the liens on said lot adjudicated as to their amounts and priorities; alleging the lack of such ascertainment to be an impediment to the exercise of the power of sale vested in him by the deed. His bill shows the reservation of a lien for $350 in one of the deeds by which the lot was conveyed to Mrs. Zinn, which it avers has been satisfied, and as to the discharge of which it does not charge the existence of any controversy, dispute, or doubt, and a small judgment lien in favor of A. D. Barlow, which is ultimately found to amount to $85.24, both prior to the deed of trust. It then shows a subsequent, unsatisfied deed of trust, executed to W. T. W. Morgan, trustee, securing, on the same lot, the payment of two notes, for $522.75 each, in favor of Cutright Bros., and two satisfied judgment liens of still later date, and charges that there may be other liens of which the plaintiff is ignorant. Of the interested parties, Nannie E. Zinn, A. W. Zinn, A. D. Barlow, Dora T. Gall, who had held the vendor's lien, and W. T. W. Morgan, trustee, only, were made defendants. Monahan, the creditor in the first deed of trust, and Cutright Bros., creditors in the other, were not made parties at all. Mrs. Zinn owns another lot, conveyed to her by C. F. Teter and wife by deed dated August 30, 1898, and reserving a vendor's lien for $750 of purchase money. On this the Barlow judgment is a lien, and the Cassell judgments had been liens. The bill does not show any other liens upon it, but, from the commissioner's report and the decree, it appears that there were other subsequent liens. On account of the inclusion of this lot in the bill, Charles F. Teter was made an additional party defendant. Though the bill does not say so, it appears from the commissioner's report and decree and the exhibit filed with the bill that A. W. Zinn, the husband of Nannie E. Zinn, owned a third lot, which has been drawn into the proceedings. From the bill and exhibits it appears that on the 18th day of September, 1891, A. W. Zinn and wife conveyed this lot to I. P. Russell, trustee, to secure the payment of a note for $150 executed by A. W. Zinn to A. D. Barlow. On account of this deed of trust on this piece of property, Russell, as trustee, is made an additional party defendant. Of course, the judgment in favor of Barlow against A. W. Zinn and Nannie E. Zinn, dated March 20, 1897, is a lien upon this piece of property, as well as upon Mrs. Zinn's, and the Cassell judgments had been liens upon it. The commissioner's report and decree show a number of other subsequent judgment liens upon it, some of which were against A. W. Zinn alone, and some against him and Nannie E. Zinn. Mrs. Zinn made no appearance in the case. There was a reference to a commissioner, who reported all the liens and their amounts and priorities. By the decree made and entered on the 4th day of May, 1903, the report was confirmed, the liens fixed upon the property, and a sale directed to be made by W. T. George, who was appointed a special commissioner for that purpose, in case of default in payment of the liens. Pursuant to notice, Nannie E. Zinn on the 12th day of October, 1903, filed her petition, praying that the decree be set aside, and the errors and insufficiencies in the decree and the record be corrected. Thereupon the court suspended the sale until further order, and on the 21st day of October, 1903, sustained a demurrer to her petition, dismissed the same, and refused to set aside the decree or correct any errors therein.

The first error specifically assigned was failure to make C. H. Scott, trustee, W. C. Ward, B. L. Butcher, trustee, A. G. Dayton, trustee, Jennie Zinn, and J. C. Arbogast parties. This specification was founded upon testimony taken before the commissioner, showing that there had been certain deeds of trust on some or all of the property, which had been satisfied by payment. Whether they were prior or subsequent, or on what particular lots they had existed, does not appear anywhere in the record. The second assignment is based upon the failure to make Cutright Bros. parties, and the third on the failure to make Monahan a party. The fourth was based upon the failure to ascertain before decree the rental value of the property, and the fifth asserted that it was error to decree a sale of any of the lands, except the lot upon which the plaintiff held his lien. These specifications were followed by a general charge that there were many other errors apparent upon the face of the record and decree.

A motion to correct errors in a decree upon a bill taken for confessed, under section 5, c. 134, Code 1899, must, from its nature, be as broad and efficacious as an appeal, for it is essentially a substitute for an appeal, since section 6 of the same chapter forbids an appeal for any error which may be corrected on such motion, until after it has been made, and said section 5 provides that on such motion the court in which the decree was rendered, or the judge thereof in vacation, may reverse it for any error for which, but for the prohibition in section 6, an appellate court might reverse it, and give such decree as ought to be given. This makes the power and duty of the court or judge on such motion coextensive with the powers and duties of the appellate court upon an appeal. Hence an appeal after a refusal of the court below to correct, upon a petition pointing out certain errors, and charging the existence of others, brings up the whole decree, as to all errors of law, as fully as does an appeal in any other case. In such cases no issues of fact are involved, for none have been made. Camden v. Ferrell, 50 W. Va. 119, 40 S. E. 368. Here the petition specifies certain alleged errors, and then charges others apparent on the face of the decree and proceedings. How can we assume that none save the errors specifically pointed out were insisted upon in the court below? The defect of want of necessary parties, broad as a demurrer to the bill would have been, striking at the basis of the entire suit, was brought to the attention of the court below, and is now relied upon here as the principal assignment of error.

Before entering upon any consideration of this ground of error, it is deemed proper to advert to a more serious defect in the bill, which, though not mentioned in the briefs, cannot escape the notice of the court, since it is apparent upon the face of the record, and is a matter of such substance, that, being noticed, it ought not to be passed over in silence. It is well settled that this court does not limit its investigation to the errors assigned, unless it is apparent that all others have been waived. Rule 5, § 4, 45 S. E. x. Nothing appears from which it can be safely inferred that any defense has been waived. On the contrary, the bill, constituting the foundation of the whole structure, is attacked. Since we are called upon to examine it and pass upon its sufficiency, it is, to say the least, not improper to give it full and thorough consideration.

The extent to which a trustee will be permitted to resort to a court of equity for the removal of impediments to a fair and just execution of his power of sale has never been clearly defined by this court. It would be more accurate to say that no rule has been established by which to determine what is and what is not such an impediment. In Spencer & Miller v. Lee, 19 W. Va. 179, Judge Patton, speaking of the duties and powers of a trustee, lays down this proposition: "He is supposed to be the common friend and agent of both parties, impartial and disinterested, whose duty it is to act justly and discreetly towards those in interest. In order that the trustee may thus act, a court of equity is always open to him, when the amount due by the deed is uncertain or is in good faith disputed, when any cloud rests upon the title, when a reasonable price cannot be obtained, or when for any reason a sale is likely to be accompanied by a sacrifice of the property, which at the cost of some delay may be obviated." The use of the words, "when for any reason a sale is likely to be accompanied by a sacrifice of the property," does not indicate what particular circumstance would constitute a reason for such sacrifice. Reference to the cases cited in support of the proposition reveals the fact that in all of them there was some matter of controversy as to the state of the title, the amount of the debt due, or a conflict as to priority or amounts of liens. Not one of them asserts that the mere existence of one or more prior liens upon the property, undisputed in any sense or to any extent whatever, constitutes any obstruction or impediment to the exercise of the power of sale. A cloud upon the title, or a question as to whether some lien upon the property, other than the one created by the deed of trust under which the sale is about to be made, is prior or subsequent to the trust deed lien, or a question as to whether or not the apparent prior lien is valid, or has been satisfied in whole or in part, would create a state of uncertainty as to what the purchaser would obtain for his money, and thereby prevent him from bidding the amount which the property is, in his opinion, worth. He, of course, would want a clear title, legal or equitable, without any incumbrances uncertain in amount. He would want no uncertainty as to the amount of the prior liens, for his purchase would be subject to them. But if there is no uncertainty as to the amount of such liens, and no cloud upon the title, and no controversy as to whether some debt is prior or subsequent to the one for which the sale is being made, there is nothing to deter him from bidding what, in his judgment, the property is worth. He takes it subject to the prior liens. Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 32 W. Va. 244, 9 S. E. 180; Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 143. They, together with the amount bid by him, constitute the whole cost of the property to him. That the mere existence of prior liens, not shown to be disputed as to their validity or amounts, or as to whether they are in fact prior, do not constitute any impediment to a fair execution of the trust, has been decided by this court in Curry v. Hill, 18 W. Va. 370, holding that, "where the amount of the prior liens is certain and ascertained, the sale of the equity of redemption is proper." In that case the court dismissed the bill filed by the debtor himself, predicated upon the theory that a fair sale could not be made, because of the existence of prior trust-deed liens. There had been no adjudication as to either the amounts or priorities of the liens. The defect of the bill was that it failed to show that any of them were controverted by anybody in either of these particulars. Judge Johnson said, the amount of the prior lien being certain and ascertained, the sale of the equity of redemption under the last trust would be proper. Judge Snyder so understood the rule, for he so states it in Lallance v. Fisher, 29 W. Va. 512, 2 S. E. 775. His language is: "The facts in this case do not show that there was any such controversy or uncertainty about the title to the property, or the amounts and priorities of the debts, as would have justified the trustees in resorting to a court of equity. Much less do they show any right on the part of the debtor to set aside a completed sale made by the trustees." In the preceding paragraph he had discussed the conditions under which a trustee is required to delay sale pending a removal of impediments. In Schurtz v. Johnson, 28 Grat. 657, the rule is stated as understood and declared in Curry v. Hill and Lallance v. Fisher. In that case there were both prior and subsequent liens, but there was no dispute, and the court held that the trustees had violated no duty in selling without having had the liens adjudicated. It is to be observed that all the references to liens in all the cases are as to the amounts and priorities thereof, and uncertainty as to amount or priority. Nowhere has it been declared that the mere existence of liens necessitates or justifies a suit in equity.

A comparatively recent case is Muller's Adm'r v. Stone, 84 Va. 834, 6 S. E. 223, 10 Am. St. Rep. 889, which declares a limitation upon the rule to be that there must be some controversy, some dispute, which stands in the way of a just and fair sale. The liens in that case were junior, but that does not alter the rule. The decision rests not upon the ground that they are junior liens, but upon the ground that it does not appear that there is any uncertainty about them, so as to make it necessary to resort to a court of equity for their ascertainment. Lewis, P., concludes by saying: "But it is not the duty of the trustee in every case to invoke the aid of a court of equity before making a sale of the trust subject, where there are liens thereon; and to hold that he is, or that, if he fails to do so, an injunction will be awarded at the instance of any party in interest, as of course, would be to impose serious delays, involving costs and expense, in the execution of deeds of trust, which the law never contemplated, and without promoting the interests of either creditor or debtor." Proceeding, the learned judge becomes more emphatic, and says: "It is only when the aid of a court of equity is necessary that it ought to be applied for, and it is only in such a case that its aid will be extended. If there are no real impediments in the way of a fair execution of the trust, then its aid is not necessary, and the costs of a lawsuit ought not to be added to the ordinary cost of executing the trust."

This principle is well illustrated in Hogan v. Duke, 20 Grat. 244, which, however, did not involve any question of liens. The debtor attempted to enjoin the sale upon the ground of uncertainty as to the amount due under the deed of trust; it appearing that he was entitled to two credits, of $150 each, both of which were conceded and had never been denied by the creditor. He claimed a further credit for some oats, potatoes, lumber, and other articles. The answer denied that he was entitled to this last credit, and his bill, as to that point, was unsustained by proof. The court held that he could not maintain the suit on the ground of uncertainty, but did remove the trustee because he had been declared bankrupt. Judge Moncure, speaking for the court, said: "There was no uncertainty as to the amount of the cash payment to be so made. It could be made certain by a simple statement from materials furnished by the decree. Still less was there any uncertainty as to the amount necessary to be paid to prevent any sale at all under the trust deed or under the decree. That amount was the balance due on the trust debt, and expenses already incurred in the part execution of the trust."

It may be asked whether, if a purchaser at a sale under a deed of trust buy a piece of property on which there is a prior lien, he may, upon paying off that lien, have a right of action on the covenants in the deed of trust, or by way of subrogation, against the debtor, to recover back the money paid out in discharging the prior lien, so that the ultimate price of the property to him is not the amount of his bid plus the amount of the prior liens, but the aggregate, less whatever sum he may so recover back, and whether this does not introduce an element of uncertainty into the bidding, to the injury of the debtor. It does not, for the obvious reason that, if any such prospective right of action exist—a question which need not be here determined—it is common to all the bidders, and its value not necessarily difficult of ascertainment. Judgments and other claims, secured and unsecured, are subjects of daily barter and sale. If one bidder may be supposed to make an allowance for such contingent recovery, the supposition holds good as to each of the others. At any rate, the courts have never recognized such possible recovery back as an element of uncertainty, and certainly not as an existing controversy. In Lallance v. Fisher, quoted above, Judge Snyder says there were two trust deeds prior to that of Fisher under which the sale was made. Curry v. Hill and other cases cited, in which there were prior liens, clearly preclude any ground of equity jurisdiction. Though a prior lien may be in some sense a cloud on the title, these cases undoubtedly hold it not to be such a cloud as constitutes an impediment to a fair execution of the power of sale. Nor is it to be classed with an outstanding legal title, hostile to both creditor and debtor, affecting the whole subject of the sale, such as existed in Rossett v. Fisher, 11 Grat. 492.

Two cases decided by this court seem to proceed upon a principle contrary to what is here stated, but they do not go so far as to declare that the mere existence of liens gives the right to resort to a court of equity. They are Keck v. Allender, 37 W. Va. 201, 16 S. E. 520, and Hartman v. Evans, 38 W. Va. 660, 18 S. E. 810. In the former the debtor made no resistance to the bill. Its sufficiency was never tested. The suit started with an acceptance of service of process, and an order of reference by consent. The only controversy in the case arose between two creditors, both of whom desired an adjustment of the conflict between their liens. That case, however, would be no exception to the rule, because of this conflict and dispute between the lienholders. Hartman v. Evans, in its declaration of principles, goes far beyond the case decided, and beyond any former decision of this court, or the Virginia court, or any other court, so far as has been discovered. Point 8 of the syllabus says: "Where there is, from any cause, an impediment to his making a fair and proper sale, (1) as where, from the fact of the deed of trust being one of long standing, or from any cause, the amount due and to be raised by a sale is uncertain; (2) where there are various deeds of trust or other incumbrances; (3) where the legal title is outstanding; (4) where there is a cloud upon the title—the trustee may, of his own motion, apply to a court of equity to remove such impediment to a proper execution of the trust; and, if he should fail to do this, the party injured by his default has a right to make such application." In that case the deed of trust under which the sale was sought to be made was the last one of four, and it recited that it had been given for the amount due upon the three former ones, so that in fact there was but one debt. The court expressed a doubt as to whether the creditor was bound by this recital, and as to whether or not the legal title might not be outstanding. Hence the decision does not proceed upon the ground of undisputed incumbrances, and a re-examination of its soundness, as regards the sufficiency of its allegations respecting uncertainty in the debt, and as to the effect of an outstanding legal title, need not be inquired into, though it may be remarked, as to the outstanding legal title in a trustee in a prior deed of trust, as an independent ground of equitable relief in such case, if it was intended to say that it is sufficient, that the case is in direct conflict with the decision in Curry v. Hill, 18 W. Va. 370. The obiter dictum on the subject of incumbrances immediately precedes a citation of Horton v. Bond, 28 Grat. 815, and Cole v. McRae, 6 Rand. 644. Both of these were judgment lien creditors' bills to enforce the liens and set aside fraudulent deeds. Neither of them in any degree supports the suggestion ventured.

It is difficult to perceive any reason for allowing a resort to expensive litigation for the accomplishment of that which the parties can do themselves. Courts were instituted to give relief in those instances in which there are differences, disputes, controversies, to settle. It is contrary to fundamental principles of law to allow a man to have the aid of a court when his situation is such that he does not need it. The business of courts is to hear and determine controversies, not to make calculations for people or advise them in ordinary business transactions. For the purpose of allowing a useless and expensive proceeding, the law does not presume that, in cases of public sales, men will not ascertain for themselves plain, open, and undisputed facts, nor that they do not have the capacity to do so. Neither will it be assumed that they are ignorant of the law—the facts being known—or presumed that men will not recognize each other's legal rights, or that controversies exist or will arise. These things must be made to affirmatively appear.

It may be supposed that, because the prior judgment lien covers two lots owned by Mrs. Zinn and one owned by her husband, this gives equity jurisdiction. It might afford a basis for a bill by Monahan, the creditor. Conditions may be such as to enable him to say to the judgment creditor, "As you have two securities for your debt, and I have but one, and that is insufficient to pay both your debt and mine, you shall first resort to the other piece of property." Under some circumstances a creditor may do this. Without intending to intimate that Monahan may, under the circumstances of this case, do so, it is clear that, if anybody can do it, in respect to his debt, it must be himself. It affords no ground for a suit at the instance of a trustee. His duties are prescribed and defined by the deed of trust under which he is acting. Crumlish v. Railroad Co., 32 W. Va. 244, 9 S. E. 180. He is not the general representative of Monahan, as regards his debt. His duty is only to sell in case of default. His only right to resort to a court of equity, if he has any, is incidental to that power of sale. It can only be done for the purpose of removing impediments to that sale, and, if none exist (and his bill fails to show that any do), then he has no right to bring such suit. He has no right to collect the debt as trustee, except in the event of a sale of the property by him. To hold that the trustee in the deed of trust represents the creditor for all purposes in the collection of the debt would extend his powers far beyond the limits fixed by the instrument under which he holds, and would have the effect of depriving the creditor of the control of his debt. He could subject him to useless costs, prosecute unsuccessful suits, and compel the creditor to undergo unnecessary delay. That is clearly not the office of such a trustee.

The principle or rule which might give a right to this trust creditor, or other junior encumbrancer of the lot on which the trust lien is, to compel the judgment lienor to resort to the other lot, is that which requires the marshaling of funds, securities, or assets, founded upon the principle of subrogation. This is never enforced at the instance of the common debtor. Sheldon on Sub. 64; McDevitt's Appeal, 70 Pa. 373; Butler v. Stainback, 87 N. C. 216; Plain v. Roth, 107 Ill. 588; Witherington v. Mason, 86 Ala. 345, 5 South. 679, 11 Am. St. Rep. 41. It applies only as between creditors of a common debtor. Plain v. Roth, cited; Lee v. Gregory, 12 Neb. 282, 11 N. W. 207. Since the rule does not operate at all in favor of the debtor, how can it be said the trustee may base a suit upon it for his benefit? As his only duty to the creditor is to sell the property in such manner as not to sacrifice it, he clearly has no right to represent him in the assertion of equities against other creditors. Would a suit, after sale under the deed of trust, to shift the whole or part of the Barlow judgment onto the other lot, assuming that conditions are such as to warrant a marshaling of assets, injure or prejudice the purchaser? Not to any extent whatever. The lot is bound for the entire judgment. The judgment creditor may enforce it against either lot, unless prevented from doing so by some other creditor asserting against him the two-fund rule; and, if no such claim is set up before he obtains satisfaction, it cannot be asserted against the land at all, but may go against the fund collected by the judgment creditor. Sheldon on Sub. §§ 62, 66. Clearly, the purchaser takes the land subject to the entire amount of the judgment, and the only open question is whether he shall ultimately pay all of it or any of it to the prior creditor, or to other creditors who may marshal the assets against the former. As to the amount of that judgment, the purchaser becomes a stakeholder. He must know he is liable to somebody for the whole of it, and he is presumed to be governed by that in his bidding. Therefore it creates no uncertainty as to what the purchaser must pay or as to what he buys, and cannot work any sacrifice of the property. If the power of sale can, in view of our statutory regulations, be treated as a cumulative remedy, so as not to deprive the creditor of his suit to enforce the lien of his trust deed, this gives the trustee no right to prosecute such suit, for the terms of the deed conferring his authority do not go that far.

The bill in this case sets up no question about the amount of any lien, prior or subsequent, nor any about the order in which they, or any of them, are to be satisfied. As to those which are alleged to have been paid off, it is not shown that the fact is denied, or that the trustee or anybody else has made any inquiry about them. Such an inquiry would involve less time and expense than a judicial investigation of matters which in no sense of the terms call for judicial determination. The paragraph of the bill which it is supposed was intended to show how the trustee is hampered and obstructed reads as follows:

"Plaintiff further says that, owing to all of the aforesaid judgments appearing of record, and the aforesaid deeds of trust, that it is impossible for him to proceed in the enforcement of the trust for the collection of the debt due to said Monahan by advertising and selling the property as provided for in the said deed of trust; and therefore he avers that he has a right to file a bill in equity for the purpose of having the court to ascertain what portion of the aforesaid debts have been paid, and what amount thereof remains unpaid, in order that the property, when sold, may sell more readily, and to a better advantage for the creditors."

Though the deed of trust empowers the trustee to sell only upon the request of the creditor, the bill does not aver that any such request has been made. If the creditor were a party, this defect might be cured by his acquiescence in the proceedings; but he is not a formal party, and it does not affirmatively appear that he ever presented any claim to the commissioner. Whether that officer ascertained and reported the debt from the bill and exhibits alone, or from them and a claim presented by Monahan, cannot be determined from the record. If there were a presumption that he did, it might be overcome by the fact that the debt is decreed to W. T. George, trustee, and not to Monahan. See Bryan v. McCann (W. Va.) 47 S. E. 143.

The general rule in equity is that all persons interested in the subject-matter of a controversy are necessary parties. For the appellee here, the application of this rule to the case in hand is virtually admitted; but it is insisted that the defect has been cured by the appearances of all interested parties before the commissioner, since his report ascertains and presents their claims. Whether this position is sound, need not be determined, because, for defects in the bill, the whole structure of the suit falls, and we will not assume that necessary parties will be omitted from any future proper proceeding.

The bill, in its present form, being wholly devoid of equity, the decree must be reversed and the cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to amend, or have his bill dismissed without prejudice, as he may elect.

BLUE v. CAMPBELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 24, 1905.)

EQUITY—DEMURRER TO BILL—REMAND ON APPEAL—RES JUDICATA—AMENDMENT—JUDICIAL SALES—NOTES.

1. Where a demurrer to a bill in equity has been erroneously overruled by the circuit court, and upon appeal the demurrer is sustained, the decree reversed, and the cause remanded, "to be heard and finally determined according to the rules and principles of equity," although the decree contains no directions for leave to plaintiff to amend his bill, the judgment of the appellate court is not res judicata, and the bill may be amended.

2. Where a sale has been made by a commissioner under a decree of court, and notes taken for the deferred payments, no demand for payment thereof is required or necessary.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by Fred O. Blue, special commissioner, against George O. Campbell and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified.

Samuel V. Woods, for appellants. Dayton & Dayton and F. O. Blue, for appellee.

McWHORTER, J. In the cause of Albert G. Welch et al. against George G. Campbell et al., in the circuit court of Barbour county, a sale of a tract of 256 acres of land was made January 3, 1861, by Special Commissioners David Goff and Samuel Woods, which sale was confirmed in 1866, and in the decree of confirmation said Woods was appointed special commissioner to convey to the purchaser, George Campbell, said tract of land upon the payment of all the purchase money. Commissioner David Goff died, and the purchase money not having all been paid, said Samuel Woods instituted his suit to enforce the collection thereof by the sale of the said tract of land, and obtained a decree for the sale thereof, from which decree George G. Campbell, the only heir at law and distributee of the purchaser, George Campbell, and the surety on the purchase notes, appealed to this court. The demurrer to the bill was sustained, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein. See 45 W. Va. 203, 32 S. E. 208. The plaintiff, Samuel Woods, having departed this life, F. O. Blue was appointed in his stead as special commissioner to collect said money and to prosecute said suit. Commissioner Blue filed his amended bill in the said circuit court, to which bill the defendants George Campbell and Bedford Campbell filed their demurrer, as did also the defendants J. Hop Woods and Samuel V. Woods, administrators with the will annexed of Samuel Woods, which demurrers were overruled. Said defendants George G. Campbell and J. Hop Woods and Samuel V. Woods also filed their answers, to which the plaintiff replied generally. The cause was referred to a commissioner, and the balance due on the purchase money of said Gilbert Boyles farm was ascertained, and a report made by the commissioner, to which report the defendants Campbell filed seven exceptions. The cause was heard on the 31st of October, 1903, when the court overruled said several exceptions and confirmed the report, and entered a decree for $3,031.55, with interest from October 30, 1903, and decreed the sale of the said land to pay the same. From this decree the defendants George Campbell and Bedford Campbell appealed, and say that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the bill, in confirming the report of the commissioner, in overruling petitioner's exceptions to the commissioner's report, and in decreeing "that there existed a lien of $3,031.55 in favor of Blue, special commissioner, for original purchase money, against the Gilbert Boyles farm, and decreeing sale thereof."

It is insisted by appellants that the decree of this court, in sustaining the demurrer to plaintiff's bill, is res judicata, and that the amended bill filed by the plaintiff, Blue, commissioner, should have been dismissed upon the demurrer. The appellate court sustained the demurrer to the bill for want of proper allegations of the nonpayment of the purchase money due from said Campbell on the said land. The bill was not dismissed, but the cause, with the other two causes heard with it, was remanded to the circuit court, "to be heard and finally determined according to the rules and principles of equity." It could have been remanded for no other reason than to permit such amendments as would warrant the granting of relief if such amendments could be made. It is the practice of this court, as well as of the circuit courts (and that practice is founded upon the principles of equity), where it is obvious that the plaintiff may be able to so amend the allegations of his bill as to entitle him to relief upon the sustaining of the demurrer, to grant leave to so amend. While there is no direction in the opinion to the circuit court to allow an amendment, it is here done clearly by implication. If this court had intended that its decision should be final, the bill would have been dismissed, and not remanded to the circuit court. In Pickens v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 15 S. E. 997 (Syl., point 1), it is held: "It is not error to omit giving leave to amend upon dismissing a bill upon demurrer, where the record does not disclose that any amendment improving the bill can be made." This language implies, beyond question, that if, on the other hand, it clearly appear that the bill can be so amended as to entitle the plaintiff to relief, he will be permitted to so amend his bill. As held in Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108 (Syl., point 5): "It is the practice of courts of equity to allow amendments to bills when the purposes of justice require it." In Atkinson v. Sutton, 23 W. Va. 197 (Syl., point 1), it is held: "Where it is apparent to the court, from the record of a cause, that the real merits sought to be determined are not so presented, either on account of defects in the pleadings or in the evidence, as to enable it to decide the real questions in controversy, it is the duty of the court to require such defects to be removed before proceeding to hear the cause and pass upon it finally. And in a plain case, where the inferior court fails to discharge this duty, the appellate court will for that reason alone reverse and remand the cause." In the case at bar the court had overruled the demurrer to the plaintiff's bill, which bill was clearly bad upon demurrer; and, under the last above ruling, it was the duty of the circuit court to have sustained the demurrer and granted leave to amend the allegations of the bill, it being clear that the bill was susceptible of such amendment. Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288; Doonan v. Glynn, 26 W. Va. 225; Love v. Tinsley, 32 W. Va. 25, 9 S. E. 44. The authorities hold that, in order to amend, the plaintiff must ask leave. 2 Tuck. Comm. 268; Hart v. Railroad Company, 6 W. Va. 336; Pickens v. Kniseley, supra. Of course, this rule cannot apply where, by the overruling of the demurrer, there is no occasion for asking leave to amend. In support of their contention that the decree of this court is res judicata, appellants, by counsel, cite Butler v. Thompson, 52 W. Va. 311, 43 S. E. 174. This case is not applicable to the case at bar, as it refers to a decree of the appellate court reversing the decree upon the merits, and remands the cause to the circuit court "for further proceedings therein to be had according to the rules and principles stated in the written opinion" filed in the cause, and that the findings of fact set forth in the opinion are binding upon the court below, which court could not permit new pleadings and further evidence to be filed, but must enter a decree in accordance with the opinion. The decision in the case at bar was not, upon the merits of the case, but a ruling upon the demurrer for want of proper allegations, and the cause was remanded for further proceedings, when, if it had appeared that the bill could not have been amended, the same would have been dismissed in the appellate court, and not remanded for further proceedings therein to be had. The amended bill filed by Commissioner F. O. Blue contains sufficient allegations to entitle him to relief. He alleges the nonpayment of the purchase money, and that the same is still due and owing and has never been paid, and alleges that the cause of such nonpayment was the fact that Commissioner Woods was the counsel of the said Campbells, and that said Woods and George G. Campbell, his client, colluded and combined together to prevent the collection of the said money, and to defraud the then infant parties, who were also nonresidents of the state, out of the sum due them from the proceeds of the sale of said Boyles farm, and that all the delays and laches in the collection of said purchase notes were solely due to the misconduct of said Commissioner Woods and said purchaser, Campbell; that the defendant S. L. Reger claimed to be the assignee of certain portions of said funds from the parties defendants entitled thereto, and that he, in turn, had conveyed and assigned said interests claimed by him. The original suit, in which this land was sold, was still pending. Having been left off the docket, it was reinstated by order of the court on the 17th of July, 1886. On the 7th of October, 1886, George G. Campbell (the surety on said notes, and the sole heir at law and distributee of George Campbell) and Commissioner Woods made an adjustment of that part of said purchase money which was payable to the said George G. Campbell, which was entered as credits upon the three several notes by Commissioner Woods. This was an acknowledgment at that date that all the purchase money had not been paid. If he then contended that it was all paid, why did he not satisfy his own counsel, Judge Woods, that it had been so paid, and receive from him a deed for the land? His contention is that it was paid to Commissioner Goff about 1865 or 1866. The other tracts purchased by him were paid for at that time, and he received from Commissioner Woods deeds for the same, yet he received no deed for this tract of 256 acres. Commissioner Goff lived until about the year 1882 or 1883; some 17 or 18 years after he claims to have paid all the purchase money; yet during all that time he failed to satisfy his counsel, Commissioner Woods, by receipts of Goff or otherwise, that he had paid all the purchase money to entitle him to a deed to the property. All this time the suit in which sale was made and confirmed, and in which proceedings on a rule or otherwise could have been taken for the collection of the purchase money, was pending in the court, and he took no steps and made no effort in all that time to have the suit expedited, although it stood there a constant menace to his interests. Was it not his duty, in his own interest, to have placed himself in a position to have demanded the deed for the property? In Fisher v. McNulty, 30 W. Va. 186, 3 S. E. 593 (Syl. point 3), it is held: "Delay and laches in the prosecution of a suit after it has been commenced are not generally matters of which the defendant can complain or avail himself where the record fails to show that he made any effort in the court below to expedite the cause."

After the laches and delay of which the defendant Campbell was guilty, to the detriment of his own interests, during the 17 or more years from the time he claimed the payment in full was made to Goff, before Goff's death, he is hardly in a position to claim that plaintiffs were guilty of laches and delay in prosecuting their suit. He was in a position during all that period to have enforced the decree providing for making him a deed, if in fact he had paid the purchase money, as he contends. The beneficiaries were nonresidents, and depending upon their counsel to press the collection of their claim; and the active commissioner was without the county in which the collection had to be made, while his co-commissioner was sole counsel for the purchaser, and for his sole distributee after his decease, and residents of the same county. A vendor's lien or a trust is never barred by the statute of limitations, so far as the trust subject is concerned. The notes made for the debt are barred, at law, as a personal liability; but the subject-matter of the lien is always subject to the equitable, and not to the legal, rule; and while, under the statute, an obligation is barred in 10 years, yet, under the equitable rule, no absolute bar arises, but only a presumption of payment after the lapse of 20 years, which presumption may be rebutted. Hopkins v. Cockerell, 2 Grat. 88, is a case where H., living in Pennsylvania, sold to B. his right and title to a tract of land in Virginia, and agreed to convey the same when B. should pay the purchase money, for which B. executed his bonds to H. in 1797. N. purchased B.'s bargain, and agreed by parol with H. to take B.'s place, and paid H. $300 in part of the purchase money in the same year. N. died in 1815, not having received a conveyance or paid the balance of the purchase money, and his executors, under a power in his will, sold the land. In 1832 a suit was brought by an assignee of one of the devisees of N. to obtain his portion of the purchase money remaining unpaid on the last sale. H. was made a party defendant and answered the bill, and then filed a cross-bill setting up his claim to a lien upon the land for the balance of the original purchase money. To the cross-bill the representative of N. in 1834 pleaded the statute of limitations. It was held, "The statute is no bar to the claim of H.;" and, "under the circumstances of this case, held, the lapse of time is no bar to H.'s recovery upon his lien as against the representative of N. and the assignee of the devisee of N." Criss v. Criss, 28 W. Va. 388-396; Coles v. Withers, 33 Grat. 186; Camder v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 674; Pitzer v. Burns, 7 W. Va. 63; Brown v. Lambert, 33 Grat. 256; Calwell v. Prindle, 19 W. Va. 604. In Evans v. Johnson, 39 W. Va. 299, 19 S. E. 623, 23 L. R. A. 737, 45 Am. St. Rep. 912 (Syl., point 3), it is held: "No time bars the right, either under the statute of limitations or presumption of payment, of a vendor to recover purchase money for land, if he has not parted with the legal title." Thus it seems to have been held by this court, unequivocally, that presumption of payment cannot avail as a defense where the legal title has been withheld. I presume it will not be contended for a moment that the defendant Campbell could enforce the decree for the conveyance to him under his purchase of the 256 acres of land, without affirmatively showing to the satisfaction of the court that all the purchase money had been paid.

The first and second exceptions to the commissioner's report raise the same questions that are raised upon the demurrer to the bill.

The third exception is that the commissioner erred in "calculating the interest from the 19th of March, 1866, when, in truth and in fact, no interest should be calculated thereon, except from the date of the demand of payment from the special commissioner by those entitled to receive the purchase money; it having been shown by the deposition of Commissioner Woods that no demand had ever been made at the time his bill was filed." The purchase of the 256 acres from the commissioners on the 3d day of January, 1861, although not confirmed until March, 1866, relates back to the day of sale, and the notes, all bearing date on the day of sale, bear interest from their date, as shown on their face. Cale v. Shaw, 33 W. Va. 299, 10 S. E. 637. The record itself was a standing demand for the payment of the purchase money.

The fourth exception is that the commissioner did not find, as shown by the deposition of Samuel Woods, that George G. Campbell was entitled to $179.65, to be credited on his debt as of the date of said statement, as an heir of the half-blood of George W. Bedford. It appears from the record that this exception is well taken, and should have been sustained, as it appears from the deposition of Samuel Woods, after the payment of all the debts of George W. Bedford, there remained a sum of $2,094.38 due to the estate of said Bedford, for distribution amongst his heirs; the amount of the same due to George G. Campbell, half-brother and heir of the half-blood, the sum of $179.65, which was not credited to the said George G. Campbell, and for which he was entitled to have a credit as of the 19th day of March, 1866. In this respect the decree is erroneous.

The fifth exception to the report is because the amount found and the debt reported by Commissioner Kittle are at variance with his former report, made on the 27th of January, 1902, where he found the amount due to be $1,059.93, upon which he calculated the interest from the 9th day of December, 1865, while in the report now complained of he found said amount to be $930.40, with interest from March 19, 1866. As this variance is in favor of the appellants, they cannot complain of it, and the last amount is that fixed by Samuel Woods in his deposition.

The sixth exception is that he does not report the persons entitled to receive the money which he finds due and payable to the special commissioner. While the commissioner does not give this information in his last report, of September 24, 1903, it is sufficiently set out in the report of January 27, 1902, with the exhibits filed therewith.

The seventh and last exception is because the commissioner did not find the debt claimed to have been paid as testified to by George G. Campbell in his deposition, which was uncontradicted by any testimony and uncontroverted by any circumstances, except that the original notes remained in the file of the papers. This proposition does not appear to be seriously considered by counsel for appellant. Section 23, c. 130, Code 1899, is too plain to be misunderstood, and all that is said about it by counsel for appellant in his brief is in his "deductions" at its close, "(g) Campbell is rendered competent to testify because Woods, commissioner, testified as to the same matter."

For the reasons herein given, the decree will be modified by deducting the credit of $175.65, as of the 19th of March, 1866, from the said sum of $930.40, which leaves $750.75 as the true amount, bearing interest from March 19, 1866, until October 30, 1903, amounting to the sum of $2,445.17, the amount of said decree, with interest from said October 30, 1903, until paid; and, with such modification, the decree is affirmed, with costs to the appellants, as the party substantially prevailing, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein.

(138 N. C. 566)

STATE v. TURNAGE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1905.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in a homicide case that on all the evidence, if believed, defendant was guilty of manslaughter, at least, is error; a finding of innocence being authorized by defendant's testimony that he did not fire the gun; that he had it in his hand, hanging down by his side, and as he was coming out of the house it went off accidentally; that at the time he had his hand in front of the hammer; that he did not know it was loaded, and did not intentionally point it at any one; that it went off before he saw the boys, one of whom was shot; and that he and his brother had been playing, and he got the gun to continue to frolic; and there being further evidence that the gun was usually kept unloaded, and that a third person had said he loaded it that morning.

Appeal from Superior Court, Greene County; Council, Judge.

John Turnage was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

The Attorney General, for the State.

BROWN, J. The prisoner was tried at September term, 1904, of the superior court of Greene county upon a bill of indictment charging him with the murder of James Hunt. He was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals to this court. We set out only so much of the evidence as is necessary to an understanding of the case: The evidence on the part of the state tends to show that on the day of the homicide the prisoner, then about 27 years of age; the deceased; Blaney Turnage, 19 years of age; and Dan Moore and Sam Moore—were in the yard of Mrs. Turnage. The boys had been working in tobacco, and, when it began raining, sought shelter in a ginhouse. After the rain was over, they went to Mrs. Turnage's yard, near the house, for the purpose of getting some peaches. Dan Moore and Blaney Turnage were up in the tree, gathering peaches, eating some, and dropping others down to the boys below. The boys up the tree were "chunking peaches down at the others, and John Turnage, the prisoner, threw a brickbat up the tree at Blaney Turnage, who was in the tree." The boys then left the tree and went into Mrs. Turnage's back yard. There was evidence on the part of the state tending to prove that the prisoner went around the house, and Blaney Turnage, his brother, followed him with an ax. The prisoner went in the house, and came out with a gun in his hands, with the muzzle in the direction of the deceased and his companions, James Hunt and others. Dan Moore, a state's witness, testified that he could not say "how high the gun was up, or whether to the prisoner's shoulder or not; that he heard the gun fire when the prisoner was 12 feet from the deceased. James Hunt was hit—shot in the front of the stomach—and killed." The prisoner, after testifying to the occurrences at the peach tree, stated, in substance, that he and Blaney Turnage were playing, that Blaney followed him with an ax, and that they were talking and laughing. "I went in the house and got the gun and took it out with me. It was an old gun. I went out the front door with the gun in my hand. As I stepped out of the door and got clear off the porch, it fired, and as it fired I looked, and saw the others coming around the house. The crowd were following me, Blaney in the rear. When I got the gun I did not know it was loaded—had no knowledge of it. After shooting, I learned that the gun had been loaded. Did not intentionally point the gun at any one. The deceased told me I did not intend to shoot him or any one." The prisoner further stated on cross-examination that: "The gun fired before I saw the boys. I did not notice whether the gun was cocked or not. It had been on the rack a long time, and I did not know it was or had been loaded. I got the gun to frolic with Blaney. If I had had an idea it was loaded, I would not have taken it from the rack. I carried the gun in my right hand, swinging by my side. I did not cock the gun. My hand held the gun in front of the hammer." Among other things, Blaney Turnage testified for the prisoner that "the gun was not kept loaded usually. Ben Danner told me he loaded the gun that morning."

We will notice only one exception of the prisoner, as, in our opinion, the court below erred, and a new trial must be had. Among other instructions, the court charged the jury that, upon all the evidence in the case, if believed beyond a reasonable doubt, the prisoner was guilty of manslaughter, at least. We do not controvert any of the legal propositions contended for by the state as to what acts will constitute manslaughter when death ensues from the reckless use of a deadly weapon, such as a pistol or gun. Pointing a gun at another under such circumstances as would not excuse its intentional discharge constitutes, in this and many other states, a statutory misdemeanor, and an accidental killing occasioned by it is manslaughter. In this state it is immaterial whether the gun is loaded or not. Acts 1889, p. 502, c. 527. At common law, one who leveled a loaded gun at another without intention of discharging it, and the gun goes off accidentally and kills another, is guilty of manslaughter. Regina v. Weston, 14 Cox, C. C. 346. Involuntary manslaughter has been defined to be "where death results unintentionally, so far as the defendant is concerned, from an unlawful act on his part not amounting to a felony, or from a lawful act negligently done." 1 Wharton, Cr. Law (10th Ed.) § 305; Barnes v. State, 134 Ala. 36, 32 South. 670. Applying these general principles of the law of homicide to the evidence in this case, we are of the opinion that the judge erred in his instruction that, in any view of it, the prisoner was guilty of manslaughter. We do not mean to intimate that there was not sufficient evidence to go to the jury, but we think the guilt or innocence of the prisoner should have been submitted to the jury upon all the evidence, with full and appropriate instructions as to what constitutes manslaughter, as the state asked for no other verdict, and presenting to the jury the contentions of the state and prisoner arising upon the evidence. Nor do we mean to intimate that, in order to constitute manslaughter, the gun must have been intentionally discharged by the prisoner. Any unjustifiable and reckless use of it which jeopardizes the safety of another is unlawful, and, if death ensues therefrom, it is manslaughter. But where the evidence is conflicting, or where the facts testified to are such that reasonable minds may draw different inferences therefrom, it is settled law in this state that the case should be submitted to the jury untrammelled by such an instruction as the one excepted to by the prisoner in this case.

The painstaking judge who tried the case in the court below seems to have overlooked the prisoner's evidence in some particulars. The prisoner denies that he fired the gun; states that he had it in his hand, hanging down by his side, and, as he was coming out of the house, it went off accidentally; that, at the time it went off, he had his hand in front of the hammer, holding the gun; that he did not know it was loaded, and that he did not intentionally point it at any one; that the gun fired before he saw the boys; and that he and his brother Blaney had been playing, and he got the gun to continue the frolic. Blaney Turnage testified that the gun was usually kept unloaded, and that Danner told him he loaded it that morning. The state's witness Dan Moore testified that he could not say how high the muzzle of the gun was up, or whether the prisoner had it to his shoulder or not. It is useless to discuss the evidence at any length. It is apparent to us that two different inferences may be drawn from it. Robertson v. State, 70 Tenn. 239, 31 Am. Rep. 602. In considering it in the light of the instruction given, that construction should be put upon it which is most favorable to the prisoner; and, if there is any view of it by which innocence may be inferred, such view should be presented to the jury. We quote with approval the wise words of Mr. Justice Connor in granting a new trial in State v. Geo. W. Daniel, 134 N. C. 673, 46 S. E. 991, for a similar error committed by the writer of this opinion when on the superior court bench: "The prisoner, however guilty, is entitled to be tried by 'the ancient mode of trial by jury,' in which the court decides all questions of law, and the jury all questions of fact." "The jury are the constitutional judges not only of the truth of the testimony, but of the conclusions of fact resulting therefrom." Henderson, J., in Bank v. Pugh, quoted in the above case.

For the error pointed out, there must be a new trial.

New trial.

FERGUSON v. TWISDALE et al.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—ADVANCEMENTS FOR CROPS—CONSTRUCTION OF MORTGAGE.

W. and F. together cultivated a crop on F.'s land, and, to obtain fertilizer, they gave a crop mortgage on "all the crops cultivated by us" on F.'s land; the lien directing a sale of the crop for "payment of the debt and interest and for any surplus to us." Held, that the individual crop of F., cultivated by him on another part of the same tract of land, on which no part of the fertilizer was used, could not be held by the mortgage lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Webb, Judge.

Action by H. R. Ferguson against J. H. Twisdale and J. H. Fenner. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants' appeal. Reversed.

E. L. Travis, for appellants. Albion Dunn and Daniel & Green, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This action is brought to recover possession of a lot of peanuts and corn. The facts are embodied in a statement of "agreed facts," the substance of which is as follows: The two defendants cultivated the crop together on the W. E. Fenner plantation during the year 1903. During the same year the defendant J. H. Fenner individually cultivated a crop on another part of the same plantation, in which Twisdale had no interest. The defendants needed guano for their "copartnership crop," and purchased it from the plaintiff, and used it exclusively on the Twisdale crop. Fenner used none of it for his individual crop. The crops seized in this action are those raised by Fenner exclusively, and embrace none of the Twisdale joint crop. Twisdale was a subtenant of his codefendant, on the half-share plan; J. H. Fenner furnishing the land and team, and Twisdale furnishing the labor and guano; the crop raised to be equally divided. The plaintiff had no notice of the terms of the contract between Fenner and Twisdale, but knew J. H. Fenner had an individual crop on the same plantation, separate and distinct from the Twisdale crop. To secure the plaintiff for the guano used on the Twisdale crop, the defendants executed a note and crop lien. The descriptive words used in the latter are, "all crops cultivated by us this year 1903 on the lands known as the W. E. Fenner lands and situated in Halifax County, including tobacco, peanuts," etc. The lien directs the sale of the crop for "payment of the debt and interest and for any surplus to us."

His honor in the court below held that the crop lien or mortgage conveyed the Fenner individual crop, as well as the Twisdale joint crop, and gave judgment against the defendant. In this we think there is error. The intention of the parties to the crop lien is to be collected from the whole instrument, and the words used are to be understood in their plain and literal meaning. Where the meaning is not clear, in sustaining it courts will consider the circumstances under which the contract was made, the subject-matter, the relation of the parties, and the object of the agreement, in order to ascertain the intention of the parties. "Courts will not make an agreement for the parties, but will ascertain what their agreement was—if not by its general purport, then by the literal meaning of its words." Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) 404; Roberts v. Bonaparte, 78 Md. 191, 20 Atl. 918, 10 L. R. A. 689. In all written contracts and agreements the language used is the primary guide to the meaning. But sometimes the language is ambiguous. In such cases the meaning must be derived from the interests and relations of the parties, as appearing in the contract. "Wherever the promise is by two or more persons, as where the words 'we promise,' etc., are used, the liability is prima facie joint." Clark, supra, 415. The intention of the parties determines the quantity of estate, as well as the property conveyed. The terms and phraseology of description must be interpreted with that view, if it can reasonably be done. When conflicting descriptions are contended for, and cannot be reconciled, courts will adopt that construction which best comports with the manifest intention of the parties and the circumstances of the case. "The intention must be collected from the surrounding circumstances at the time the mortgage was made, and the language of the instrument itself." 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. 919, and cases cited. What were the surrounding circumstances when this mortgage was executed? It appears that Twisdale and Fenner were the owners of a joint crop, which they were cultivating in copartnership on the W. E. Fenner land, and that J. H. Fenner owned individually another crop on another part of the same plantation. Fertilizers were needed for the joint crop. By the terms of their farming agreement, Twisdale was to furnish them. To enable him to do so, J. H. Fenner, co-owner of the crop they were cultivating together, joined in the execution of this crop mortgage to the plaintiff. All the fertilizers were used by Twisdale on the joint crop, and none on the individual crop of Fenner. If it had been the intention of the mortgagee to include the individual crop of Fenner, knowing, as he did, that Fenner had a separate crop, it is very likely that he would have used words broad enough to cover it and leave no room for dispute. The words "all crops cultivated by us on the W. E. Fenner land" do not necessarily mean

"all crops cultivated by us or either of us." The natural and ordinary meaning and significance of those words would limit the crop conveyed to that crop cultivated by the two defendants jointly. It is not likely that J. H. Fenner intended to mortgage his individual crop for fertilizers which Twisdale himself had contracted to furnish. But to leave the question almost free from doubt, the plain terms of the mortgage provide for a sale of the crop in default of payment of the debt, and plainly provide that after the debt is paid the mortgagee shall "pay any surplus to us"; that is, to Fenner and Twisdale jointly. It is not likely that J. H. Fenner intended to share the surplus from his own individual crop with one who had no interest whatever in it. Yet that is the legal and proper disposition of any surplus from the joint crop remaining after the debt is discharged. Neither the diligence of counsel nor our own researches have been able to find any very apposite authority in our own Reports. The nearest approach to a pertinent case is Tallaferro v. Sater, 113 N. C. 76, 18 S. E. 94, wherein it is substantially held that "lumber to be sawed by one does not include lumber sawed by that person and another."

We have considered with care the well-prepared brief of counsel for plaintiff, as well as the able and oral argument of Mr. Dunn, but we are unable to conclude that the mortgage conveys more than the joint crop of Twisdale and Fenner.

Let the cause be remanded to the superior court of Halifax county, with direction to render a judgment upon the facts agreed in accordance with this opinion. Reversed.

JONES et al. v. WOOTEN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1905.)

EXECUTORS—ACTION FOR ACCOUNTING—PLEA IN BAR—SUFFICIENCY—REFERENCE—APPEAL.

1. On the death of an executor and the appointment of an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, such administrator is the proper person to call on the administrator of the deceased executor to account for any funds remaining in the hands of the deceased executor belonging to the estate of the testator.

2. Where an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed was sued by alleged legatees of the testator, who averred that the testator's original executor had died without having fully administered the testator's estate, that plaintiffs had requested the defendant to require the administrator of the deceased executor to account, and that he had refused, a plea by the defendant that a full and complete accounting and settlement to and with each other for and on account of any money, goods, and chattels belonging to the estate of the testator which went into or should have gone into the hands of his original executor had been had between himself and the administrator of the deceased executor, and that in such settlement the correct balance was ascertained and payment made, constitutes a good plea in bar of the action, and hence it was error to order a reference before disposition was made of the plea.

3. An order of reference made before disposition of a plea in bar of an action is one from which an appeal can be immediately taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Greene County; Council, Judge.

Action by Alice Jones and others, by their next friend, George Heath, against John L. Wooten, administrator d. b. n. of Travis E. Hooker, deceased, and others. From an order of reference, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jarvis & Blow, for appellant. Geo. M. Lindsay and Moore & Fleming, for appellees.

HOKE, J. It appears from the pleadings that John H. Freeman, having made his will, died in the county of Greene in December, 1885; that Travis E. Hooker qualified as his executor on December 31st of the same year, and proceeded to administer on said estate; that Travis E. Hooker died in March, 1887, about 14 months after his qualification as executor, and without having fully administered the estate. After the death of Hooker, John Sugg was appointed and qualified as administrator d. b. n. with the will annexed of John H. Freeman. J. Q. Jackson was appointed and qualified as administrator of Travis E. Hooker, and in due time settled his estate, filed his final account and was discharged, and has since died. Before the present action was begun, the defendant John T. Sugg was appointed as second administrator d. b. n. of said John Freeman, and the defendant Wooten was appointed administrator d. b. n. of said Travis Hooker. The plaintiffs are special legatees under the will of John H. Freeman, whose legacies are made a primary charge on his personal estate and a secondary charge on his real estate, and bring this suit against J. T. Sugg, administrator d. b. n. of John H. Freeman, and John L. Wooten, administrator d. b. n. of Travis E. Hooker, and others, alleging (1) that their legacies have never been paid; (2) that Travis E. Hooker, as executor of John H. Freeman, had received large sums of money for which he had never accounted; and (3) that John Sugg, former administrator d. b. n. of John H. Freeman, had negligently and wrongfully failed to call him to account; that such accounting was necessary to the recovery of their legacies; and that before bringing this suit they had demanded of the defendant John T. Sugg, the present administrator d. b. n. of John H. Freeman, that he bring suit against the defendant Wooten to recover from him the amount due from Travis E. Hooker's estate to the estate of John H. Freeman, and that he had refused to comply with such demand. The defendant answered, denying the principal allegations of the complaint, and John L. Wooten specially answered that there had been a full, true, and complete accounting between his predecessor in office, J. Q. Jackson (former administrator of Travis E. Hooker), and John Sugg, who was then administrator d. b. n. of John H. Freeman; that a balance had been struck finding a small amount due from the estate of Freeman, which said amount had been paid, and all claims against the estate of Travis E. Hooker settled and adjusted. The form of this plea is set out in section 36 of the defendant's answer, as shown in the record at pp. 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 37. The court, on motion of plaintiff's counsel and on the pleadings, ordered a reference to take and state an account, "as against John L. Wooten, administrator of Travis E. Hooker, former executor of John H. Freeman, as to the personal estate of John H. Freeman, and the dealings of said Travis E. Hooker as executor of John H. Freeman." The defendant John L. Wooten, administrator of Travis E. Hooker, excepted and appealed.

The administrator d. b. n. of John H. Freeman's estate is the proper person to call the administrator of Travis E. Hooker to account. Ham v. Kornegay, 85 N. C. 119; Gilliam v. Walker, 104 N. C. 180, 10 S. E. 183. And if John Sugg, who was formerly administrator d. b. n. of John H. Freeman, while he held that office, had a full accounting and settlement with J. Q. Jackson, administrator of Travis E. Hooker, as set out in the answer, it is a good plea in bar, and would protect the estate of Travis E. Hooker from any further accounting, unless the same should be successfully impeached for fraud or specified error. In 1 Enc. of Pleading & Practice, p. 100, it is said: "A plea of account stated is a good bar to a bill for account, for there is no rule more strictly adhered to in courts of equity than that, when a defendant sets forth a stated account, he shall not be obliged to go into a general one." Costin v. Baxter, 41 N. C. 197; Suttle v. Doggett, 87 N. C. 203. In this last case, Ruffin, J., says that "the well-established principle of a court of equity is that an account once settled is conclusive unless assailed for fraud or mistake, and, in order thus to assail it, the complaint must not simply insinuate fraud, but aver the particulars with such definite certainty that issues may be raised in regard to them." The plaintiff has done this in his reply, and the cause is properly at issue. As a matter of pleading, however, there is in the answer a good plea in bar of any further accounting. Grant v. Hughes, 94 N. C. 231, the authority most relied upon by the plaintiff, does not conflict with this position. In that case there had been an ex parte settlement by the administrator with the clerk, and the court said, concerning the answer, that the allegations thereof in reference to such settlement were "vague, indefinite, questionable, and unsatisfactory," and an order of reference was therefore approved. But there are no such defects in the plea here set out. These administrators at the time of this alleged settlement held adversary positions, and were the persons whose duty it was to adjust the matter. The allegation is that they had "a full and complete accounting and settlement to and with each other for and on account of all moneys, goods, and chattels belonging to the estate of said Freeman which went into or should have gone into the hands of Travis E. Hooker, executor of John H. Freeman, and that in such settlement the correct balance was ascertained and payment made." The accounts are further set out in full in the way of exhibits, showing an ascertained balance, and the allegation made that such accounting was full, true, and complete, the balance ascertained and agreed upon as correct, and payment thereof made.

Whether the defendant can make his plea good by proof is another question, but in the pleadings it is a good plea in bar. This being true, it was error to order a reference until such plea was disposed of. Royster v. Wright, 118 N. C. 152, 24 S. E. 746.

This decision is also an authority for the position that the order in question is one from which an appeal can be immediately taken. The practice in this respect is further declared in Kerr v. Hicks, 131 N. C. 90, 42 S. E. 532, and Shankle v. Whitley, 131 N. C. 168, 42 S. E. 574. It is decided in these cases that, where a plea in bar is overruled or sustained as a matter of law by the judge, it is optional with the party to take an appeal at once, or preserve his right by having an exception noted. Where, however, the issues are tried by a jury, and the right to an account is established by a verdict, and an order of reference made, it is proper to proceed with the reference, and an appeal can only be taken from a final judgment after report.

Let this be certified, to the end that the order of reference be stricken out and the cause proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

Error.

STATE v. SCHENCK et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1904.)

BAIL BOND—FORFEITURE—LIABILITY OF SURETIES—STATUTE.

Defendant in a criminal prosecution was tried before a justice of the peace, and required to give bail for his appearance at the next term of court to answer the state on the charges against him, and "not to depart the same without leave first had and obtained." He appeared, was tried and convicted, and the court adjudged that he pay a fine and costs. He thereupon excepted and appealed, and was ordered to give an undertaking for costs of the appeal, and an undertaking to stay the execution on the judgment, and one for his appearance at the next term of court, but failed to give any of the undertakings, or to pay the fine and costs, and, having been called before the expiration of the term of court and failing to answer a judgment nisi was entered against him and his sureties for the penalty of the bail bond. A scire facias having been issued on the judgment and served, the judgment was made absolute. Held, on a motion by the sureties to set aside the judgment, that the defendant's appearance, his conviction, and sentence did not exonerate the sureties from liability on the bond, in view of Code, § 1230, providing that the sureties can surrender their principal to the court, or to any lawful officer appointed to receive him, at any time before execution against them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Council, Judge.

William Schenck was convicted of unlawfully selling liquor, and, from an order overruling a motion to set aside a judgment forfeiting his bail bond, his sureties appeal.

The defendant Schenck was tried before, a justice of the peace for unlawfully selling liquor, a misdemeanor by statute. He was required to give bail for his appearance at the next term of the court held in October, 1903, and the appellants, Williams and Howard, became sureties on his bond, which was conditioned for Schenck's appearance at the said term of court "to answer the state on a charge of selling liquor on Sunday, and selling liquor without license, and not to depart the same without leave first had and obtained." Schenck appeared, was tried, and convicted. The court adjudged that he pay a fine of $100 and the costs. He thereupon excepted and appealed, and was required to give an undertaking in the sum of $35 for the costs of appeal, an undertaking in the sum of $150 to stay the execution of the judgment, and one in the sum of $100 for his appearance at the next term of the court. He failed to give any of these undertakings or to pay the fine and costs, and, having been called and failed, a judgment nisi was entered against him and his sureties for $100, the penalty of his bond. A scire facias issued on this judgment and was duly served, and at April term, 1904, the judgment was made absolute. The appellants moved to set aside the judgment; the motion was overruled, and they appealed.

R. A. Nunn, for appellants. The Attorney General, for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). The ground upon which appellants seek to vacate the judgment is that, when Schenck appeared and was convicted and sentenced, the condition of the bond was fully performed, and the appellants, his sureties, were exonerated, as, by reason of the conviction, they lost control of him, and thereafter, he was in the custody of the law. We cannot think this the true construction of the bond, and it is certainly contrary to the uniform practice of the courts in this state in such cases. At common law, when bail was given and the principal relieved from the custody of the law, he was regarded, not as freed entirely, but as transferred to the friendly custody of his bail. They had a dominion over him, and it was their right at any time to arrest and surrender him again to the custody of the law, in discharge of their obligation. They were sometimes said to be his jailers, and to have him always upon the string, which they may pull when they please, in order to surrender him in their own discharge. Cain v. State, 55 Ala. 170; 1 Chitty's Cr. Law, 104. If they would fully discharge their obligation as his bail, they should as effectually secure their principal's appearance and put him as much under the power of the court, as if he were in the custody of the proper officer, and they do not answer the end of the law unless this is done. The principle thus stated is of ancient origin, and has been recognized as controlling in determining the liability of bail. 1 Bacon, Abr. "Bail," L; State v. Stout, 11 N. J. Law, 124. The extent of their duty and obligation, therefore, is to see to it that the principal, at all times during the term of the court to which he is bound to appear, is present to answer the call of the court and to do what the law may require of him. If they fail in this respect, they have not kept him under the power of the court as if he had been in the custody of its proper officer. It must not be inferred that the surety is thereby required to do something not stipulated in his bond, for the obligation thus imposed is nothing more than what the law reasonably considers to be within the condition of his undertaking. It is said by the highest authority that a recognizance (or bail bond), in general, binds to three things: (1) To appear and answer either to a specified charge, or to such matters as may be objected; (2) to stand to and abide the judgment of the court; and (3) not to depart without leave of the court; and that each of these particulars are distinct and independent. This was said, too, with reference to a bail bond worded precisely like the one in this case. It was contended by counsel in that case, which we will presently cite, that the stipulation not to depart the court without leave was an unusual one and of no binding force whatever, and, in answering this contention, the court said: "That a stipulation of this kind was valid and obligatory at common law is not to be doubted. It was so declared more than 30 years ago by this court after full consideration." State v. Hancock, 54 N. J. Law, 393, 24 Atl. 726. That was a well-considered case, and seems to be a conclusive authority against the appellant upon the main question presented in the record. See, also, State v. Stout, supra. The doctrine has been thus stated and illustrated: "A recognizance binds the principal not only to appear, but to abide the judgment of the court, and not depart thence without its leave, and, if the principal be ordered to execute a new bond, either to keep the peace for a specified period or for his appearance at a subsequent term or before another court, and he depart without complying with the order, it is a breach of the recognizance." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 715; State v. Thompson, 62 Ind. 367. This construction of a recognizance or bail bond is sustained by analogy in State v. Smith, 66 N. C. 620. In that case the defendant gave a bond with a surety for his appearance at the next term of the court. His case was continued, and he was ordered to give bond for his appearance at a subsequent term, which he failed to do, but departed without leave of the court. He was called, and, having failed to answer, his forfeiture was duly entered. In answer to the scire facias issued, the surety insisted that the defendant could not be called and a forfeiture entered after the continuance of the case. This court held that under the recognizance he could not depart without leave of the court, though not so expressly stated therein, and that he was required to answer at any time during the term when called, "it being the universal practice near the close of the court to look over the docket and call such defendants as have departed without leave of the court." And this, we now say, is a most reasonable practice. State v. Morgan, 136 N. C. 593, 45 S. E. 604. It works no harm to the sureties, nor does it increase the risk they assume, nor in any way add to their obligation. It is fairly within the scope of their undertaking, as they have expressly agreed that their principal shall not depart without leave, and it appears to us that there is no valid reason for holding otherwise. The sureties can surrender their principal to the court or to any lawful officer appointed to receive him, and this can be done, it is said in the statute, at any time before execution against them. Code, § 1230; State v. Lingerfelt, 109 N. C. 775, 14 S. E. 75, 14 L. R. A. 605. The conviction does not, by virtue of its own force, put the defendant in the custody of the court or of the sheriff. This is done, in our practice at least, by an order from the court, given of its own motion or on application of the solicitor; and the court, when it passes judgment upon a defendant and he appeals, can direct that he be not taken into custody immediately, but be permitted to find security for the costs of his appeal and for his appearance at the next term, and, if he fails afterwards to appear, when called during the term, and perfect his appeal and give the necessary security for his appearance, or in default thereof to surrender himself in execution of the judgment, he may be called and his forfeiture entered. Judge Story says for the court, in Ex parte Milburn, 9 Pet. 704, 9 L. Ed. 280: "A recognizance of bail in a criminal case is taken to secure the attendance of the party accused to answer the indictment, and to submit to a trial and the judgment of the court thereon. It is not designed as a satisfaction for the offense, when it is forfeited and paid, but as a means of compelling the party to submit to the trial and punishment which the law ordains for his offense." In People v. Stager, 10 Wend. 431, we find an instructive discussion of the matter by Savage, C. J., the substance of which, being briefly stated, is that a person bound by a recognizance is not at liberty to depart after once making his appearance in court, but he must remain until discharged, and not quit the court without leave at any stage of the trial; the object being not only to cause the accused to appear and answer the charge, but to submit to such punishment, if any, as shall be adjudged.

But there is another sufficient reason why the appellants should be held bound by the recognizance or bail bond, and to be now liable for the penalty thereof. All the proceedings of the court are in fieri until the expiration of the term, and during the term the record remains completely under the control of the court. It may strike out its judgment and enter a different one. In other words, the court has the whole term during which to consider its action and modify or reverse it. The principle is supported by abundant authority. Penny v. Smith, 61 N. C. 36; Halyburton v. Carson, 80 N. C. 16; Turrentine v. Railroad, 92 N. C. 642. This being so, why could the court not strike out the verdict and judgment and award a new trial, and then continue the cause to the next term, in which case the sureties would remain liable (State v. Smith, supra)? And, if it could do this, why did it not also have the power to direct that the defendant should not be taken into custody until it could come to a final determination in the matter, or, as in this case, suspend execution of the judgment for a proper reason? The conviction and sentence were not final and irrevocable until the end of the term, which was after the default of the defendant and the entry of the forfeiture. If the court could set aside the judgment, it could, a fortiori, postpone its enforcement.

We conclude that the recognizance binds the sureties for the continued appearance of their principal from day to day, during the term and at all stages of the proceeding, until he is finally discharged by the court, either for the term or without day. He must answer its calls at all times, and submit to its judgment. In no other way can the criminal law of the state be well administered.

No error.

GASKINS et al. v. ALLEN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1905.)

EJECTMENT—DEEDS—ALTERATION—EVIDENCE—DEGREE—HUSBAND AND WIFE—PROBATE—PRIVATE EXAMINATION—RATIFICATION OF VOIDABLE DEED—LAPSE OF TIME—LIMITATIONS.

1. Plaintiff, claiming an alteration in the date of probate of a deed of land, was only bound to establish it by a preponderance of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Alteration of Instruments, § 259.]

2. A commission by a probate judge to a justice of the peace to take the probate and privy examination to a deed of a married woman was issued August 19, 1871. The blank form for such probate was on the same paper as the commission, which referred to a deed executed in 1871, at which time the woman was a minor. The certificate of the justice referred to "the foregoing deed." Two deeds were found pinned to the paper—the deed of 1871, and another, dated 1872, after the woman had attained majority. Held, that the probate must refer to the deed of 1871, and the deed of 1872 was invalid for want of probate.

3. A deed by a married woman, not properly executed, and with no probate, or privy examination taken, was no ratification of a prior deed executed by her while a minor.

4. A deed executed by a married woman while a minor was not ratified by lapse of time with no disaffirmance for more than 20 years.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Infants, § 45.]

5. A married woman, who was a minor, executed a deed in 1871, which she disaffirmed by a deed executed in 1894 to her daughter, who was married, and an infant until 1898. Held, that an action in 1904, by the daughter, to recover the land, was not barred by Acts 1899, p. 209, c. 78, as the second section of said act provides "that in all actions commenced after the ratification of this act by married women heretofore protected by subsection 4 of sections 148 and 163 of the Code, in which the defense of adverse possession shall be relied upon, the time completed as constituting such adverse possession shall not include any possession had against such married woman prior to the passage of this act."

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Council, Judge.

Action by Zenia A. Gaskins and another against Victoria Allen. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following issue was submitted to the jury: "Is the plaintiff Zenia Gaskins the owner in fee and entitled to the immediate possession of the land described in the complaint? Ans. Yes." From the judgment rendered, the defendant appealed.

D. L. Ward, for appellant. Simmons & Ward, for appellee.

BROWN, J. Mary F. Swindell was seised in fee of the land in controversy. She and her husband, David, executed a deed to W. H. Rawls in 1871, at which time she was married and a minor. On June 22, 1872, the day after she became of age, Mary F. Swindell and her husband signed another deed for the same land to W. H. Rawls. This deed was pinned to the first, and both recorded under one probate taken by J. S. Fowler, justice of the peace. The defendant claims by mesne conveyances under Rawls. On October 10, 1894, Mary F. Swindell and her husband executed a deed to the plaintiff Zenia, their daughter, for the land. She was then 17 years of age. This action was commenced on April 8, 1902. "Hard cases are the quicksands of the law." We remembered this adage in considering this appeal, and gave it a minute and careful investigation. It is with natural reluctance we feel impelled to affirm a judgment which deprives the defendant of land in the possession of which she and those under whom she claims have been so long. But "such is the law."

1. As to the probate of the deed of June 22, 1872: We can find no evidence that it was ever probated, or any privy examination taken. The commission issued by West, Probate Judge, is dated August 19, 1871. It refers in specific terms to the deed of 1871, when Mary F. Swindell was under age. The probate of the justice of the peace, Fowler, is at the bottom of this commission, and admitted to be a blank form, all on one paper, and filled out by the probate judge and the justice of the peace. This probate is dated June 22, 1872, in the record sent here, and, if actually taken then, would have been a confirmation of the act of the infant grantor after arriving at full age. His honor charged the jury that: "The plaintiffs claim that the date of this probate has been altered; that one date has been erased, and another substituted. If the plaintiffs have satisfied you by the preponderance of the evidence that this is so, and, further, that she neither executed nor acknowledged the deed after she was 21 years of age, you should answer the first issue 'Yes.'" The jury answered the issue "Yes." We approve this instruction in general, and more particularly as to the degree of proof required to establish the alteration in the date of the probate. Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 9 S. E. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, and cases cited; Perry v. Insurance Co. (at this term) 49 S. E. 889. The finding of the jury under such instruction destroys the value of that probate as a confirmation by Mrs. Swindell of her deed made when a minor. The probate could not possibly refer to the deed of June 22, 1872. In 1871-72 justices of the peace had no original jurisdiction to take acknowledgments of deeds, or to take the privy examinations of married women. The probate judge, who was also clerk of the superior court, took the acknowledgment of the husband, and when the wife was not present to take her privy examination himself he issued a commission to some convenient justice of the peace to take it. The blank forms of the justice to fill up were printed on the same paper with the commission, as was admitted in this case. The commission described the deed, and named the grantor and grantee, as this commission does, and empowered the justice to take the privy examination of the wife. This commission is dated August 19, 1871. Under it the justice had no authority to take the probate and privy examination to the deed of June 22, 1872, or to any other deed except the one named in the commission. The two deeds were pinned together with this one commission and certificate of probate. The commission issued by West and the certificate of probate signed by Fowler evidently belonged to the deed of 1871. The certificate of the justice is on the same paper as the commission, and refers to the "foregoing deed of conveyance," viz., the deed described in the commission. There is no other reference to any deed in it. The deed of June 22, 1872, was not probated, and its registration was void.

2. Did Mary F. Swindell ratify and confirm her deed of 1871 after she became of full age? We see no evidence of ratification or confirmation. She was married when the deed was made, and her husband was living at the time of the trial. The deed of June 22, 1872, is no ratification, because, as we have shown, it was never properly executed, and no probate or privy examination taken. Lapse of time is not a confirmation in this case. "The presumption of ratification of a voidable deed by long acquiescence will not arise against a woman under disability of coverture." Epps v. Flowers, 101 N. C. 158, 7 S. E. 680. So far as Mrs. Swindell is concerned, this matter seems to have been "quiescent," and "in statu quo" from the attempt to make a deed on June 22, 1872, until October 10, 1894, when she made the deed to her daughter Zenia, her coplaintiff, and who is the real plaintiff in this action. The deed of October, 1894, was an absolute disaffirmance, and the only disaffirmance, so far as this record discloses, by Mrs. Swindell of her act and deed of 1871, made when a minor. "A deed of bargain and sale made by an infant is avoided by his executing, upon his arrival at full age, another deed of the same kind, and for the same land, to a different person." Ruffin, C. J., in Hoyle v. Stowe, 19 N. C. 320. There is no conflict with Weeks v. Wilkins, 134 N. C. 516, 47 S. E. 24. Three years after majority is a reasonable time within which an infant must disaffirm a deed. Where the infant is under the disability of coverture, the three years begin to run when the disability is removed. Mrs. Swindell was under disability of coverture in 1871, when a minor, and it continued up to the time of the trial in the court below.

3. Does the act of February 13, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 209, c. 78) bar a recovery in this action by plaintiff Zenia Gaskins? We think not. As we have shown, Mrs. Swindell disaffirmed in 1894, before the act of 1899. Zenia Gaskins was 17 years of age when the deed to her was executed, and was married, and an infant, both, until October, 1898. The first section of the act eliminates married women from those saved from the operation of the statutes of limitation mentioned in the act. But for the second section, a married woman might, under proper facts, be barred at the end of three years from the ratification of the act. This section enacts "that in all actions commenced after the ratification of this act by married women heretofore protected by subsection 4 of sections 148 and 163 of the Code, in which the defense of adverse possession shall be relied upon, the time completed as constituting such adverse possession shall not include any possession had against such married woman prior to the passage of this act." It is clear to us that there is nothing in the act of 1899, or any statute of limitation, which bars a recovery in this action by the plaintiff Zenia Gaskins.

The three questions we have briefly discussed are the only ones presented in the record of much importance. The other exceptions are without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

TAYLOR v. PARKER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1905.)

USURY—RECOVERY OF INTEREST PAID—LIMITATIONS—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

1. Under Code, § 3836, providing that, when more than 6 per cent. interest has been paid, the debtor may recover twice the amount of interest paid if the action be commenced within two years after the usurious transaction, the defense that the action was not brought in two years is available, though not pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 678; vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Usury, § 298.]

2. Where within two years before the action a usurious payment is made, and afterward a payment of legal interest, only twice the amount of the usurious payment, and not twice the entire interest, can be recovered, but both usury and legal interest may be recovered when paid together, and not merely twice the usurious part of the payment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Usury, § 424.]

3. Whether the payment of usury was suggested by the creditor or debtor is immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Hoke, Judge.

Action by Lee Taylor against C. W. Parker. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than his demand, he appeals. Reversed.

Geo. Cowper and Pruden & Pruden, for appellant. Winborne & Lawrence, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff was indebted by bond in the sum of $580. In January, 1895, the defendant, at the plaintiff's request, purchased the bond from the obligee therein, upon the plaintiff's payment to defendant of all interest then accrued and a bonus of about $35 for further extension. In January, 1896, the legal interest then due was paid. On 20th March, 1899, the defendant again extended the debt upon payment of the sum of $156.04, which included $50 usury, the interest due to that date at 6 per cent. being $106.04. On 4th February, 1901, the defendant again extended payment upon receipt of $63, being the amount of interest then due. This is an action to recover back double the above sums under Code, § 3836, which provides that, when a greater interest than 6 per cent. has been paid, the debtor or his legal representative "may recover back, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of interest paid, provided such action shall be commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred." The payment of usury in 1895 was beyond the two years prior to the beginning of this action, which was instituted on 4th March, 1901, and need not be considered. It would be otherwise under chapter 69, p. 75, Laws 1895, but that statute, by its terms, does not apply to this case, as the bond was executed before its passage. The two-years statute was pleaded, and, even if it had not been pleaded, the defendant was entitled to its protection. Roberts v. Ins. Co., 118 N. C. 435, 24 S. E. 780; Carter v. Insurance Co., 122 N. C. 339, 30 S. E. 341. The payment of $63 was within two years, but was not a "usurious transaction," only the legal interest then due being paid. This case differs from Roberts v. Insurance Co., supra, where the court gave judgment for double the entire interest paid in two years before suit, in that here there was no usury after the payment of 20th March, 1899. The payment of $156.04 on 20th March, 1899, was a usurious transaction, for the legal interest then due was only $106.04, and it occurred within two years before this action was brought. Under the clear terms of the statute the plaintiff is entitled to recover back double the entire interest paid at that time—i. e., $312.08—not merely double the usurious excess. Smith v. B. & L. Ass'n, 119 N. C. 255, 26 S. E. 41; Laws 1895, p. 75, c. 69; Cheek v. B. & L. Ass'n, 127 N. C. 121, 37 S. E. 150. The evidence is conflicting whether the debtor solicited the extension of time upon his own suggestion of a bonus, or whether the creditor suggested the usury. Besides, it is immaterial. Faison v. Grandy, 126 N. C. 830, 36 S. E. 276. The payment of more than legal interest was in either case caused by the debtor's necessity, and the lawmaking power has forbidden it under a penalty deemed by it heavy enough to discourage such transactions by making them unprofitable. The terms of the statute are identical with those used in the United States Revised Statutes, § 5198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], in reference to usury by national banks, to which the federal courts give the same construction placed on our statute. Usury laws have prevailed among all nations, whether "Greek or Barbarian." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 453. At common law the taking of any interest was punishable. 16 A. & E. Enc. (2d Ed.) 991. Among the Hebrews it was forbidden as to their brethren, but was not forbidden as to Gentiles. Deuteronomy, xxiii, 19, 20. A very interesting discussion of the origin and history of usury legislation will be found in Dunham v. Gould, 16 Johns. 367, by Chancellor Kent (8 Am. Dec. 323). In New York the charging interest in excess of 6 per cent. in certain cases is still an indictable offense under a recent statute. The whole subject of usury is a matter of public policy, resting in legislative discretion, and the courts have no concern save to execute the law as it is written. The charge of the court that the plaintiff could recover only $100—i. e., double the excess of interest paid 20th March, 1899—was contrary to the statute, which authorized the recovery of double the entire interest paid at the time of the usurious transaction, and was error.

HOKE, J., took no part in decision of this case.

GOODMAN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 27, 1905.)

HOMICIDE—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—MISTRIAL.

1. The evidence authorized a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter, and the exception taken to the instruction given in reference to that offense was not meritorious.

2. It was not error to admit in evidence, as res gestæ, the declaration of the deceased, "Oh Lord! my poor wife and children!" made as he fell from the fatal wound. Even if of doubtful admissibility, it was properly permitted to go to the jury, in order that they might consider what light, if any, it threw upon the condition of the mind or motives of the deceased at the time he was shot. (Simmons, C. J., dissenting.)

3. Nor was it error to refuse to grant a mistrial on account of the improper remark of the solicitor general in his argument to the jury; he having expressly withdrawn it, and the court having instructed the jury not to consider it.

4. The charge that if the accused was the aggressor, and the deceased drew his club only for the purpose of resisting further aggressions, this would not be sufficient provocation for the homicide, was pertinent. Furthermore, such charge was given while the court was instructing the jury as to the law of murder. The verdict being for voluntary manslaughter, the charge was not harmful to the accused, even if not authorized by the evidence or his statement.

5. If a party have knowledge of a fact, and the same can be proved at the trial by evidence, a new trial will not be granted on the ground that other evidence of the fact, claimed to be newly discovered, has been found since the trial, unless the movant satisfactorily explains why he did not use the evidence in his control at the time of the trial.

6. The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Oatham County; Geo. T. Cann, Judge.

W. C. Goodman was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. C. Goodman was indicted at the October term, 1904, of Chatham superior court, for the murder of E. O. Zipperer. On the trial the state introduced only one witness, C. M. Malphus, whose testimony was, in brief, as follows: On September 29, 1904, Goodman, Zipperer, and witness were all policemen in the city of Savannah, and were all on duty and in uniform on that day.

Goodman and Zipperer, while standing at the doorway of the Union Depot in Savannah on that day, engaged in a conversation about two negroes, one a boarding-house keeper, and the other a drummer for a saloon, who met trains at the station. The conversation at first was apparently friendly; Zipperer asserting that the negroes were causing considerable trouble to the public, and also to the policemen on duty at the station, while Goodman expressed the opinion that they were doing no harm. "Zipperer said he would run them in or drive them away whenever they came there when he was on duty. Goodman said that he would not unless they were obstructing the sidewalk—if they blocked that walk he would run them off; * * * and, in the course of the conversation, Goodman said to Zipperer, 'You got no sense. If you had sense you would not act that way.' Zipperer said, 'I have as much sense as you have.' He [Goodman] said, 'No; you have not half as much.' Zipperer said, 'Yes; I have as much sense as you;' and Goodman said, 'You have not such a damn thing.'" Witness, seeing they were getting out of humor, stepped between them, and told them to stop that nonsense, and not make fools of themselves. Just as witness stepped between them, each "caught the other by the collar. Each man had his hand on the other man." Witness was then near enough to shake hands with both of them. Witness could not say which took hold of the other first. They had each other by the coat at the same time. Neither of them had a weapon in sight at that time. About the time they took hold of each other and witness stepped between them, Zipperer said, "Take your hand off me." Both of them had their coats buttoned up, and, as witness stepped between them, each loosened the bottom of his coat and stepped back two steps, so as to make the distance between them 8 or 10 feet. Zipperer pulled his club from his left hip pocket, and had it in his left hand. Goodman pulled his pistol from his holster, and, "as quick as he pulled it out," shot Zipperer. They were still about 8 or 10 feet from each other. After the shot, witness grabbed the pistol, and, after something like a half minute, succeeded in taking it away from Goodman. When the pistol fired, Zipperer dropped to his knees and said, "Oh! my wife and children!" or, "My poor wife and children!" He said this about a second after the pistol fired. When the pistol fired, Zipperer had nothing in his right hand. When he fell from his knees on his back, after he was shot, witness saw a part of the barrel of his pistol exposed in his right hip pocket, the barrel pointing upwards. Zipperer made no effort to draw his pistol. Goodman and Zipperer both had on sack coats, which were long enough to conceal a pistol or club in the hip pocket. They both began to unbutton their coats about the same time. Witness could not say which began first. Zipperer drew his club about the same time Goodman drew his pistol. Witness could not say which was drawn first—the club or the pistol. Zipperer had the club in his left hand a few seconds before he was shot. "It was all done as quick as a wink." Policemen in Savannah are required to carry loaded pistols. The shot fired by Goodman killed Zipperer.

The accused introduced no testimony, but made the following statement: "On the 29th of September I was standing in the driveway at the Union Station, talking to Officers Zipperer, Malphus, and Sergeant Davis. We were talking there about negro drummers around the depot. Officer Zipperer said that he would arrest them every chance that he got. I told him that there was no use to do that, that a man could handle them without arresting them, and that I would not arrest them unless they were obstructing the sidewalk. He said that he would. I said, 'Any man can handle a crowd of negroes without arresting them.' He said he could not, and I said, 'You can if you have any sense.' He said, 'You are a God damn fool.' So then I threw my left hand on his breast, and he threw his right hand to my breast and reached with his left hand for his club. Mr. Malphus stepped between and pushed us back, and said, 'Don't have a fuss;' and, as Zipperer stepped back, he threw his hand to his right hip pocket that way [indicating], and tried to pull his gun. It seems that he made a second attempt. As I seen Malphus between he and I, I tried to strike him on the right shoulder, to try to disable him from using his gun. I thought he was going to shoot me, is the reason I shot him. Mr. Malphus asked me to give him my pistol I still held, and I called Malphus' attention: 'Don't you see that man trying to shoot me?' He then took the pistol sticking out of Officer Zipperer's hip pocket, about that position [indicating]. It seemed that when he pulled at it the hammer caught, and he couldn't get it out of his pocket, and, as he lay, his hand dropped away from the pistol." Malphus testified in rebuttal: "I didn't hear Mr. Zipperer use the expression, 'You are a God damn fool.' He didn't use it."

The first two grounds of the motion for new trial were that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. The other grounds were as follows:

"(3) The court erred in charging the jury concerning voluntary manslaughter.

"(4) Because the court erred in admitting, against the objection of defendant, then and there made, that the evidence was irrelevant and would illustrate no issue in the case, testimony from the witness Malphus that, immediately after the deceased had been shot and had fallen, the only words that he uttered were, 'Oh, Lord! my poor wife and children!'

"(5) Because the court erred, against the objections of defendant's counsel, in permitting the solicitor general, in his argument to the jury, to comment upon this language as he did do more than once.

"(6) Because the court erred in not declaring a mistrial, when thereto requested by the defendant's attorneys, because of the statement made by the solicitor general to the jury to the effect that the deceased had left four fatherless children. This motion for a mistrial was made after the solicitor general had for the fourth time mentioned this as a fact, and as a part of an earnest appeal to the jury. Up to this time nothing had been said as to this statement by the court or the defendant's attorneys. When the motion for a mistrial was made, the solicitor general said he would withdraw the remark, and the court instructed the jury not to consider what had been said about four fatherless children. The court overruled the motion without further comment. There was no further allusion to the matter by the court.

"(7) Because of the prejudicial statement by the solicitor general, set forth in the sixth ground, in his argument to the jury, several times made, to the effect that the deceased had left four fatherless children; there being no evidence as to this, and such a statement being calculated to injure the defendant.

"(8) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If you believe from the evidence that the defendant was the aggressor, and that he had causelessly laid hands on the deceased, and if you believe that after this the deceased drew his club, and if you believe that this was an act of preparation on the part of the deceased only to resist further aggression, in that event the act of preparation only, if such you find it to be, cannot be alleged by the accused as a sufficient provocation for the homicide,' said charge being unauthorized by the evidence. The court, after this charge, added: 'It may, however, be considered by you, along with the other facts and circumstances of the case, in determining whether the defendant acted under the fears of a reasonable man in what you may find he did.'

"(9) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'It should be voluntary manslaughter if you are satisfied that the facts and circumstances surrounding the accused were such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that some bodily harm, less than a felony, was imminent and impending. It would be murder if the circumstances were not such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that he was in any serious danger at all.' The said charge being illegal, and not authorized by the evidence or the theory of either the prosecution or the defense during the argument; the defense contending that the circumstances were such as to justify the fears of a reasonable man that his life was in danger, and the state that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged.

"(10) Because of the new evidence disclosed in the affidavits of Samuel Russell, Samuel Thomas, Henry Jenkins, Albert L. Jones, C. C. McEvoy, and J. H. Herring, here to the court shown."

Robt. L. Colding and Adams & Adams, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Osborne, Sol. Gen., for the State.

FISH, P. J. 1. The law of voluntary manslaughter was clearly applicable to some phases of the case. There was evidence from which the jury could find that there was a sudden altercation between the accused and the deceased, during which each caught the other by the collar, it not appearing who caught the other first; that, when separated, both began at once to unbutton their coats for the purpose of drawing weapons; that both drew weapons about the same time (the accused, a pistol, and the deceased, a policeman's club); that the accused shot the deceased immediately after drawing the pistol; that each had assaulted the other; that both were in a sudden heat of passion, and there was a mutual intention to fight on the spot. If such were the facts, it needs no argument or citation of authority to sustain the proposition that a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter was appropriate.

We are also of the opinion that, in view of the evidence and the statement of the accused, the charge complained of in the ninth ground of the motion for new trial was applicable. The portion of the charge excepted to was: "It should be voluntary manslaughter if you are satisfied that the facts and circumstances surrounding the accused were such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that some bodily harm, less than a felony, was imminent or impending." The accused shot just as the deceased had drawn a policeman's club from his pocket, and had it in his hand. What his purpose was in drawing it, and what he intended to do with it, or was in the act of doing with it, was for the jury to decide. It was also for them to judge of the character of the club as a weapon—whether deadly or not; and, if the deceased was about to assault the accused, the character of the assault—whether less than a felony or not. The jury, considering all the circumstances of the case, might have believed that the deceased, after the separation, still intended to fight, and when shot was in the act of making an assault, and that such assault was not felonious.

2. Did the court err in admitting in evidence what the deceased said as he fell after being shot, viz., "Oh, Lord! my poor wife and children"? The contention for the state is that the words were admissible as part of the res gestæ, and as tending to show the state of mind of the deceased at the time he was shot, and, as the accused claimed that the deceased was the aggressor, that he was actuated by malice toward the accused and intended to do him harm, that the exclamation of the deceased, made immediately after he was shot, and as he fell to his knees, and before a change of mind was likely to have resulted, indicated that he had no malice in his heart, but was actuated solely by motives of self-defense in what he was doing when he was shot. On the other hand, the contention for the accused is that the words did not tend to illustrate any issue in the case; that they shed no light on the frame of mind of the deceased; that a violent man might force an issue, show a murderous purpose, and when shot down might, under a revulsion which may come in the twinkling of an eye, refer in pathetic terms to his wife and children, but that such a reference could not aid the jury in arriving at the truth of the case; and that the words used by the deceased in the present case did not tend to show that when shot it was not his purpose to kill the accused. "Declarations accompanying an act, or so nearly connected therewith in time as to be free from all suspicion of device or afterthought, are admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ." Pen. Code 1895, § 998. "Res gestæ are the circumstances, acts, or declarations which grow out of the main fact, are contemporaneous with it, and serve to illustrate its character." "An indispensable characteristic of declarations is that they must be made at the time of the act done, which they are supposed to characterize; and, further, they must be calculated to unfold the nature and quality of the facts they are intended to explain, and so to harmonize with them as obviously to constitute one transaction." Carter v. Buchanan, 3 Ga. 513; Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615, 623. "Acts are pertinent if they are done pending the enterprise, and whilst it is in continuous progress to its catastrophe, and are of a nature to promote or obstruct, advance or retard, or to evince essential motive or purpose in reference to, it; and declarations are pertinent if they are uttered contemporaneously with pertinent acts, and serve to account for, qualify, or explain them, and are apparently natural and spontaneous." Cox v. State, 64 Ga. 374, 37 Am. Rep. 76 (7). There are many other decisions of this court to the same effect. In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 12 S. E. 18, it was said that the Code section above quoted introduces no new rule, and reference is approvingly made to the "luminous and able opinion of Judge Nisbet in Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615." "When an act is done, to which it is necessary to ascribe a motive, it is always considered that what is said at the time, from which the motive may be collected, is part of the res gestæ." Monroe v. State, 5 Ga. 85. We are not prepared to hold that the sayings or exclamations of the deceased, made immediately after he was shot, did not tend to show the state of his mind towards the accused immediately prior thereto, or that they were not calculated to illustrate the character of his acts just before he was shot. We therefore rule that the court did not err in admitting them. At most, we think it could only be said that their admissibility was doubtful, and it has long been the rule in this state, when its admissibility is doubtful, to admit it, and leave its weight and effect to be determined by the jury. Mitchell v. State, 71 Ga. 128; Augusta Factory v. Barnes, 72 Ga. 217, 53 Am. Rep. 838; Dalton v. Drake, 75 Ga. 115; Central R. Co. v. Smith, 78 Ga. 209, 2 Am. St. Rep. 81; Gilmer v. Atlanta, 77 Ga. 688; Thompson v. Thompson, 77 Ga. 700, 3 S. E. 261; Savannah R. Co. v. Flannagan, 82 Ga. 579, 9 S. E. 471, 14 Am. St. Rep. 183; Western R. Co. v. Young, 83 Ga. 512, 10 S. E. 197; Central R. Co. v. Bernstein, 113 Ga. 175, 38 S. E. 394.

If the evidence were properly admitted, then, of course, counsel for the state had the right to make legitimate comments on it in his argument to the jury. In the fifth ground of the motion for new trial, where complaint was made because the court allowed the solicitor general to comment on the evidence we have been considering, it does not appear but that his comments were entirely legitimate.

3. It was not error to refuse to grant a mistrial on the ground that the solicitor general, in arguing the case to the jury, stated that "the deceased had left four fatherless children." It is stated in the motion (sixth ground) that the "motion for a mistrial was made after the solicitor general had for the fourth time mentioned this as a fact, and as part of an earnest appeal to the jury." What the appeal was, does not appear from the motion. So we can only rule upon the question made; that is, whether the court erred in refusing to grant a mistrial because of the statement made by the solicitor general that "the deceased left four fatherless children." It appears from the motion for new trial that, when the motion for a mistrial was made, the solicitor general withdrew the objectionable remark, and that the court instructed the jury not to consider what had been said about four fatherless children. Whatever influence harmful to the accused the remark of the solicitor general was calculated to have on the minds of the jury was, we think, removed by the positive instruction by the court to the jury on the subject.

4. The exception to the charge set out in the eighth ground of the motion was not well taken. Considering both the evidence and the statement of the accused, there was room for the theory that the accused was the aggressor, and that the deceased, in drawing his club, was only intending to resist further aggressions. Granting, however, that there was nothing either in the evidence or the statement to authorize the charge, it would not be cause for a new trial, as the court instructed the jury that, if they believed such theory to be true, then the drawing of the club by the deceased would not be "a sufficient provocation for the homicide." The court was then dealing with the law of murder, and, as the verdict was for voluntary manslaughter, this instruction on the law of murder, if erroneous, could not have been harmful to the accused, and was not cause for a new trial.

5. The alleged newly discovered evidence was not cause for a new trial. It appears from the affidavit of counsel for the accused that three of the six witnesses who made affidavits as to the newly discovered evidence were present at the trial, and that counsel for the accused then knew what one of them would testify, and had heard that the testimony of the other two present would be favorable to the accused. It further appears that the other three witnesses, of whose testimony neither the accused nor his counsel had any intimation prior to the trial, would testify to substantially the same facts as the three witnesses present at the trial, and that the testimony of all six witnesses was practically the same. In Norman v. Goode, 121 Ga. 449, 49 S. E. 268, it was held: "A party is bound, at his peril, to submit on the trial all competent evidence in his favor he has at hand. If he had knowledge of the fact, and the same could have been proved at the trial by evidence other than that newly discovered, a new trial will not be granted, unless the movant can satisfactorily explain why he did not attempt to use the evidence then at hand." No satisfactory reason was given in the present case why the accused did not attempt to use the evidence of the three witnesses present at the trial. It is due to counsel who appeared for the accused before this court to say that he candidly stated in his argument that in his opinion the alleged newly discovered evidence was not of itself sufficient cause for the grant of a new trial.

6. The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SIMMONS, C. J. I concur in the judgment, but dissent from the view expressed in the second headnote.

ACTION BY VENDOR—MISTAKE—RESCISSION.

1. A contract for the sale of a tract of land, or a deed conveying a tract of land, specifying the quantity by the words "containing _____ acres" (giving the number), and reciting a price which is an exact multiple of the number of acres so mentioned, is presumed to be a contract of sale of the tract in gross, but is ambiguous on its face as to whether it is a contract of sale in gross or of sale by the acre; and parol evidence of the circumstances which surrounded the parties, and their situation, when the contract or deed was made, and the conduct of the parties in carrying the contract into execution, is admissible as an aid in interpreting such contract or deed.

2. Whether a deed reciting $4,800 as the price of a tract of land thereby conveyed, and describing it by metes and bounds, and as "containing 200 acres and 37 square poles," is ambiguous on its face as to whether the sale was in gross or by the acre, quære?

3. A case in which the admissible parol evidence is held insufficient to prove that a contract of sale of land was by the acre; the deed being treated as ambiguous on its face as to whether the sale was in gross or by the acre.

4. As to the vendor, every sale of land in gross is a contract of hazard as to the quantity of the tract or tracts sold, and he cannot recover, on the contract, either at law or in equity, compensation for an excess therein above the quantity which the tract or tracts were at the time of the sale supposed to contain. Nor can he have rescission of the contract on the ground of mutual and innocent mistake as to the quantity, resulting in a considerable excess, when both parties have been ignorant of the area of the land, and free from fraud in the execution of the contract.

5. In so far as they hold that a contract of sale of land in gross may be rescinded on the ground of a mutual and innocent mistake as to the quantity of land in the tract sold, resulting in a large excess or deficiency, no other ground for relief being shown, Western Mining & Manufacturing Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 406, Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438, Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70, and Pratt v. Bowman, 17 S. E. 210, 37 W. Va. 715, are disapproved and overruled.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Bill by W. C. Newman and others against James Kay and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Payne & Hamilton and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for appellants. C. W. Dillon and A. N. Campbell, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. Whether a certain sale of real estate, the contract having been executed by conveyance and payment of all the purchase money, was a sale by the acre or in gross, is the first question presented in this case; and, it being held to have been a sale in gross, the second is whether the sale can be rescinded, in equity, on the ground of a considerable excess, found upon surveying the tract of land, both parties having been ignorant at the time of the sale of the quantity of the land, and both being entirely free from any fraud or misrepresentation as to quantity.

In 1884 W. W. Newman, a resident of Virginia, died seised of a tract of land in Fayette county, this state, described in his deed, by metes and bounds, as containing 200 acres and 37 poles, and leaving his widow and two sons surviving him. On the 23d day of October, 1895, the widow and sons conveyed the land to James Kay in consideration of $4,800, of which $1,000 was paid in cash, and for the residue of which the purchaser executed his four negotiable notes, in equal amounts, payable in one, two, three, and four years. This deed described the land thereby conveyed in the exact language used in the old deed by which it had been conveyed to W. W. Newman in 1874, and reserved a vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase money. Some time afterwards Kay had the land surveyed, and found that the tract contained 272.2 acres, and had the landbook corrected accordingly. Knowledge of this excess of 72 acres having come to the Newmans, they caused a notice to be served on Kay on the 26th day of October, 1900, reciting the discovery of the excess; claiming they had sold by the acre, in ignorance of the quantity; demanding payment for the excess at the contract price of $24 per acre, or a rescission of the sale; and averring their readiness and willingness to repay the purchase money, with interest. Kay having refused to do either, they brought this suit, alleging in their bill the facts relating to the sale hereinbefore set out, and, in addition thereto, that at the time the deed was executed they believed the tract contained only the quantity mentioned in the deed, and so represented to J. M. Richards, who negotiated and consummated the sale; that at the time they did not know it contained a larger quantity; and that they were informed and believed said Richards and Kay accepted the deed with the understanding that the quantity of land was as stated in the deed. A few days before the deed was executed, the Newmans executed to Richards, "his heirs and assigns," an option on the land for 20 days at the price of $24 per acre, describing the tract as containing, by estimation, 200 acres; and the bill sets up the option, and alleges that, when Richards came and negotiated for it, he represented that he desired to purchase the land for some person other than himself, whose name he did not disclose. It is further shown that Richards returned to Virginia a few days after the execution of the option, with the deed prepared to be executed by the Newmans, conveying the land to Kay, which, it is charged, he represented to be in exact conformity with the terms and stipulations of the option, except that it set forth the aggregate amount of purchase money, instead of specifying the price per acre, and that this variance was discussed at the time of the execution of the deed, and the plaintiffs were assured that the deed was in substantial conformity with the option. The option, the notice served on Kay, and copies of the deed to Kay and the deed to W. W. Newman are exhibited with the bill. It is further alleged that Kay has leased the land to Frank Lyman, who is made a defendant, for the purpose of mining and removing the coal underlying it, and that Lyman has re-leased it to the Low-Moore Iron Company, but that none of the coal had been mined at the time of the institution of the suit; and plaintiffs aver their willingness, in case the sale shall be rescinded, to carry out the terms of the lease made to Lyman and the one made by Lyman to the iron company. The prayer is that Kay be required to pay plaintiffs for said excess at $24 per acre, with interest from the date of the deed, or that the sale and deed be rescinded, and that they may have general relief.

Kay demurred to the bill, and, his demurrer being overruled, he answered, denying that Richards was his agent in the matter of the purchase, and averring that he purchased from Richards for the sum of $5,440, giving him $644 in addition to the $4,800 paid to the Newmans; that he had no notice or knowledge of the option; that Richards acted for himself, and represented that he had authority to sell, and procured and delivered the deed as aforesaid; that the sale was one in gross, the land having been purchased by the defendant to solidify his holdings of surrounding lands, and irrespective of its acreage; that such was the inducement and understanding of the parties; that the quantity of the land was easily ascertainable, and could easily have been known by plaintiffs, had they exercised ordinary care; that they had conveyed by the description and statement of quantity contained in the deed to W. W. Newman; that the defendant, upon the faith and credit of said purchase, had expended large sums of money, whereby the property had been greatly enhanced in value, and sold to third parties, who had made further heavy expenditures on account thereof, in consequence of which the plaintiffs were barred by laches; that the plaintiffs sold and received pay for the exact quantity purchased and paid for by W. W. Newman, wherefore his vendors, if anybody, were entitled to pay for the excess; that defendant had made large expenditures in rendering said tract, and others near to or adjoining it, valuable and accessible to market, and effected a coal lease thereon, with an option of purchase, to Frank Lyman, who assigned it to the Low-Moore Iron Company, and sale of the land was afterwards consummated, and that, in the event of a rescission, the parties cannot be placed in statu quo, wherefore, and because of the laches of complainants, if they ever had any right, a court of equity cannot entertain their suit. Although denying the right of the plaintiffs to have rescission, the respondent asks that, in case the court shall be of opinion that the complainants are entitled to such relief, he may be permitted to pay for the excess.

Depositions were taken and filed by both parties, and on the hearing the court pronounced a decree in favor of the plaintiffs for $2,341.44, awarding execution therefor, and granting the plaintiffs leave for further proceedings against the land, should said sum and the costs be not paid. From this decree, Kay has appealed.

As the rights and liabilities of the parties to a sale of real estate by the acre materially differ from those arising out of a sale in gross, it becomes necessary to determine in the first instance whether the sale now under consideration was by the acre or in gross. The principles governing the construction of deeds and contracts of sales of real estate are exhaustively considered and accurately defined in the case of Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438. In reaching his conclusions, Judge Green, who delivered the able opinion of the court in that case, reviewed and analyzed all the Virginia decisions, as well as all the leading cases decided by other courts, and the principles deduced by him from them were embodied in the syllabus of the case and declared to be sound law. As tested by those rules and principles, the contract of sale evidenced by the deed from the Newmans to Kay is a contract of sale in gross. So much of point 18 of the syllabus as relates to the rule for determining what is a sale in gross reads as follows: "If the vendor by his written contract agrees to convey, or by his deed does convey, for a specified price, a tract of land, described by metes and bounds or otherwise, with the words added, 'containing a specified number of acres,' this, on the face of such contract or deed, is a contract, not by the acre, but in gross, and without any implied warranty of the quantity. * * *

And if, in addition to the exact specification of the quantity of the land, the contract or deed on its face shows that the price to be paid for the land is a multiple of the number of acres specified, this would render the deed ambiguous, as to whether it was a contract in gross or by the acre." In point 19 the effect of ambiguity in the contract or deed, resulting from the circumstance of the mathematical relation of the price to the number of acres, is stated as follows: "If such deed or contract is rendered ambiguous on its face in the manner just spoken of, the court, for aid in interpreting the same, may consider parol evidence of the circumstances which surrounded the parties, and their situation, when the contract or deed was made, and also the conduct of the parties in carrying the contract into execution; but the court can consider no other sort of parol evidence, such as the declaration of the parties before, at the time of, or after the execution of the deed or contract; nor can the court call in aid any kind of parol testimony to alter, explain, or modify the written contract or deed, if it is unambiguous on its face."

This deed states the whole amount of purchase money at $4,800, and then conveys and describes the land in the following terms: "The said F. E. Newman, W. C. Newman and E. W. Newman do grant unto the said James Kay all the following real property, situate," etc. (giving its location and metes and bounds), "containing 200 acres and thirty-seven square poles." It specifies the aggregate price and the number of acres. No account is taken of the 37 square poles, nearly a quarter of an acre, which would have been nearly $6—a very insignificant sum, to be sure, and in itself unworthy of notice—but the inquiry here is for the legal effect of the terms used in the deed. It is from them that the intention of the parties is to be ascertained, if possible. Upon such an inquiry, a single word or a fact very insignificant in itself often determines the construction, without regard to the magnitude of the interest dependent upon it. The decision of the question whether the slight variation might be disregarded, and the deed held to be ambiguous on its face as to whether the sale was by the acre or in gross, however, for reasons presently to be given, is unnecessary, and would be without practical value as a precedent, since the variance from the multiple rule is peculiar in its nature, and unlikely to occur often, if ever, again.

If the ambiguity of the deed on its face be conceded, the admissible evidence is wholly insufficient to establish a sale by the acre. Much of it consists of declarations of intention which could not be admitted at all. Only the circumstances which surrounded the parties and their situation at and before the making of the contract, and their conduct in carrying it into execution, can be considered.

Kay knew nothing about the quantity of the land, nor had he anything to do with the Newmans personally. He never saw them or corresponded with them. They lived near Richmond, and knew nothing about the quantity of the land, except that their deed called for 200 acres and 37 poles. All communication between the Newmans, on the one side, and Kay, on the other, were had through Richards. He says he had purchased some property for Kay in the neighborhood of the land in question, and showed him a map of the Newman land, and suggested that its situation with reference to lands purchased or negotiated for by Kay made it desirable property for him, whereupon Kay told him to buy it if he could, and that he then corresponded with the Newmans, who said they would sell it at $25 per acre. Then, as claimed by Richards, he went to Kay, and offered it to him at $30, and was told to go on and get it, whereupon he went to Richmond and persuaded the owners to give him the option hereinbefore described at $24 per acre; came back with it; showed it to Kay; offered to do what was right with him about the land; received from Kay $600 or $700 to go back to Richmond and close the contract under the option, and a letter from Kay to Kay's attorney at Fayetteville to draft the deed and notes and a deed of trust to secure the deferred payments, which was done; took the papers back to Kay, who, with his wife, acknowledged the deed of trust, and delivered the deed, trust deed, his four notes, and his check to Richards, who took these papers to Richmond, and procured the execution of the deed, and brought it back to Kay. Kay denies that he ever had possession of the option, and the testimony of Richards imports no more than that he saw it. He also denies having told Richards to buy the land. But he says he told him he might buy it of him if he bought it; that Richards went to Richmond, and either wrote or telegraphed that it would require a certain amount of money to buy the property, to which he replied that he did not want it at that price, and would have nothing more to do with it; and that Richards, after returning, came to see him again, saying he had tried in vain to sell to others, and his option was about to expire, whereupon he gave him, or agreed to give him, $600 for his bargain in the land, without ever having seen the option, which arrangement was afterwards consummated, as has been stated. He denies that Richards was his agent, that he purchased by the acre, and that he accepted or adopted the Richards option. There is no pretense that the option was ever assigned to him, or accepted by him so as in any manner to bind him. The Newmans say they had no intention of selling otherwise than by the acre; that Richards told them he was buying for another person, whose name he did not disclose; and that when he came back with the deed they rather objected to it as not conforming in terms to the option, but were assured by Richards that it was in substance the same.

A great deal of this evidence could not be considered. Declarations of parties as to intentions are inadmissible. Kay was engaged in the effort to buy or get control of several adjoining tracts of coal lands, with the view to obtaining enough in a body to enable him to make an advantageous sale to some person desiring to engage in mining on an extensive scale, and the Newman lands were found to be desirable for combination with others which he had bought or contemplated buying. He, no doubt, wanted them, and would have made the contract by the acre, had that been insisted upon; but there is no evidence that his attention was ever called to the distinction between the two kinds of contract, unless his very slight connection with the option may be said to have had that effect. That option stands upon a footing very different from a contract of sale between the Newmans and Kay. Had Kay been a party to it, he would not have been in any sense bound by it to take the land on the terms therein stated or any others. While it bound the owners of the land to sell, it did not bind the holder to purchase. As to the latter, it was a mere proposal to sell. But it was not even a proposal as to Kay. Under it Richards had the exclusive right to purchase, and that right was never assigned to Kay. The option was the proposal of the Newmans to sell to Richards or his assignees. The delivery to the Newmans of the check, notes, deed for execution, and deed of trust was Kay's proposal to buy the land. On the whole, there appears to be nothing in the circumstances, situation, or conduct of the parties indicating that the deed was intended to be other than what on its face it appears to be. They ignored in their settlement the 37 poles—a fact which argues slightly in favor of a sale in gross.

This view is strengthened by the circumstance of the conduct of the grantors both before and after the sale. They were content to rely upon the representation as to quantity in the old deed under which they held. Neither before nor after did they cause any survey to be made. It nowhere appears that any inquiry as to the actual quantity of land was ever made by them. This conclusion is in exact accord with that of this court in Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70. In that case the deed specified $8,000 as the price, and 400 acres as the quantity of the land. The analysis of the admissible evidence, as given by Judge Snyder in the opinion of the court, is as follows: "Was this a sale in gross? It is prima facie such sale, but inasmuch as it appears on the face of the deed that the consideration is an exact multiple of the number of acres specified therein, the deed is thereby rendered ambiguous as to whether it was in fact intended by the parties to be a sale in gross or by the acre; and whether it is the one or the other must be determined by the parol evidence of the circumstances surrounding the parties, their situation at the time of the sale, and their subsequent conduct in carrying it into execution. This evidence, which has been hereinbefore fully stated, in my judgment, not only fails to rebut the presumption of a sale in gross arising from the face of the deed, but it clearly establishes the fact that it was intended and understood to be such by the parties at the time it was made. The conduct of the parties can be reconciled to no other conclusion. They knew at the time that the land had been located by protraction, that it had never been actually surveyed, that constructive or protracted surveys are proverbially uncertain in quantity, and that almost all old surveys exceed the quantity they call for. The sale was for cash. The deed was delivered and the money paid without any demand for a survey by either party, or any provision or agreement made for a future survey. No survey was made or required by the grantors subsequent to the sale, and none made by the grantees until five years after, when one was made by the latter for their own use, without any reference to the purchase. The vendors never claimed or demanded pay for any surplus land until April, 1876, when by their cross-bill in this cause they for the first time asserted a claim for pay for such surplus, without even their making, so far as the record shows, any personal demand for such pay. Considering these facts and circumstances, the conclusion is inevitable to my mind that it was fully understood and intended by the parties that said sale should be treated as, and that it was in fact, a sale in gross, and not by the acre."

Such being the character of the sale, no action or suit, at law or in equity, based upon the contract, for the recovery of compensation for the excess, can be maintained. The grantee obligated himself to pay $4,800, and no more. He did not agree to pay a certain sum for each acre of land that might be found in the tract, but to pay a lump sum for the tract of land. It is not suggested or pretended that there was any fraudulent act on the part of the grantee operating as an inducement to the grantors to enter into the contract, or in any other way injuring them. Whether knowledge of the excess on Kay's part, fraudulently concealed from the grantors, would give a right of action against him as for a deceit, need not, therefore, be considered. It would be preposterous to say that an innocent mistake on his part, shared in by the grantors, is a wrong which would give a right of action to them against him. Hence so much of the bill as seeks compensation for the excess is wholly without any foundation in law or equity. A mutual mistake, resulting in the making of a contract which would not have been made, had the parties possessed full information, does not authorize the court to make such a contract for them as they might have made. It cannot be assumed that they would have made any contract at all, had they been in possession of all the facts. Crislip v. Cain is conclusive as to this, and is in such perfect harmony with reason and justice that it must be accepted as sound. The language is as follows: "But no court of equity in such case of mutual innocent mistake, neither party being guilty of any fraud in the sense above explained, has a right to modify and alter the contract of the parties so as to make it correspond with what the court may think it probable would have been the terms agreed upon by the parties, had they not by means of such innocent and mutual mistake been ignorant of the actual facts at the time when the contract was entered into. All the court can do in such a case is to rescind the contract. It cannot modify the contract, for that would really be making a contract for the parties against their consent, and then enforcing it, which would be usurpation of a very dangerous power."

There are some instances in which, upon a contract of sale in gross, a recovery may be had by the vendee in case of a deficiency in the land sold. Specification in the deed of the exact quantity of the land sold, without any qualifying words whatever annexed, renders the contract ambiguous as to whether or not, although it is one of sale in gross, the vendor, by such positive affirmation of quantity, did not warrant the quantity. The effect of this is twofold: First. To overcome the presumption that the grantor did not intend to warrant the quantity, the circumstances which surrounded the parties, their situation, and their conduct in carrying the written contract into execution are admissible. If an intention to warrant is thus shown, there may be a recovery of compensation for deficiency, on the warranty. Crislip v. Cain (points 18 and 19, and pages 558 and 559). Here the recovery would seem to be based upon a covenant in the deed or contract. It is a warranty of quantity in the deed in favor of the vendee, binding the vendor, but evidently not binding the vendee beyond his express covenants. In other words, it does not bind the vendee to pay for an excess, though it does bind the vendor to abate for deficiency. Second. Such specification of quantity in the deed is a representation which may or may not be a fraud on the part of the vendor, according to the conduct and intent of the parties; and, to ascertain whether a fraud was in fact perpetrated by the vendor on the vendee, all kinds of relevant parol evidence is admissible. Crislip v. Cain, syl. (point 21, and pages 559 and 560). Here the recovery stands upon an affirmative fraudulent act, known as a "suggestio falsi." There is another class of cases in which compensation or abatement on the ground of deficiency may be had, in which the fault of the vendor is the suppression or concealment of knowledge as to the quantity of land, which operates to the injury of the vendee. Thus in Duval v. Ross, 2 Munf. 290, it is held that, "whenever it appears that the vendor's own title deeds must have disclosed to him the true quantity of land, he is bound to make compensation for a deficiency, though his deed to the vendee express a quantity 'more or less.'" To the same effect, see Nelson v. Matthews, 2 Hen. & M. 164, 3 Am. Dec. 620. If by any other means it appears that the vendor knew the quantity, and withheld the knowledge from the vendee, to his injury, the result will be the same. Here, the recovery is for a negative act of fraud, known as "suppressio veri."

It must be observed that what is said in the preceding paragraph relates to deficiency in quantity, not excess. There may be an act of fraud, giving a right to the vendor to recover compensation for an excess from the vendee, when the sale is in gross, but the foregoing principles laid down in Crislip v. Cain are not applicable to cases of excess. Moreover, that case distinctly and emphatically asserts that in such cases, if both parties were mutually and innocently mistaken as to the quantity, and there turns out to be an excess, there can be no recovery of compensation therefor. But it is declared in that case that the contract itself may be rescinded, torn up, annulled, and destroyed and the parties restored to their former condition. This proposition is announced in at least three other cases decided by this court. Western Mining & Manufacturing Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 406; Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70; and Pratt v. Bowman, 37 W. Va. 715, 17 S. E. 210.

In Crislip v. Cain (point 14 of the syllabus) it is declared: "If it be a contract for a sale of land in gross, and the number of acres contained in the tract sold or conveyed is named, and on survey it turns out afterwards that there is either a deficiency or excess in the number of acres in the tract, under some circumstances a court of equity might rescind the contract or annul the deed because of a considerable mistake of the parties as to the number of acres in the tract, though such mistake was mutual and innocent, and neither party was guilty of any fraud, in the sense in which fraud is above explained. Such rescission could not be made unless the mistake was so material as to show that it affected the substance of the contract, and that the minds of the parties had not really come together on the terms stated in the contract or deed." In W. M. & M. Co. v. P. C. C. Co. (points 15 and 16 of syllabus) substantially the same proposition is asserted. In Hansford v. Coal Co. (point 7 of the syllabus) it is said: "Where such deed is on its face a sale in gross, if it is subsequently ascertained that there is either a deficiency or an excess in the quantity of land specified therein, and it is shown that the error in the quantity arose from a mutual and innocent mistake of the parties, a court of equity may, in some cases, upon proper pleadings and proof, annul the deed and rescind the sale; but in the absence of fraud, actual or constructive, in either party, such court can allow no abatement for a deficiency or compensation for any excess." In Pratt v. Bowman the same proposition is asserted, and a recovery for excess decreed because the purchaser had sold the land and put it beyond the power of the vendor to obtain relief by rescission. In the last-named case, sales in gross are divided into three classes, two of which are declared to be sales at hazard, forbidding rescission. The third, in which it is held there may be rescission, is described as follows: "Sales in which it is evident from extraneous circumstances, such as locality, value, price, time, the conduct, conversation, and character of the parties, that they did not or ought not to contemplate or intend to risk more than the usual rates of excess or deficiency in like cases, or than such as might reasonably be calculated on as within the range of ordinary contingency." It is to be noticed that the cases say rescission may be had because of either deficiency or excess, under the circumstances stated.

It is insisted that these successive enunciations of this rule of rescission are not binding upon the court, for the reason that they are dicta. In the first case (W. M. & M. Co. v. P. C. C. Co.) the bill sought the correction of a deed by a change of one of the lines described in it so as to make it conform to what the plaintiffs believed to have been the contract actually made. After making a disposition of this contention adverse to the plaintiffs, Judge Hoffman examined the evidence and pleadings in the case to ascertain whether there could be rescission of the contract because of an admitted excess of 850 acres in the tract, which had been conveyed as one containing 6,123 acres. Evidently this was done to see whether the bill was susceptible of amendment so as to give relief, under the rule that, where a plaintiff has a good case on the evidence, but his bill is defective in its allegations, he is permitted to amend, so that substantial justice may be done between the parties. Finding that about six years had elapsed between the times of the discovery of the excess and the filing of the bill, he concluded that whatever equity the plaintiffs may have had was then barred by their laches. In Crislip v. Cain the proceeding was for an abatement from the purchase money on account of a deficiency, but it did not seek rescission. However, if it had been apparent to the court that relief could have been given upon amended pleadings, it is not to be doubted that the defects in the pleadings would have been indicated, and leave to amend granted. But the court seems to have concluded that there was no mistake, and, consequently, no ground for rescission. In Hansford v. Coal Co. the court dealt with an appeal from a decree dismissing a cross-bill setting up a claim for compensation for an excess of 68 acres in a tract of land sold as one containing 400 acres, at a price equivalent to $20 per acre, and from an order refusing leave to file a bill of review to the same decree for error of law. Viewed as one seeking rescission, the cross-bill was defective, there being no prayer for such relief, and no tender or offer of repayment of any money received. It had been dismissed without the interposition of any request for leave to amend. In view of this, no reason is perceived for any discussion of the principles of rescission. As the cross-bill had been dismissed without a request for leave to amend in the court below, the defendants were in no condition to ask any relief at the hands of this court. Pratt v. Bowman undoubtedly goes further than any of the other three cases, and it may safely be said, without taking time to fully analyze it, that the decision recognized, and stands, in part at least, upon the proposition now under discussion. Reference is made to the fiduciary character of the vendor, but the decision is clearly not based solely upon his want of authority. That seems to be treated merely as a circumstance bearing upon the intent of the parties.

One of the best definitions of the term "obiter dictum" is said to be that given by Folger, J., in Rohrbach v. Ins. Co., 62 N. Y. 47, 58, 20 Am. Rep. 451. He said: "Dicta are opinions of a judge which do not embody the resolution or determination of the court, and, made without argument or full consideration of the point, are not the professed deliberate determinations of the judge himself. Obiter dicta are such opinions uttered by the way, not upon the point or question pending, as if turning aside from the main topic of the case to collateral subjects." In U. S. v. Clark, 96 U. S. 211, 24 L. Ed. 628, Mr. Justice Strong said of an expression of opinion in another case, after stating the exact point decided therein: "The case called for nothing more; and, if more was intended by the judge who delivered the opinion, it was purely obiter." Many definitions are more liberal. These give the principle strictness and rigidity, and, even under them, it is manifest that the declaration of the rule in Pratt v. Bowman is in no sense obiter. It is applied to the facts, and made the basis of the decision. It would be difficult to reach any other conclusion as to the views expressed in W. M. & M. Co. v. P. C. C. Co. But in Crislip v. Cain and Hansford v. Coal Co. it may be otherwise. In all of them the proposition is formally and solemnly incorporated in the syllabi, as if deliberately stated upon mature reflection and consideration. As it is manifest that the court has, in at least two cases, applied the rule, it is useless to spend further time on the inquiry as to the judicial character of these enunciations.

Search for a precedent in the decisions of Virginia up to the date of the division of the state, and in those of this state prior to that of W. M. & M. Co. v. P. C. C. Co., to sustain the proposition that rescission may be had because of a considerable excess when the sale is in gross and the parties to the deed were ignorant of the quantity in the tract and without fault, will be made in vain. Up until that time, sales in gross had been uniformly held to be contracts of hazard from which no relief could be had, in the absence of fraud, except upon the ground of a mutual and innocent mistake as to some matter going to the very essence and substance of the contract. A difference in quantity, however great, was not deemed to be of the substance of the thing contracted for. Its materiality, by a sale in gross, was deemed to have been eliminated from the contract. Both parties took the risk of variation from the acreage stated in the deed, if any was stated.

Thus, in Tucker v. Cocke, 2 Rand. 51, 66, Judge Green, delivering the opinion of the court, in a case similar to this, said: "There are cases in which the mutual error of the parties, without default in either, may be a just ground for rescinding a contract; as, if the error be in a matter which is the cause of the contract—that is, in the substance of the thing contracted for, so that the purchaser cannot get what he bargained for; as in the case of a purchase of military lands on Paint creek, stated to be located under specified warrants, and the warrants were located elsewhere; and of the purchase of an obligation at the risk of the purchaser, and the paper turned out to be forged, or the obligor to have been previously discharged from the obligation under the statute of bankruptcy. In such cases the contract ought to be vacated, even if it had been executed, and if both the parties, in the first case, verily believed that the warrants were located on Paint creek, and, in the other, that the obligation was genuine and the party bound by it. The object, in the first case, being to buy lands on Paint creek, and, in the other, to buy a valid and subsisting obligation, the error would go to the substratum of the matter contracted for. Chamberlaine v. Marsh, 6 Munf. 283; Armstrong v. Hickman, 6 Munf. 287. But if, in the one case, the warrant had really been located on Paint creek, and the parties had both been of opinion, from the general character of lands on that creek, that the lands were of great value, and it had turned out that they were of very little value; or if, in the other, the obligation had been genuine and still binding upon the obligor, and both parties believed that he was in affluent circumstances and able to pay, and it turned out that he was, at the time of the contract, utterly insolvent—the purchaser in neither case could have relief, since he has gotten that which was the cause of the contract, and the error was in relation to the very hazard which the purchaser took upon himself. If relief could be given in such a case as the case at bar, a fortiori it should be given if the vendor knew of the deficiency and concealed it. So that in both cases, when the vendor knew, and when he was ignorant, of the deficiency, relief being given, there could no longer be a contract in which a purchaser could take the risk of quantity effectually upon himself. The Court of Appeals have uniformly recognized the validity and obligation of such a contract, and in all cases in which they have given relief it has been founded on circumstances either of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment, or mistake, in part or in whole, in relation to the substance of the thing contracted for. It is possible that the case of Quesnell v. Woodlief, 2 Hen. & M. 173, does not fall within this observation; but, the grounds of the judgment in that case are so uncertain, some of the judges who decided it, the reporter, and the counsel on both sides who argued the cause, differing so materially in their statements of the reasons upon which the judgment was founded, that it cannot be considered an obligatory authority to the point now under consideration; and, if it were so considered, it has been repeatedly overruled."

What Judge Green meant by reference to error affecting the substance of the contract, going, as he says, "to the substratum of the matter contracted for," is illustrated by a number of decided cases. Thus, in Chamberlaine v. Marsh, 6 Munf. 284, the vendor intended to sell, and the vendee to buy, lands on Paint creek, and those described in the written evidence of the contract were not on that creek. In Graham v. Hendren, 5 Munf. 185, there was a misunderstanding as to the identity of the land, in consequence of which the contract was rescinded. Glassell v. Thomas, 3 Leigh, 113, is a similar case. In Fearon Lumber Co. v. Wilson, 51 W. Va. 30, 41 S. E. 137, this court decreed rescission of sale of lands because of a mutual mistake as to the location of the lands. Perhaps no clearer discrimination between substance and a mere concomitant in a contract of sale of land has ever been made than that given by Judge Carr in Thompson v. Jackson, 3 Rand. 504, 15 Am. Dec. 721. He said: "But take the land lost at the largest estimate, and say it was worth a fourth of the whole purchase money (which is contradicted by the surveyor, and cannot, I think, be the fact), yet can it be said that it furnishes one of those cases of mistake which would authorize the rescission of the whole contract? Has not the purchaser gotten the substance of the thing bought? The surveyor says that this slip has no peculiar value; that it is maiden woodland, and there is a sufficiency of timber for the place without it. If you say that for such a deficiency as this, not affecting the bulk of the land, you will rescind, where will you stop? I have shown that equity will refuse a specific execution in many cases where it would not rescind, and yet there are decisions in abundance to show that a trifling deficiency of a few acres in a tract of land will not even present an obstacle to a specific execution, the court saying that such deficiency lies clearly in compensation, and that the party is made whole by abating so much from the purchase money as is an equivalent for it."

These illustrations sufficiently show what is meant by a mistake which affects the substance of the contract. It must be something affecting the identity or actuality of the thing which forms the subject-matter of the contract, going beyond the mere quantity, quality, or value of that thing. And that where the description is correct, and there is no fraud nor any mistake affecting the substance of the contract in the sense indicated, there can be no relief by rescission or otherwise, is maintained by the great weight of authority. "Whenever it appears by definite boundaries, or by words of qualification, as 'more or less,' or as 'containing by estimation,' or the like, that the statement of the quantity of acres in the deed is mere matter of description, and not of the essence of the contract, the buyer takes the risk of the quantity, if there be no intermixture of fraud in the case." 4 Kent, Com. 467. Noble v. Googins, 99 Mass. 231; Flagg v. Mason, 141 Mass. 64, 6 N. E. 702; Libby v. Dickey, 85 Me. 362, 27 Atl. 253; Frenche v. Chancellor, 51 N. J. Eq. 684, 27 Atl. 140, 40 Am. St. Rep. 548; Borkenhagen v. Vlandin, 82 Wis. 206, 52 N. W. 260; Estes v. Odom, 91 Ga. 600, 18 S. E. 355. "But where the lands in a conveyance are mentioned to contain so many acres by estimation, or the words 'more or less' are added, if there be a small portion more than the quantity, the vendor cannot recover it; and, if there be a small quantity less, the purchaser cannot obtain any compensation in respect of the deficiency; and even a large excess or deficiency has not been considered a ground for relieving a vendor or purchaser." 1 Sud. Vend. § 3, p. 490.

There are a few cases which hold that a considerable excess or deficiency in quantity, the parties having been ignorant of the quantity and free from fault, gives right to compensation or rescission, even though the sale is in gross. The leading case of this class is Harrison v. Talbot, 2 Dana (Ky.) 258. Compared with Crislip v. Cain, it will be found to be a gross misinterpretation of the Virginia decisions, and especially of Quesnel v. Woodlief, 2 Hen. & M. 173, Id., 6 Call. 218, and Nelson v. Matthews, 2 Hen. & M. 164, 3 Am. Dec. 620. That case also makes a distinction between executory and executed contracts, and was itself of the former class. Other authorities recognize the same distinction. Sug. Vend. ch. 8, § 5, p. 491, says: "Where the contract rests in fieri, the general opinion has been that the purchaser, if the quantity be considered less than it was stated, will be entitled to an abatement, although the agreement contain the words 'more or less,' or 'by estimation,' or even stronger words. But in a case where the estate was stated in the contract to contain by estimation forty-one acres, 'be the same more or less,' and upon an admeasurement the quantity proved to be only between thirty-five and thirty-six acres, and the purchaser claimed an abatement; the Master of the Rolls decided against the claim. Upon a motion in Portman v. Mill [2 Russ. 570] it appeared that the lands were described as containing, by estimation, three hundred and forty-nine acres or thereabouts, be the same more or less, and the agreement stipulated that the parties should not be answerable for any excess or deficiency in the quantity of the premises, but that the premises should be taken by the purchaser at the quantity, whether more or less; and the actual number of statute acres was less by one hundred acres than the number stated in the contract. Lord Eldon said that, as to this stipulation, he never could agree that such a clause (if there were nothing else in the case) would cover so large a deficiency in the number of acres as was alleged to exist there."

Though the case of Crislip v. Cain does not recognize it, the distinction is not without reason. In executory contracts the court is called upon to exercise its discretionary powers to decree specific performance, and the defendant sets up his objection before the transaction is completed. In the case of an executed contract, completed in all respects, the application is for rescission, and here again the court may exercise discretion; and it is well settled that a court of equity will often refuse specific performance, and thereby deprive the party of the benefit of his contract, under conditions which would not move it to a rescission of the contract, whereby the same result would be attained. Thompson v. Jackson, cited. Since Harrison v. Talbot is predicated upon this distinction, it is hardly persuasive authority in this case, it being one in which the contract has been fully carried into execution. However, in the opinion in that case it is suggested that, had the instrument been a deed conveying the land, instead of a contract to convey, the vendor might still be entitled to relief, but whether by rescission or a decree for compensation as upon the contract, is not indicated.

Among the cases most often cited as authority for the proposition that a sale in gross may be rescinded on the ground of a mutual mistake as to the quantity of the land, is Harrison v. Talbot, cited. In it, however, there was no decree of rescission. In spite of the plain, simple, and just rule that a court has no authority to make a contract for the parties, in that case, the court, having ascertained that there was an excess of 90 acres in a tract sold for $6,000 as one containing 400, decreed a conveyance by the vendor, without his consent, of 400 acres of the land, leaving him the small quantity of 90 acres, thus compelling him to divide his farm into two parts. It was not a case of rescission, nor one merely refusing specific performance. It is a case in which the court virtually made a new contract for the parties and enforced it. It is followed by the case of Harrell v. Hill, 19 Ark. 102, 68 Am. Dec. 202, another case of specific performance, and not of rescission. That was a case of deficiency, and, though the court did say that, as the contract was executory, there might be an abatement on account of gross mistake, it went further, and ascertained from the evidence that there had been a misrepresentation by the vendor as to the quantity. The decree harmonizes with the last ground of relief, as it abated the purchase money and decreed a specific performance. Hence it is not authority for the principle of rescission.

The Supreme Court of Texas, in O'Connell v. Duke, 29 Tex. 299, 94 Am. Dec. 282, professedly following Harrison v. Talbot, decreed a release of a surplus of 348 acres in a tract of land conveyed as containing 750 acres or more, described as being all of a tract of "eight hundred and fifty acres or more" except one hundred acres sold off previously. The deed also contained a covenant binding the vendor to refund in case the quantity should prove to be less than 750 acres. To ascertain the intent of the parties, parol evidence of their verbal negotiations and declarations was admitted and considered. This case goes beyond the Kentucky precedent, for the sale was an executed one. Both treat the contracts as sales in gross, and both violate the rules of interpretation laid down by this court and by the earlier Virginia cases. It is only in cases of ambiguity that parol evidence is admissible to determine the character of the contract, and then the rule allows only evidence of the situation of the parties, the circumstances which surrounded them, and their conduct in carrying the contract into execution. To permit the introduction of evidence of their conversations and declarations of intention would work a plain violation of the rule which forbids the admission of parol evidence to contradict or vary written instruments.

These cases and a few other similar ones were examined by Judge Green in Crislip v. Cain, and condemned as unsound, because they decreed compensation for excess, as upon the contract. Whether they were proper cases for rescission, he does not inquire. To this subject his mind does not seem to have been fully directed. He does intimate, and even say, there are instances of mutual mistake as to quantity, where the sales are in gross, which warrant rescission, but he makes no analytical or critical examination of any case of that kind. Evidently he was misled by the previous declarations of Judge Hoffman in W. M. & M. Co. v. P. O. Co., who seems likewise to have accepted the proposition without investigation. He cited no authority for his position, and there is no instance of rescission on such ground in any Virginia decision prior to the separation of the state. There are many cases of abatement and compensation in sales made by the acre, and in sales in gross accompanied by warranty of quantity or fraud by misrepresentation or concealment, but none based on mutual mistake as to mere quantity. In connection with Woodlief v. Quessel, he mentions Belnap v. Sealy, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 579, in which a lot, sold as containing eight acres, proved to have an area of about four acres, as an authority for rescission on the ground of mutual mistake as to quantity, but he does not analyze it or subject it to any critical examination. In that case Duer, J., dissented, and denied that there could be rescission. Emmett, J., adopted the theory of mutual mistake, and rested the case on that. Bosworth, J., was satisfied there had been a fraudulent representation by the vendor. He also thought there might be relief on the ground of mistake. That the contract was executory was deemed important.

No doubt the views previously expressed by Judge Hoffman in W. M. & M. Co. v. P. O. Co., cited, were accepted by Judge Green as being sound, practically without investigation on his own account, and it is to be observed that Judge Hoffman announced the proposition apparently without having bestowed upon the question his usual care and consideration. He cites not a single authority for it, and Judge Snyder, in Hansford v. Coal Co., adopts it from Crislip v. Cain without question. From these unsatisfactory cases the court assumed, in Pratt v. Bowman, that the principle was firmly settled in this state, and adopted the classification made in Harrison v. Talbot. Hence it seems to have gotten into our decisions more by accident than as the result of mature consideration.

It being admitted that a sale in gross is a sale at hazard as to quantity, it is a contradiction to say relief may be had on the ground of mistake when there is a deficiency or excess. If there is no risk as to quantity, the sale is clearly not one of hazard nor one in gross. The risk, if any, is as to quantity, and nothing else. Can a man be allowed to avoid his contract of risk, merely because the risk which he assumed has fallen upon him? If, so, how can there be a sale of real estate except by the acre? If it be admitted that the risk is presumed to extend to only a reasonable amount of deficiency or excess, as held in Harrison v. Talbot and Pratt v. Bowman, under what rule can the element of unreasonableness be ascertained? To say there is a presumption that not more than the difference due to variation in instruments and inaccuracies in surveying is risked, would make every sale in gross equivalent to a sale by the acre. The idea that, under a sale in gross, such is the limit of the risk, unless there be a special contract of hazard, finds no support in the earlier Virginia cases. They clearly put all sales in gross on the same footing, except those in which there are warranties of quantity, namely, those contracts in which the quantities are specified in such manner as to render the deeds or contract ambiguous on their faces as to whether a warranty of quantity was in fact intended. This principle can operate only in cases of deficiency, and there is no case in which it has been applied to an excess. To this principle, and to the rules founded upon fraud, Judge Green refers all the numerous Virginia and West Virginia cases examined by him. There may be fraud on the part of the grantee, affording ground of relief against him for an excess, but how can it be said there is a warranty by him in the deed against an excess? There may be a reservation in the deed of right to compensation for an after-discovered excess, but such reservation is an express contract. "There is no doubt that where an estate is expressly sold at a certain price by the acre, and there is a deficiency in the number of acres conveyed, the purchaser will be entitled to a compensation for that deficiency. Sugden, p. 230, quoting 2 Bq. Ca. Abr. 688, pl. 1. So, too, where the land is neither bought nor sold expressly and professedly by the acre, but both parties, in fixing the price for the land, have regard to the quantity which they suppose the estate to consist of, the same rule as to liability for deficiency will prevail. In such case the demand of the vendor and the offer of the purchaser are supposed to be influenced in an equal degree by the quantity which both believe to be the subject of their bargain. A ratable abatement of price will probably leave both in nearly the same relative situation in which they would have stood if the true quantity had been originally known. Hill v. Buckley, 17 Ves. 401; Sugden, 231. Such sale must be considered as in fact, and according to the intention of the parties, though not expressly, a sale by the acre. But if, on the other hand, the sale be clearly one in gross, it is a contract of hazard, in which each party takes on himself the risk of excess or deficiency, and there can be no relief afforded to either, whatever may be the actual quantity in the tract sold. Keytons v. Brawfords, 5 Leigh, 47. But the court will always require clear proof that the vendee did agree to take the hazard of deficiencies on himself. Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call, 329 [1 Am. Dec. 519]; Nelson v. Matthews, 2 Hen. & M. 164 [3 Am. Dec. 620]; Hull v. Cunningham's Ex'or, 1 Munf. 330." Russell v. Keeran, 8 Leigh, 13, 15. Nowhere does it appear that parol evidence is held to be admissible to prove the extent of the risk assumed in a sale in gross. The possibility of such a thing is precluded by the rules and principles deduced and stated by Judge Green in Crislip v. Cain. In every Virginia case prior to the division of the state in which there was not a sale by the acre, a sale in gross with a warranty of quantity, or a sale into which fraud had entered as a vitiating element, relief was denied, nor, with the single exception of Pratt v. Bowman, has relief ever been held by this court to be proper under any other circumstances. Sales in gross, unattended by warranty of quantity or fraud, have been uniformly treated as contracts of hazard, and that precludes any right to rescission on account of variation in quantity.

"In a sale in gross, a contract of hazard on both sides, the vendee is not entitled to relief in case of a deficiency." Keytons v. Brawfords, 5 Leigh, 39. "If a tract of land be sold for 1,100 acres, more or less, at a fixed price, and it turns out that it is less, the purchaser will not be relieved in equity." Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call, 1, 2 Am. Dec. 583. Cabell, J., in Russell v. Keeran, 8 Leigh, 19-20, says: "I am of opinion that the decree of the chancellor, of the 13th December, 1828, is wholly erroneous. It declares that although the sale of the land was a sale in gross, yet it was not a sale of hazard as to quantity. This is contrary to first principles; for every sale of land in gross or by the tract is, ex vi termini, a sale of hazard as to the quantity; the vendor being debarred from claiming any diminution of the purchase money in case the real quantity shall fall short of the estimated quantity." "Where the contract does not specify the number of acres sold or contracted to be sold otherwise than by the general words 'containing so many acres,' this can hardly be looked on as a warranty of the quantity, but rather as a matter of description. Keytons v. Brawfords, 5 Leigh, 48." Russell v. Keeran, 8 Leigh, 13-15. In Tucker v. Cocke, 2 Rand. 51, the court held: "A conveyance of a particular tract of land without a specification of quantity does not bind the vendor to warrant a particular number of acres, if there has been no false representation, and no concealment of facts within his knowledge; although there may have been an expectation in both parties, founded on documents and other evidence known to both, that the number of acres is greater than it turns out to be upon a subsequent survey." The conclusion indicated by these views is supported by the great weight of authority. It cannot be assumed that, in so many cases of large deficiencies and excesses in which relief has been denied because no warranty or fraud was established, it did not occur to the courts and counsel that it might be had by the shorter and easier remedy of rescission. The manifest import of these decisions is that no relief can be had in any form respecting the subject-matter of the hazard. This is the view expressed by Chancellor Walworth in Veeder v. Fonda, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 94, 98. He said: "It seems now, however, to be generally understood that, where the contract has been consummated without any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment as to the real quantity, the courts will not inquire whether there has been an actual mistake as to the supposed quantity contained within certain specified boundaries. But this result has been produced more from the necessity of quieting interminable litigation than from the real equity of the principle established by the decisions." This is quoted and approved by the New York Court of Appeals in Faure v. Martin, 7 N. Y. 210, 57 Am. Dec. 515. In Winch v. Winchester, 1 Ves. & Beam, 375, the court held: "Purchaser not entitled to an abatement for a deficiency in quantity; the particular describing the estate, as containing by estimation forty-one acres, be the same more or less." Parol evidence was admitted to prove a representation by the vendor as to quantity. Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls, said: "As to the admissibility of the evidence, it must depend upon the purpose for which it is produced. If the defendant insists that, the evidence being received, he will be entitled to have the contract performed with an abatement of the price, I think it is not admissible for that purpose, as the court cannot execute in his favour a written agreement with a variation introduced by parol testimony; but if he says he was deceived by this representation, and therefore was induced by fraud to enter into the contract, and offers the evidence for the purpose of getting rid of such contract altogether, for that purpose, I think, it may be received; as, if such a declaration was made by the auctioneer, it would undoubtedly be fraudulent and unfair in the plaintiffs to insist upon the execution of the contract, not giving the defendant the benefit of that declaration." Mann v. Pearson, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 37, holds: "A deed was delivered to M. and T., describing the lot, and as 'containing 600 acres, be the same more or less.' On actual survey the lot was found to contain only 421½ acres. In an action brought against P. on the bond it was held that the mention of the quantity of acres was matter of description, and that the delivery of the deed for the lot of land according to its actual and known description was a performance of the condition of the bond." Chief Justice Kent concurred in the opinion delivered by Spencer, J., which said: "The enumeration of quantity is not of the essence of the contract; it is matter of description merely. The only certainty in the present case is the lot, and this alone is the subject of the covenants." In Jackson v. Barringer, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 471, it is held: "So, where there is a lease of the farm on which A. B. now lives, to contain 80 acres, and the farm actually contains more than 80 acres, the lessor cannot recover the surplus from the lessee, especially where he has been in possession and paid rent for a length of time." Jackson v. Defendorf, 1 Caines, 493, holds: "If a lot be granted by deed, and its number specified with a reference to a map, the whole lot will pass by the deed, though it there be mentioned as containing fewer acres than it absolutely does." In Powell v. Clark, 5 Mass. 355, 4 Am. Dec. 67, it is held as follows: "In a deed of conveyance of land as limited by certain monuments, lines, and courses, and also as containing so many acres and rods, the words expressing the quantity do not amount to a covenant that the land contains that quantity, but are merely descriptive of the land." To the same effect, see Boar v. McCormick, 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 166; Hall v. Powel, 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 456, 8 Am. Dec. 722; Snow v. Chapman, 1 Root (Conn.) 528; Dagne v. King, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 322; Smith v. Evans, 6 Bin. (Pa.) 102, 6 Am. Dec. 436. Many of these cases were actions at law, but the interpretation and construction of a contract is the same in each forum. In Stebbins v. Eddy, 4 Mason (U. S.) 414, Fed. Cas. No. 13,342, a suit in equity for relief in respect to a deficiency, Story, J., after discussing a number of cases, including an anonymous case in 2 Freem. 107, in which a man who had purchased a tract of land described as containing 100 acres, more or less, which had turned out to contain only about 60, was denied any relief, said: "In short, the latest cases generally concur with the doctrine laid down in the anonymous case in 2 Freem. Ch. 107. It seems to me that there is much good sense in holding that the words 'more or less,' or other equivalent words, used in contracts or conveyances of this sort, should be construed to qualify the representation of quantity in such a manner that, if made in good faith, neither party should be entitled to any relief on account of a deficiency or surplus. Nor am I prepared to admit that the fact that the sale is not in gross, but for a specific sum, by the acre, ought necessarily to create a difference in the application of the principle. I do not say that cases may not occur of such an extreme deficiency as to call for relief; but they must be such as would naturally raise the presumption of fraud, imposition, or mistake in the very essence of the contract. Where the sale is fair, and the parties are equally innocent, and the quantity is sold by estimation, and not by measurement, there is little, if any, hardship and much convenience in holding to the rule caveat emptor."

This review of the authorities concerning the subject of sales in gross without warranty of quantity or fraud perpetrated by either party, and the policy of the law which imposes upon parties some degree of care and prudence in making their contracts, to the end that useless litigation, resulting from carelessness and lack of diligence, may be discouraged, impel the conclusion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to a rescission of the contract. Not a few of the cases hold that under the circumstances of this case the plaintiffs would be precluded from any relief by their negligence. Anon., 2 Freem. 107. In a sense, the mistake complained of is attributable to the negligence of the complainants. It was their property, and some inquiry as to quantity, as by a survey, for instance, before disposing of it, would not have been a manifestation of extreme caution, wariness, or prudence; but they made none. Such survey would have cost them no more, perhaps, than it has cost Kay. They discovered the excess about five years after the sale, by mere accident, as a result of Kay's survey, and now ask to be permitted to take advantage of his industry and enterprise. A leading American case holding this to be inequitable is Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55, 23 L. Ed. 798, holding that: "Mistake, to be available in equity, must not have arisen from negligence, where the means of knowledge were easily accessible. The party complaining must have exercised at least the degree of diligence which may be fairly expected from a reasonable person." In the opinion it is said: "The appellees paid their money without even inquiring of any one professing to know where the lines were.

The courses and distances specified in the deed show that a surveyor had been employed. Why was he not called upon? The appellants sat quietly in the dark until the mistake was developed by the light of subsequent events. Full knowledge was within their reach all the time from the beginning of the negotiation until the transaction was closed. It was their own fault that they did not avail themselves of it." In Campbell v. Ingilby, 1 De G. & J. 392, 405, Lord Justice Turner said: "In this case I think that the existence of the plaintiff's claim can be attributed only to his own neglect, and I am of opinion that, under such circumstances, he is not entitled to the compensation which is claimed by this bill." For similar applications of the rule, see Manser v. Davis, 6 Ves. 678; Jennings v. Broughton, 17 Beav. 234; Atwood v. Small, 6 Cl. & Fin. 338. Though there may be at some time a mutual and innocent mistake as to mere quantity in a sale in gross of such magnitude as to enable the court to say it goes to the substance of the contract, and justifies relief by way of rescission, we are firmly convinced that the principles announced in W. M. & M. Co. v. P. C. C. Co., Crislip v. Cain, Hansford v. Coal Co., and Pratt v. Bowman, concerning rescission for such cause, are too broad, and are contrary to the great weight of authority, as well as inconsistent with other principles firmly established in this state. Therefore the doctrine of rescission, as therein announced, is disapproved, and to this extent said cases are overruled.

For the reasons aforesaid, the decree complained of will be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs both in this court and in the circuit court.

Excess.

BRANNON, P. (concurring). Take the case of a deed conveying a tract of land either not specifying, or simply specifying, quantity, without any qualifying words affecting the quantity, there being no fraud. Shall the grantor have either pay or rescission on the ground of excess in quantity? Such a deed is a sale in gross; that is, one of hazard or risk as to quantity. Crislip v. Crain, 19 W. Va. 438; Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326; Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70; Pratt v. Bowman, 37 W. Va. 715, 17 S. E. 210. The statement of quantity in such a deed is descriptive of the tract, not a covenant or warranty of quantity. 4 Kent, 466; Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Grat. 132. To allow pay for excess or rescind would deny the essential character of the deed given it by law—that of hazard. The law would contradict itself. It would in one breath say that the deed is one of hazard, and in the next breath say that it is one of warranty of quantity; for how can either pay or rescission be given unless there is warranty or covenant of quantity? Furthermore, to allow such pay or rescission would deny the legal character of the deed, contrary to the old rule that a contract in writing shall not be contradicted, altered, or varied by oral evidence. The law stamps such a deed as one in gross. You allow evidence to contradict this. You allow evidence to prove mistake as to quantity, when the deed, as construed by law, says that the grantor was not mistaken, but took the risk as to quantity; that he conveyed the tract, whether more or less in quantity, for a given sum. The law makes the deed have one effect; oral evidence makes it have another. Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326, is decided to show that this cannot be done in such case by oral evidence. If the grantor intended to make quantity of the essence of the contract, he would have made it a conveyance by the acre, or inserted a clause for compensation for excess; but he has made a sale in gross. Where there is deficiency, and the grantor has stated in the deed that the tract contains a certain quantity, that is a different case, under our decisions, from excess. Under those decisions it is because, and only because, of that statement of quantity, that deduction from purchase money is made for deficiency. But as to excess, that reason does not exist, since the grantee has made no statement of quantity. In the case of claim for deficiency it is sometimes (only sometimes) granted because of fraud in the grantor in making such statement; but there is no such fraud imputable to the grantee, no such basis for decree against him on account of excess. Judge Green mentions this in Depue v. Sergeant, supra, and the clear jurist Judge Roane said in Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call, 312, 1 Am. Dec. 519, "With regard to the case of excess, it may not follow, of course, that when there is abatement for deficiency there should be payment for the excess." For deficiency in our cases relief is granted for legal fraud. If you regard the statement of quantity warranty (you cannot), while the vendee could get relief for loss, the vendor could not for excess. There is difference between excess and deficiency, whether you regard relief as based on fraud or warranty.

But the argument is made that, though no fraud is chargeable to the grantee, there is mutual mistake, and that calls for relief. I respond that the cases say that compensation for excess or abatement cannot be made on the theory of mistake, because that would fly in the face of the deed, which speaks a sale in gross. Judge Green says so in Crislip v. Crain, 19 W. Va. 512, and point 10 in syllabus. Hillard on Vendors, 328, says: "The general principle is laid down that the vendor of land as containing a certain quantity, more or less, when he knows from the title deeds or otherwise that it contains a much less quantity, is in equity bound to make good the difference. But where a contract has been consummated without any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment as to the quantity, the court will not inquire whether there has been a mistake upon that point. Thus, if the vendor sells and the vendee buys a tract of land for so many acres, more or less, and it turns out upon a survey that there is less than the estimated quantity, the buyer shall not be relieved in equity. So it is said the cases in which equity interferes, where the quantity of the land exceeds or falls short of that specified in the deed or contract, are those in which the sale has been made by the acre or foot, or where there has been fraud or willful misrepresentation on the part of the party against whom relief is sought." I repeat that pay for excess or loss cannot stand on the idea of mistake, but only on fraud, actual or legal. But it is said that, while it is true that money compensation cannot be made because of mistake, yet rescission of the deed can be. It is strange to say that you cannot decree compensation for mistake because the deed is a sale in gross, yet you can take the vendee's land from him for that mistake. Do you not, by rescission, deny the legal effect of the sale as one of hazard just as much as you would by decree for money compensation? Do you not thus ignore that legal effect of the deed as one in gross or of hazard? You would, in reason, equally ignore the law of the deed in either case. "Whether the case be one of excess or deficiency, the mistake is not in the substance of the contract, but in relation to the very risk in the contemplation of the parties." Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Grat. 137. For the position that in case of such a deed there can be neither compensation nor rescission for excess, in absence of fraud, I cite Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call, 301, 1 Am. Dec. 519, and Tucker v. Cocke, 2 Rand. 51, 66, where Judge Green says that quantity in such case is not of the substance of the contract; that the substance is the tract; that, if the land is sold as on Paint creek, whereas it is elsewhere, that is a mutual mistake as to the "substance," and there will be rescission; but that mistake in quantity is not in the "substance," but covered by the hazard. Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call, 1, 2 Am. Dec. 583; Keyton v. Brawford, 5 Leigh, 39, 48; Reed v. Patterson, 7 W. Va. 263; 2 Warvelle on Vendors, pp. 974, 976; Dart on Vendors, 304. I refer to 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 635, saying that excess in quantity "does not entitle him either to rescission, to reconveyance of excessive quantity, or to compensation." See pages 625, 637. On page 627 we find many cases cited for the text: "The theory on which relief is denied is that the purchaser gets the specific land which he contracted to buy, and must be deemed to have assumed the risk of deficiency." In Hardin v. Kelley, 89 Va. 333, 15 S. E. 894, our holding is sustained. It says that, where a tract is conveyed for a certain sum within certain bounds, stated to contain a certain quantity, there can be no recovery for excess.

But do our cases hold that in case of excess there can be relief? They say there can be no money compensation decreed unless the purchaser is willing to pay; but some say there may be rescission. I contend that Western M. & M. Co. v. Peytona, 8 W. Va. 406, is obiter as to its recognition of right of rescission. It did not enter into the decree. The decree is not based on that. It did not even allow an amendment as to it. Bouvier, L. Dict., word "Dictum." The opinion shows that it was not intended to be decided. The same may be said of Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70. Certainly expressions in Crislip v. Cain, allowing rescission for excess, were obiter, it being a case of deficiency, not excess. As to Pratt v. Bowman, 37 W. Va. 715, 17 S. E. 210, we were in error in holding a right to rescission for excess. We were misled by the cases just mentioned. Argument and reargument have brought this matter of excess to close scrutiny in the present case. Those cases were squarely assailed, and a demand made for reconsideration of them as regards this subject. I admit reluctance to depart from a former case—even one, and there is but one—but the law ought to be laid down right when it is to operate constantly in daily transactions in future. Shall we persevere in error when we believe it to be error and it is challenged as error? Is this ruling practically unjust? When quantity is given in deeds, who thinks of its being warranted? When that is designed, the sale is made by the acre. Judge Tucker said in Keyton v. Brawford, 5 Leigh, 48, as many of the books say: "I have looked upon such mention of quantity as, in general, matter of description only, and not of itself as giving a character of a contract by the acre. I am satisfied that such a thing is rarely dreamed of by those who execute deeds." Much authority says that mere statement of quantity in a deed, in connection with boundary, is only description, not warranty of quantity. 4 Kent, 466; Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Grat. 132; Wood v. Murphy, 47 Mo. App. 539; Jenkins v. Bolgiano, 53 Md. 420; 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 628; Rogers' Case, 72 Ala. 529.

Deficiency.

Though deficiency is not involved, I will say that much authority in Virginia and elsewhere can be found denying compensation in case of such a deed as is involved in this case, because the sale is in gross. But we have numerous cases holding that in such cases there may be, under circumstances, compensation for deficiency, where the grantor assumes to represent in the deed the tract to contain a certain quantity. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 632; Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 70; Sine v. Fox, 33 W. Va. 521, 11 S. E. 218; Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326. They hold that, where a deed states a tract to contain a fixed quantity, if that was relied on and induced the purchase, it is ground of compensation for deficiency, as the statement of quantity, whether made in ignorance of the true quantity or not, is, in law, fraud. Such is not the case as to excess. Where a deed makes no statement of quantity, but conveys the tract, there is no compensation. Allen v. Shriver, 81 Va. 174. I confess that I do not see that Crislip v. Cain is sound in holding that, where a deed merely states quantity, it prima facie gives right either to abatement or rescission for deficiency, in absence of actual fraud. When once the law puts upon the deed the seal of a sale in gross, the statement of quantity is merely further description of the tract, not a warranty of quantity, and therefore cannot be the ground of relief. The law does treat that statement of quantity in that light. See citations above. It is conceded in the Crislip Case that mutual mistake of quantity is not the ground of relief, but that the statement of quantity is, because a legal fraud. How can this be when the deed is a sale in gross? By oral evidence you deny the writing. But there is a difference between excess and deficiency where the deed states quantity. There is but one case holding that excess gives right to relief, but many following Crislip v. Cain. I would yield to them only on the principle of stare decisis. They are numerous. But they are not cases of excess. It does seem to me that this matter turns on two questions: (1) Is the deed one of sale in gross? (2) Is the statement of quantity in it warranty of quantity? The law says that such a deed speaks a sale in gross, and I assert that the mere statement of quantity is not of the substance, not a statement of a fact as on the grantor's personal knowledge, not made to induce the grantee to purchase, is not a warranty. When the parties intend quantity of the substance—when one states the quantity as within his knowledge, and the other buys on its faith—they say it is a sale by the acre, or in some cases to make quantity of the substance of the contract; but the incidental statement of quantity in description is not prima facie of the substance. The tract is the substance. The fact that the parties have not sold by the acre or otherwise made quantity important shows that they did not intend the statement of quantity as a warranty. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 480, 481. If the party knows the statement is false, this is actual fraud; but if he states quantity, not knowing it to be false, or does not say it is true on his own knowledge, when he knows the statement is not true, relief is given, though the deed is in gross, because of fraud. When he says he knows the quantity is correct, you relieve for warranty; but when neither is the case there is no rescission, because the deed is in gross.

It seems not necessary to say that I have not been speaking of sales by the acre. I desire to be understood as speaking of deeds passing legal title, not of executory contracts, or what equity would do in a suit for specific performance.

GIBONEY v. COOPER & COOPER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 31, 1905.)

APPEARANCE—EFFECT—DEFECT OF PROCESS— APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

1. A general or voluntary appearance in a case by a defendant named therein is equivalent to service of process, and confers jurisdiction of the person on the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appearance, §§ 79-90.]

2. A general appearance waives any defect in the process, and confers jurisdiction of the person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appearance, §§ 118-143.]

3. Where, in an action of assumpsit, judgment is rendered for a greater sum than the damages laid in the writ and declaration, the appellate court will not review such judgment, when such excess of damages is not sufficient to give said court jurisdiction.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Ritchie County;
M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by L. P. Giboney against S. J. Cooper and Hugh Cooper. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

H. B. Woods and McCluer & McCluer, for plaintiffs in error. J. Newman and S. Robinson, for defendant in error.

McWHORTER, J. This is an action of assumpsit brought in the circuit court of Ritchie county by L. P. Giboney against S. J. Cooper and Hugh Cooper, late partners as Cooper & Cooper. The declaration contains only the common accounts, and plaintiff filed with his declaration an account as follows:

Goose Creek, W. Va., Nov. 27, 1902.
S. J. Cooper & Cooper to L. P. Giboney, Dr.
To note dated July 22, 1901.....	$300 00
To interest to Nov. 27, 1902.....	1 80
To protest charges and protest.....	1 10
	<hr/> $302 90

—accompanied by an affidavit as required by statute. The writ was served only upon the defendant Hugh Cooper, and was returned not found as to S. J. Cooper. An order of publication was taken upon an affidavit of nonresidency of S. J. Cooper, and on the 26th day of February, 1903, the defendants appeared and filed a counter affidavit denying that the defendants, Cooper & Cooper, were indebted in any sum to the plaintiff, L. P. Giboney, on the demands stated in the plaintiff's declaration, and moved to set aside the office judgment had at rules, which was done; and the defendants demurred to plaintiff's declaration, in which demurrer the plaintiff joined, and the demurrer, being considered, was overruled, and on motion of defendants they were given 30 days in which to file special pleas in the case. Afterwards, on the 20th day of June, 1903, the defendants entered their general plea that they did not owe the plaintiff the amount of money claimed in his declaration, or any part thereof; and a jury was impaneled and sworn to try the issue, and, after hearing the evidence, returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, assessing the damages at $312. The defendants, by counsel, moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant them a new trial because the said verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, of which motion the court took time to consider; and on the 24th day of June the court overruled the motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, and rendered judgment against S. J. Cooper and Hugh Cooper, late partners as Cooper & Cooper, for the sum of $312, with interest thereon from the 20th day of June, 1903, until paid, and his costs. Upon the trial of the case the defendants tendered their bill of exception, marked No. 1, which was signed, sealed, and saved to them on the record. The defendants procured from one of the judges of this court a writ of error.

The first error assigned is the overruling of the demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration. The declaration is the ordinary declaration in trespass on the case in assumpsit, on the common counts. No grounds of demurrer are shown, and the declaration appears to be sufficient. See section 29, c. 125, Code 1899.

Defendants, by their counsel, in their brief, claim that the court erred in rendering a personal judgment for any amount against S. J. Cooper, one of the defendants, and in refusing to set aside said judgment, because said S. J. Cooper had not been served with process in the case, and no appearance was ever entered therein by said S. J. Cooper, or any one for him. There were but two defendants named in the writ and declaration—S. J. Cooper and Hugh Cooper—and quite all the orders show that the "defendants" appeared. On February 26, 1903, "the defendants demurred," which demurrer was overruled, and then, "on motion of the defendants, they are given thirty days in which to file special pleas herein"; and in June, 1903, in open court, after stating the style of the case, the order says, "This day came the parties to this action, by their counsel, and the defendants, for plea to the plaintiff's declaration, say they do not owe the plaintiff the amount of money, or any part thereof, in his declaration alleged, and issue is thereon joined, and thereupon came a jury," etc. And all the motions in the case to set aside the verdict and grant them a new trial, and the exceptions and objections to the rulings of the court, were all by "the defendants" in the case, and not by "the defendant." The general appearance in the cause of both of the defendants is too marked to leave any question as to the appearance. "A general or voluntary appearance is equivalent to service of process, and confers jurisdiction of the person on the court. Hence a defendant is estopped to object for want of jurisdiction where he has appeared generally, and it is held to be immaterial whether he be a resident or nonresident." 3 Cyc. 515, Id. 517. In 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 614, it is said: "The prosecution of an appeal by a defendant not summoned, and who did not appear, is an appearance to the action," and Id. 617: "Any acquiescence in the proceedings of a suit in the appellate court will be regarded as a general appearance." Id. 621: "It is a familiar rule that a general appearance waives any defect in the process, and confers jurisdiction of the person." Smith v. Johnson, 44 W. Va. 278, 29 S. E. 509.

And it is alleged as error that the court rendered judgment for $312 damages; being in excess of damages laid in the writ and declaration, which was only $302.90. If this is error, it is only an error of $9.10, and this court would have no jurisdiction.

Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff offered in evidence a note, together with the certificate of the notary public protesting said note, dated the 20th day of October, 1902, and the aggregate whereof, of said note and protest fees, was the amount laid in the declaration and summons, $302.90, to the introduction of which note and certificate of protest counsel for defendant objected for the reason that the note of Cooper & Cooper was not the note of S. J. Cooper & Cooper; the declaration reciting that they were partners as Cooper & Cooper. Objection was made to the note and certificate of protest. The objection was overruled, and the note permitted to be introduced; and the court took time to consider as to objections to the certificate of protest, which was later also permitted to be introduced. The note, with indorsements thereon, is in the following words and figures:

"$300.00. Cairo, W. Va., July 22, 1902. Ninety days after date, for value received, we promise to pay to the order of L. P. Giboney Three Hundred Dollars negotiable and payable at The Bank of Cairo, Cairo, W. Va. S. J. Cooper & Cooper.

"Former No. Postoffice. [Stamped across the face of note:] Protested Oct. 20, 1902. Geo. H. Carver, Notary Public. [Indorsed on back of note:] L. P. Giboney."

The certificate of protest, as introduced, shows the note to be signed with no marks through the letters "S. J." before Cooper & Cooper.

After the admission of the certificate of protest, the court gave the following oral instruction to the jury: "Gentlemen of the Jury: You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence in this case that, at the time the note was delivered by the maker, it was signed merely in the firm name of Cooper & Cooper, then you will find for the plaintiff in this case the amount of the note in controversy. However, if you should believe from the evidence that at the time it was delivered it was not so signed, but that the letters 'S. J.' were on the note, and were not erased or marked out, then you should find for the defendant in this case." To which instruction counsel for plaintiff objected and excepted. The note was introduced in connection with the oral testimony of L. C. Giboney, who acted for the plaintiff, his son L. P. Giboney, in selling and delivering to the defendants or S. J. Cooper the wagon, horses, and outfit for which the note was given. The only question in the case is, really, whether S. J. Cooper purchased the property on his individual account, with the knowledge of that fact of said Giboney, or whether he purchased it for the firm of Hugh Cooper and S. J. Cooper, who were engaged in the sawmill business. L. C. Giboney was asked whether he knew under what name and where the defendants were doing business. He stated that Hugh Cooper and Sam Cooper were doing business on Nutter's Fork in the firm name of Cooper & Cooper, in the sawmill business, and was asked if he had business with them as the firm of Cooper & Cooper. "A. Not until I delivered the horses to them." He was then shown the note in question, and asked: "Who made that note? A. My son drew the note up—L. P. Giboney. Q. Who signed it? A. Sam Cooper. Q. Where did he sign it? A. In a grocery that Mr. Cooper (Sam Cooper) was running"—and stated that by "Sam Cooper" he meant S. J. Cooper. He was told to look at the signature of the note, and explain, if he could, how the "S. J." came to be crossed out. "A. Well, he set down to the counter and put it 'S. J. Cooper.' Says, I, 'Mr. Cooper, now is this the way you sign all your paper?' 'We do,' he says. 'We sign all our papers in this way.' And I felt kind of doubtful about it. And this Mr. Cooper's wife [pointing to Mr. Cooper, who was present] set right there [indicating], and I set right there, and Mr. Cooper set right there [indicating respective positions to each other], and I parleyed a good bit in my mind whether to take the note and leave the horses, or to take the horses, and he told me so positively that was the way they signed their papers; and he said to me, 'We have part of the money in the Cairo Bank now, but we don't want to draw all our means out,'—then I took the note. Q. What was the consideration for that note? A. Three hundred dollars. Q. What did you give for that? A. A pair of horses, wagon, harness, and outfit—chains and everything. Q. To whom did you sell the wagon, harness, etc.? A. Sam Cooper. I knowed him by that name. That is the man who came and contracted for the team. Q. For what purpose? A. To log the mill. Q. Do you mean the sawmill of Cooper & Cooper? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where? A. Right there at the mill. Q. But at the time of making the note you would not accept his individual note? A. No, sir; but when he signed it 'Cooper & Cooper'— He first signed it 'S. J. Cooper,' and, when I didn't want to take it, he put 'A.

Cooper' on it. This Cooper's wife never said pro or con, and the note laid there a good bit, and I thought she couldn't help hearing what was said about this note, and she never gave any objections; but this Mr. Cooper didn't seem to be there, and I asked Mr. Sam Cooper where he was, and he told me, but I don't recollect where he said he was. And, I asked him very positively if that was the way they signed their paper, and he said they signed all their paper that way. Question by Robinson: Which way do you mean—"S. J. Cooper' or 'Cooper & Cooper'? A. You see, he only wrote 'S. J. Cooper,' and then he put '& Cooper,' and I objected to it. Q. Now, Mr. Giboney, when that note was signed under your objection, what, if anything, was done to the letters 'S. J.'? Just look at the note? A. They were canceled across. Q. Did you see them crossed? A. I seen S. J. Cooper—I didn't see this one crossed [meaning the second letter], but I did see this one. I took notice to that, and something called my attention, and I turned my head, and when he handed me the note the 'S. J.' was canceled. Q. Did you pay the note when it was protested—take it up out of the bank? A. No, sir; I didn't. My son did. Q. What is your son's name? A. L. P. Giboney. Q. He is the plaintiff in this suit? A. Yes, sir." There was a good deal of conflicting evidence about the erasure of the letters "S. J."—as to whether it was done before or after it was negotiated and paid, or at the time it was made—and it seems to me this is not material. S. J. Cooper and W. H. Cooper were brothers doing business together as Cooper & Cooper in the sawmill business, and, according to the evidence of Hugh Cooper himself, S. J. Cooper was the most active member of the firm. He says that he and S. J. Cooper were members of the firm, and when asked: "Was there any limited powers upon either one of you as to the right to sign papers? A. I believe not. Q. One had as much power as the other? A. Nothing was ever said about that, as I know of. Q. You have the sawmill over there, have you not? A. Yes, sir. Q. That belonged to the firm of Cooper & Cooper? A. Yes, sir. Q. You ran a bank account in the Bank of Cairo? A. Yes, sir; the business was all done in the name of Cooper & Cooper. Q. Who signed the checks? A. I done some of it. Q. Did S. J. Cooper ever do any of it? A. He has, I believe. Q. Anybody else? A. Yes; my son Will. Q. You cannot say that S. J. Cooper at the time had not the right to sign the name of Cooper & Cooper to that note? A. As a member of the firm, I suppose he had. Q. He brought the horses there to the mill? A. No, sir; Mr. Giboney brought them to the mill." This firm was carrying on the sawmill business, and the purchasing of this team was in the line of their business—"for logging the mill"—and the team was used for that purpose, as stated by the resident defendant, Hugh Cooper, as a witness for defendants; but he claimed that he (S. J. Cooper) worked the team for the firm by the day, and was so paid for it by the firm. That was a matter between themselves, however. S. J. Cooper, being an active member of the firm, and having a right to make such purchase and to execute the paper of the firm in payment for the property, was reasonably taken by Giboney to be representing the firm in making the purchase; and there is no direct evidence of the fact that the plaintiff or his father, L. C. Giboney, had notice that S. J. Cooper was dealing for himself individually, and not for the firm, even if that were true. That was a question purely for the jury, which rendered its verdict for plaintiff notwithstanding the instruction so favorable to the defendants given to it by the court. I am unable to see that the verdict of the jury should be disturbed.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

BOSWORTH et al. v. WILSON et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 31, 1905.)

APPEALABLE ORDER.

An order merely sustaining a demurrer to a bill in equity, not dismissing the bill, is not appealable.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by A. S. Bosworth and another against W. G. Wilson and others. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the bill, complainants appeal. Dismissed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. Dailey & Bowers, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. To a bill in equity in the circuit court of Randolph county filed by Bosworth and Rumbarger against Wilson and others a demurrer was entered, and the court made an order which sustained the demurrer and gave leave to file a second amended bill. From this order an appeal has been taken.

This court cannot consider the merits. The law gives it no jurisdiction of an appeal from such a decree, for want of finality. The order is interlocutory. The court can retract it and make an opposite ruling. An order merely sustaining a demurrer, but not dismissing the bill, is not appealable. It is a mere opinion not carried out. Gillespie v. Coleman, 98 Va. 276, 38 S. E. 377; 2 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 114; 2 Cyc. 605. The case of White v. C. & O. R. Co., 26 W. Va. 800, rules this case. It holds that an order sustaining a demurrer and giving leave to amend a declaration is not appealable. Even if the feature of leave to amend were absent, and it were only an order sustaining a demurrer, no appeal would lie, but that feature makes it plainer that the order is not final. 2 Cyc. 605, 607; 2 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 114. See Hannah v. Bank, 53 W. Va. 82, 44 S. E. 152. The case of Gillespie v. Coleman, supra, holds that there is no appeal, whether the order sustains or overrules a demurrer. Parsons v. Snider, 42 W. Va. 517, 26 S. E. 285, holds that an order overruling a demurrer will not support an appeal.

We dismiss the appeal as improvidently granted.

STERINGER v. JOHN MACKIE & CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 31, 1905.)

EXECUTION—VALIDITY—JUSTICE OF THE PEACE —JUDGMENT—FILING TRANSCRIPT —APPEARANCE.

1. An execution issued by the clerk of the circuit court upon a judgment of a justice, without a transcript of such judgment having been filed in such clerk's office as required by section 118 of chapter 50 of the Code of 1899, is void as between the parties.

2. The filing of an abstract of a judgment of a justice in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the county in which the judgment was rendered is not a compliance with the provision of said section which requires a transcript of such judgment to be filed. The filing of such abstract confers no authority upon the clerk of said circuit court to issue an execution on such judgment.

3. Where a party appears generally and resists a motion to quash an execution, without objection for want of notice of the motion, he thereby waives the notice thereof required by section 17 of chapter 140 of the Code of 1899.

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by J. A. Steringer against John Mackie & Co. and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant John Mackie brings error. Reversed.

Charles L. Finnell, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Maxwell and J. Wm. Harman, for defendant in error.

COX, J. This is a writ of error from an order of the circuit court of Tucker county overruling the motion of plaintiff in error, John Mackie, late a member of the firm of John Mackie & Co., to quash two executions purporting to be issued by the clerk of the circuit court of said county upon a judgment of a justice. The first was issued on July 1, 1895, and the second on November 26, 1903. The evidence on the motion appears by bill of exceptions, which includes a copy of a judgment from the docket of the justice.

In determining the validity of these executions, it is material to inquire upon what they were based. Section 118 of chapter 50 of the Code of 1899 provides how executions upon a judgment of a justice may be issued by the clerk of the circuit court of the county in which the judgment was rendered. This statute requires that a transcript of such judgment of the justice shall be filed before the clerk is authorized to issue executions on the judgment. A transcript, according to its derivation, and as generally used and understood, is in effect a copy. Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines a transcript to be a copy of an original writing or deed. The Legislature has provided that, by filing a transcript of a judgment of a justice in the clerk's office of the circuit court of the county in which the judgment was rendered, the clerk may issue executions thereon in the same manner and with like effect as if the judgment had been rendered by the circuit court. The transcript evidence of the judgment filed in the clerk's office is the authority of the clerk to issue an execution on the judgment. The filing of the transcript is a prerequisite to the issuing of an execution by the clerk. Without it he has no authority to issue an execution upon a judgment of a justice. In examining this record, we find the only pretense of the filing in the clerk's office of a transcript of the judgment of the justice, supporting the two executions in controversy in this case, is a paper copied in the printed record at page 9, which copy is a part of the bill of exceptions. This paper has the following caption: "Second, a copy from the records in the office of the clerk of the said circuit court, showing that a transcript of said judgment was filed in the office of said clerk on the 1st day of July, 1895, and an execution issued on the same day, marked 'Petitioner's Exhibit No. 2,' in the words and figures following." To this paper is appended the following certificate of the clerk: "Transcript of judgment rendered by Wm. E. Talbott, a justice of the peace for Tucker Co., W. Va., on the 11th day of June, 1892, and entered here on the execution docket on this the 1st day of July, 1895, by order of plaintiff's counsel. Teste: C. W. Minear, Clerk." The body of this paper is not a transcript of the judgment of the justice, but, at best, a most imperfect abstract of the judgment of the justice. In styling the judgment there is added an additional defendant, as appears when compared with the copy from the justice's docket. It does not give the date of the judgment, the name of the justice rendering it, or the county in which it was rendered. This is the only instrument found in the record which could be claimed to give any authority to the clerk of the circuit court to issue an execution on the judgment referred to. An abstract of a judgment ordinarily means a mere brief, and not a copy of that from which it is taken. Dickinson v. R. R. Co., 7 W. Va. 413.

Where the existence of a judgment is put in issue, a mere abstract will not be received as proof of the judgment, and dispense with the necessity of producing an authenticated copy of such judgment. Anderson v. Nagle et al., 12 W. Va. 98. The filing of a mere abstract will not meet the requirements of the statute providing for a transcript. We are not unmindful that the imperfect abstract mentioned, with its caption and certificate as above set forth, was originally filed by the plaintiff in error with his petition for stay of proceedings upon said executions, and is therein referred to as a copy from the execution book; but this does not change the character of the paper when it comes here by bill of exceptions as part of the evidence. It speaks for itself, and is not sufficient to support the executions issued by the clerk of the circuit court. The executions are not simply voidable, but are void, as between the parties, for want of any authority in the clerk of the circuit court to issue them, and the motion of the plaintiff in error should have been sustained by the circuit court, and the executions quashed.

The attorney for the defendant in error claims in his brief, and cross-assigns as error, that reasonable notice of the motion to quash was not given the defendant in error, as required by section 17 of chapter 140 of the Code of 1899. This may be true, but is this error? The defendant in error appeared generally and resisted the motion in the circuit court, without any objection for want of notice, and he must be taken to have waived the notice and his right to object for want thereof. He stands in the same positions as if such notice had been given and properly served upon him. Groves v. County Court, 42 W. Va. 537, 26 S. E. 460; Frank v. Zeigler, 46 W. Va. 614, 33 S. E. 761; Shepherd v. Brown, 30 W. Va. 13, 3 S. E. 186; and other cases before this court.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment of the circuit court of Tucker county entered on the 20th day of June, 1904, overruling the motion to quash the two executions mentioned, is reversed and annulled, and, this court proceeding to enter the judgment which the circuit court should have entered, it is ordered that the motion of plaintiff in error, John Mackie, to quash the two executions issued by the clerk of the circuit court of Tucker county, the first on the 1st day of July, 1895, and the second on the 26th day of November, 1903, be sustained, and that the said executions and each of them be quashed.

STATE v. BONER et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 31, 1905.)SUPREME COURT—JURISDICTION—RECOGNIZANCE—JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—RELEASE.

1. Judgment for the state for $100 on a scire facias on a recognizance of bail. At a subsequent term an order is made setting aside the judgment. As the principal and interest exceeded $100 when the order of release was made, this court has jurisdiction of a writ of error sued out by the state.

2. A judgment on a scire facias upon a recognizance of bail is a bar to defenses which might have been made against the scire facias.

3. A court cannot at a later term release a final judgment entered at a former term upon a writ of scire facias upon a recognizance of bail.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, §§ 668-671.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by the state against J. L. Boner and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. T. George, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Kittle and J. Blackburn Ware, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. At one term of the circuit court of Barbour county upon a writ of scire facias on a recognizance entered into by E. M. Ray and others, with condition that Ray appear before the court to answer the state in a prosecution for selling liquor, the court rendered judgment and awarded execution in favor of the state against the defendants for $100 and costs. At a subsequent term the court made an order reciting that the sureties had taken and lodged Ray in jail to answer the charge, and setting the said judgment aside and discharging the debtors from its payment, and the state has sued out a writ of error.

First, it is urged that this court has no jurisdiction of the writ of error, because the judgment is not over $100. When the order setting aside the judgment was made, there had accrued nearly four months' interest on the $100, as Code 1899, c. 131, § 18, says "every judgment, except where otherwise provided by law, shall bear interest from the date thereof, whether it be so stated in the judgment or not." Therefore this order aggrieved the state to the extent of $100 plus interest. By this order the state loses $101.80. It is from the order taking from it that sum that the state appeals. That the writ of error lies is shown by Arnold v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 142, 18 S. E. 476. The Constitution excludes costs, but not interest, in ascertaining the amount for appeal. It is argued that, under this rule, a man who recovers $98 could wait until interest would bring the amount to over $100, and then appeal. No. He appeals from the one judgment. But here it is the later order releasing the debt that is assigned as the error. It is that order that supports the writ of error. It is that which does the harm, just as the second judgment—that on certiorari—aggrieved Arnold in the case cited.

Certain defects in the recognizance or ball bond are suggested in defense of the order of discharge. Those defects were proper for consideration as defenses against the writ of scire facias, but they are foreclosed by the final judgment upon it. A scire facias ought to be regarded in some instances as an original action, and in others not such. It might not be where used to revive a judgment, but, where based on a recognizance, it should be so regarded, just as an action of debt on it would be, and a judgment upon it is a finality and res judicata. In fact, whether regarded as an original action or not, it is res judicata. Freeman on Judg. § 448; 19 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 263, 264. The judgment could not be set aside after the term. Crawford v. Fickey, 41 W. Va. 544, 23 S. E. 662.

It is said that the court after judgment had power to remit or release the recognizance by reason of Code 1899, c. 162, § 9, saying, "When, in an action or scire facias on a recognizance, the penalty is adjudged to be forfeited, the court may, on application of a defendant, remit the penalty, or any part of it, and render judgment on such terms and conditions as it deems reasonable." Plainly, this section limits the power of remission to the pendency of the proceeding on the recognizance. The words "in an action or scire facias" show this. The word "is" supports the argument. It is the present tense, not the perfect, "has been." The words "render judgment" make it clear and conclusive. The recaption of Ray, I may add, could not be pleaded after final judgment.

We will reverse the order of release made 27th February, 1904.

FALKNER v. PILCHER & CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

TRIAL—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES—REQUEST—DUTY OF COURT—ISSUES ON COURT'S OWN MOTION.

1. While a party cannot complain because a particular issue was not submitted to the jury unless he tendered it, the issues submitted must in themselves be sufficient to dispose of the controversy and enable the court to proceed to judgment, since in that respect the duty of the court to submit issues is mandatory.

2. Where, at the outset of the trial, the court announced that it would not submit a certain issue, it was not incumbent on the plaintiff to tender the issue nor to offer evidence to support it.

3. On appeal to the superior court from the judgment of a justice, all litigated matters in the action are to be tried de novo.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 31, Cent. Dig. Justices of the Peace, §§ 660-664.]

4. In an action against a nonresident for damages for breach of a contract an attachment was issued and levied on certain corn, and on trial the court submitted no issue save the ownership of the corn. Held, that such issue was merely ancillary to the issue as to liability, and the finding of the jury that defendant did own the corn was not sufficient to authorize the court to enter judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Vance County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by Eugene Falkner against Pilcher & Co. and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Plaintiff sued defendants Pilcher and the American National Bank before a justice of the peace to recover $200 "due for damages for breach of contract in failing to deliver 600 bushels of corn in good condition after payment for same and demanded by plaintiff." The defendants, being nonresidents, were brought into court by publication, and an attachment was issued and levied on another and later shipment of corn. Pilcher did not appear, and judgment by default was rendered against him for $141, with interest and costs. It was further adjudged that Pilcher owned the corn which had been attached, and, it having been sold, the proceeds in the hands of the constable were condemned to the payment of the judgment against him. The bank, who had appeared by attorney, and resisted the suit, appealed from the judgment. At the trial in the superior court the judge ruled that "the ownership of the corn was the sole question for trial," the burden being upon the bank to show its title. Plaintiff excepted. The court, after the testimony had been introduced, submitted this issue: "Was the corn attached the property of the American National Bank?" Plaintiff excepted to this issue upon the ground that it was insufficient to determine the rights of the parties, because, if the jury should find that the bank is the owner of the corn, he would still be entitled to recover damages from the bank for the breach of the contract mentioned in the summons and in the return of the justice. The court declined to submit any other issue, and instructed the jury that the only question for them to consider was the ownership of the corn, and then gave further instructions as to the law upon that issue. Plaintiff in apt time excepted. The jury answered the issue "Yes." A motion by plaintiff for a new trial was overruled, and he again excepted. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appealed.

H. T. Powell and T. M. Pittman, for appellant. T. T. Hicks and A. J. Harris, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). It may be conceded, as a general proposition, that a party cannot complain because a particular issue was not submitted to the jury unless he tendered it; but the rule is subject to this qualification; that the issues submitted must in themselves be sufficient to dispose of the controversy and to enable the court to proceed to judgment, for in that respect the duty of the court to submit issues is mandatory. Tucker v. Satterthwaite, 120 N. C. 118, 27 S. E. 45; Burton v. Mfg. Co., 132 N. C. 17, 43 S. E. 480. It was certainly not incumbent on the plaintiff to tender the issue when the court had already announced at the outset that it would not submit it, nor to offer evidence in support of such an issue. Davidson v. Gifford, 100 N. C. 18, 6 S. E. 718. In this case the plaintiff alleged distinctly in the summons a cause of action against defendant bank as well as one against Pilcher. The justice's return to the court also shows that such a cause of action was alleged, and it further appears therein that the bank denied its liability. So that here was an issue squarely made between the plaintiff and the bank as to the alleged breach of the contract to sell the plaintiff sound corn. The appeal of the bank brought to the superior court for trial not only the issue as to the ownership of the corn, but also the issue as to the bank's liability for a breach of the contract, for the trial was de novo, and therefore embraced all litigated matters pending between the plaintiff and the bank. When the court, in the beginning, refused to submit an issue as to the breach of the contract, the plaintiff excepted; and when the evidence had been introduced, and the court undertook to settle the issues, the plaintiff again excepted to the submission of the single issue as to the ownership of the corn and to the exclusion of any other issue. We have seen that all material issues must be submitted unless waived. Gordon v. Collett, 102 N. C. 532, 9 S. E. 436. How has the plaintiff waived his right to have the issue submitted? At every turn he has insisted upon it. It was surely not necessary to make a formal tender of the issue when the court had positively ruled that it would not submit it. It would have been indecorous to do so. Again, the issues submitted must present the material facts in controversy, and they must, when answered, be sufficient to enable the court to proceed to judgment, and must also support the judgment rendered. Vaughan v. Parker, 112 N. C. 96, 16 S. E. 908; Paper Co. v. Pub. Co., 115 N. C. 147, 20 S. E. 367; Hatcher v. Dabbs, 133 N. C. 239, 45 S. E. 562; Pearce v. Fisher, 133 N. C. 333, 45 S. E. 638. The jury have found that the bank is the owner of the corn, but how can the court, upon this finding, when considered with reference to the case made by the pleadings, proceed to judgment? The issue as to the ownership of the corn was ancillary to the main issue in the case as to liability, and was necessary only to determine whether, if the liability was established, it could be enforced by a condemnation of the corn or its proceeds, the defendant being a nonresident, and the property having been attached in order to give the court jurisdiction, and to secure the payment of any judgment recovered. Fisher v. Ins. Co., 136 N. C. 217, 48 S. E. 667. If the bank is liable to the plaintiff, and is the owner of the corn, the latter can be applied to the satisfaction of that liability. If the bank is liable to the plaintiff, but is not the owner of the corn, the latter, of course, cannot be so applied. The liability is therefore the principal question involved, and the court cannot give judgment upon the verdict as it now stands. It must be supplemented by another finding as to the liability of the bank for a breach of the contract alleged in the pleadings, or, more correctly speaking, in the summons and the return of the justice, and the case will therefore be remanded, with direction to submit an issue or issues presenting that question. The verdict upon the issue as to ownership of the corn will not be disturbed. If the jury find for the plaintiff upon the new issue, he will be entitled to judgment, and to have the corn, or its proceeds, applied to the payment of the amount so found to be due; otherwise the bank will be entitled to the judgment.

Error.

J. L. ROPER LUMBER CO. v. ELIZABETH CITY LUMBER CO.

TRESPASS — STIPULATION AS TO FACTS—EFFECT — REFERENCE BY AGREEMENT — ISSUES — EFFECT OF VERDICT—NOMINAL DAMAGES—COSTS.

1. In an action for trespass on land, the parties prepared issues for submission: "(1) Is the plaintiff the owner of the land described in the complaint, or any part thereof? (2) If so, what part?"—and at the same time stipulated in writing that, "if the jury should answer the first issue 'Yes,' then it is admitted that defendant has trespassed." Held, that the stipulation was binding on the parties, whether the question of trespass was involved in the first issue or not, or whether defendant understood such question to be involved.

2. A party to an action is bound by a stipulation as to facts made by his attorney of record.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 5, Cent. Dig. Attorney and Client, §§ 153-160.]

3. Code 1883, § 398, provides that an issue of fact must be tried by a jury unless a jury is waived or a reference is ordered. Section 416 provides that trial by jury may be waived by the parties to an issue of fact in actions on contract, "and with the assent of the court in other actions." Section 420 provides that, except in certain actions, all or any of the issues "may be referred" on the written consent of the parties. Const. art. 4, § 13, provides that in all issues of fact "the parties may waive the right to have the same determined by a jury." Held that, in an action for trespass on land, the amount of damages cannot be referred for determination by stipulation of the parties without the consent of the court.

4. In an action for trespass on land, counsel agreed that, if the jury should answer the first issue submitted as to title "Yes," then it was admitted that defendant had trespassed, and that the amount of damages should be ascertained by reference. The first issue was whether plaintiff was the owner of the land described in the complaint, or any part thereof, and was answered "Yes." The second was, "If so, what part?" The court, of its own motion, submitted a third issue—as to whether defendant had trespassed on land described in the complaint, and which was inside a certain grant to plaintiff—and this issue was answered "No." Held, that as the agreement must be enforced in so far as it can be reconciled to the verdict, and so much of either be rejected as conflicts with any valid portion of the other, plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages under the agreement; rejecting the clause in the agreement as to a reference, and the finding of the jury on the third issue.

5. Where a judgment is reversed for error to which an exception was duly taken, appellant is entitled to costs on appeal, though he recovers only nominal damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Costs, §§ 900-907.]

Petition for rehearing. Petition allowed on plaintiff's appeal, and dismissed on defendant's appeal. For report of prior opinion, see 47 S. E. 757.

This is a petition to rehear the above-entitled case which was decided at February term, 1904, and is reported in 135 N. C. 744, 47 S. E. 757. The action was brought to recover damages for cutting timber on land which plaintiff alleges was owned by it at the time the trespass was committed by the defendant, and to which it claimed ownership by virtue of a grant to Weeks and Valentine, and mesne conveyances by which it acquired the title so granted and conveyed to them. The defendant, not denying that plaintiff is the owner of whatever land is covered by the Weeks and Valentine grant, denies that the grant includes any part of the land on which it has cut any timber, though it admits that it has cut timber on a tract of land in the lower part of Camden county, which it had a lawful right to cut, as it owned the land. Issues were submitted to the jury, which, with the answers thereto, are as follows: "(1) Is the plaintiff the owner of the land described in the complaint, or any part thereof? Yes. (2) If so, what part? Ans. All the land conveyed to Weeks and Valentine by accurate measurement, except the M. D. Gregory and Joseph Burgess grants. (3) Has the defendant cut timber or committed other acts of trespass on the land described in the complaint, and inside the Weeks and Valentine grant? Ans. No." Before these issues were submitted, the parties, through their counsel, in open court, entered into the following agreement in writing: "In this cause it is agreed that, if the jury should answer the first issue as to title 'Yes,' then it is admitted that defendant has trespassed, and the amount of damages is reserved to be considered by a reference under the Code." This agreement was filed with the papers, and made a part of the roll in the case. After all the evidence was introduced, and after all the speeches had been made, except the last speech on each side, the court decided to submit the third issue, and to restrict the consideration of the jury, under the first issue, to the question of title as conveyed by the grant and deeds under which the plaintiff claimed, and under the third issue to the location of the said grant and deeds. Counsel on both sides had, prior to this ruling, argued the question of the location of the grant and deeds under the first issue, treating it as involved in that issue. The plaintiff objected to the third issue, the objection was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted. Evidence was introduced by the plaintiff tending to show that the grant and deeds covered the locus in quo, and defendant introduced evidence tending to show that they did not. The court charged the jury upon the first issue that the grant and deeds were sufficient to vest the title to the land described in the complaint in the plaintiff, and that, if they believed the evidence, they should answer the first issue "Yes"; that they should not consider the question of location, under that issue, but simply the question of title, as the location should properly be considered under the third issue. As to the third issue, the court charged that, if the plaintiff had located its land by the evidence, the jury would answer the issue "Yes"; otherwise "No." Plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff then insisted that the submission of the third issue, in view of the agreement of counsel, was erroneous, and that the court should instruct the jury to answer that issue "Yes," in accordance with the admission in the agreement. After the return of the verdict the plaintiff moved to strike out the third issue, and the answer thereto, as immaterial, and for judgment declaring the plaintiff to be the owner of the land, as agreed by the jury, and ordering a reference to ascertain the damages. The court refused to order a reference, and entered judgment declaring that the plaintiff was the owner of the land, in accordance with the findings of the jury, and further adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing by its suit, but that defendant go without day, and recover of plaintiff the costs of the action. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Rodman & Rodman, W. M. Bond, and Shepherd & Shepherd, for petitioner. E. F. Aydlett and W. W. Clark, for respondent.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). When this case was before us at a former term, the learned justice who wrote the opinion of the court assumed in the course of the argument that the first issue, as prepared at the time of the agreement of counsel, embraced all the land described in the complaint, and called for a finding of the jury as to whether the plaintiff was the owner of all, and not merely the owner of a part, thereof, and that afterwards the issue was so divided as to require the jury to determine not only whether the plaintiff owned all the land, but, if it did not, whether it owned any part thereof. And so the court thought at the time. It now appears that no change was ever made in the first issue. It is in precisely the same language now as it was when the agreement was made. The erroneous assumption of the court led to the conclusion that the agreement of the counsel had been annulled, as the change in the form and substance of the issue rendered the contingency upon which the admission was to operate impossible. The fact is that, as the agreement and the first issue were drawn, the parties intended, as the law construes their agreement, that, if the jury answered "Yes" to the first issue (that is, if they found that the plaintiff was the owner of the land, or any part thereof), the defendant had trespassed upon the land described in the complaint, and in that event there should be a reference to assess the damages. The court was led into a misapprehension of the true state of the issues, we suppose, by reason of the fact that the second issue required the jury to find what part of the land was owned by the plaintiff, if it owned not all but only a part thereof. But that was one of the issues when the first issue was prepared and when the agreement was drawn, and was intended only to complete and perfect the finding under the first issue, if the jury answered that the plaintiff was the owner only as to a part of the land. It now appears most clearly that the first issue was never so drawn as to be confined to all the land, and require a response only as to the entire tract, but has remained intact from the beginning to this time, and required the jury to find whether the plaintiff was the owner of the land, or any part thereof. The jury answered that issue "Yes," and therefore the agreement between the parties became operative, but, as we will presently see, not in its entirety.

The defendant contends that we should not enforce the agreement, as the parties contemplated at the time that the question of trespass should be tried under the first issue, or, in other words, should be considered as of the substance of that issue, and a material part of it. We cannot so hold. We are not permitted to introduce any new provision into the agreement of the parties without the consent of both, nor can we embody in the issue something that, in law, constitutes no part of it, without a like consent of the parties. We cannot make a contract for the parties, but only construe it as they have themselves made it. Their words must be given their natural and ordinary meaning, and in this case the issue referred to in the agreement must be interpreted according to its plain legal import. How an issue as to ownership can involve the question of a trespass on the land, we are unable to conceive. If the plaintiff is the owner of the land, he has the constructive possession of it, which will support an action of trespass to recover damages for an unlawful invasion of his right, but this does not include the idea that the defendant has made an unlawful entry on the land. Therefore it follows that the question of trespass was not germane to the first issue, and we cannot consider it in passing upon the agreement of the parties. The fact, if conclusively established, that the parties actually intended to try that question under the first issue, would not help the defendant. It is not the understanding, but the agreement, of the parties that controls, unless that understanding is in some way expressed in the agreement. Even if the defendant had clearly shown that it so understood the agreement, it will not do, as the court proceeds not upon the understanding of one of the parties, but upon the agreement of both. No principle is better settled. Brunhild v. Freeman, 77 N. C. 128; Pendleton v. Jones, 82 N. C. 249; Prince v. McRae, 84 N. C. 674; McRae v. Railroad, 88 N. C. 526, 43 Am. Rep. 745; King v. Phillips, 94 N. C. 555. In Bailey v. Rutjes, 86 N. C. 520, it is held that, however reasonably one of the parties to an agreement may be induced to act with reference thereto in a particular way by the conduct of the other, the latter is not bound by such conduct, as evincing the measure of his contractual duty or obligation, unless there is some equitable element or an estoppel involved, which, in law, binds him, by his conduct, to assume that duty or responsibility, as if he had expressly promised to do so. To the like effect is Thomas v. Shooting Club, 121 N. C. 238, 28 S. E. 293. The same idea is differently expressed in Gregory v. Bullock, 120 N. C. 262, 26 N. E. 820, namely, when the terms of an agreement are ascertained, its effect is determined by the law, and does not depend upon the uncertain or undisclosed notion or belief of either party. But the case of Stump v. Long, 84 N. C. 18, would seem to be conclusive against the defendant upon this point. In that case the plaintiff had instituted proceedings supplementary to execution against the defendant. During the course of those proceedings the parties agreed to the appointment of a receiver, and an order by consent appointing a receiver to take charge of defendant's assets, and apply the same to the payment of his debts, was accordingly entered; nothing being said therein about defendant's exemption. He afterwards asked the court to modify the order by providing for his exemptions, upon the ground that his counsel had misunderstood him, and that he did not intend to waive his exemption, and did not believe that he had done so. The court refused the application, and, after holding that the defendant was bound by the act of his attorney, who had implied authority to consent to the order, it proceeded, by Ruffin, J., who wrote the opinion, to say: "We are bound, then, to treat the case as if the petitioner had been actually present and given his assent to the order as drawn. He agreed to it because his attorney did. Can a party, after having given his assent to a judgment or order of the court, be afterwards heard to say that such assent had proceeded from a mistake on his part as to the effect thereof, and for that reason have the same modified? If so, then the court would be making a consent judgment for the parties, not according to the agreement of both, but according to the understanding of one of them. If this was a bill for the correction of a mistake in a deed, the plaintiff could get no relief upon the facts stated in his application, for in such a case one of two things must appear—either that the mistake was that of both the parties, or that of one, with a fraudulent concealment on the part of the other. There is no pretense here of any fraud or mutuality of mistake, and we cannot see why the same principle does not apply." That the parties are bound by the acts of their attorneys of record in making agreements is too well settled to be now disputed. Morris v. Grier, 76 N. C. 410; White v. Morris, 107 N. C. 92, 12 S. E. 80; Stevenson v. Felton, 99 N. C. 58, 5 S. E. 399. Nor are we able to see why the admission of the trespass was made, if the first issue involved that question, because, if it did, an affirmative response by the jury would have determined the mere fact of trespass as certainly as any agreement of the parties could have done, however explicitly it may have been drawn. It was just because an answer to that issue did not, in law, include any such finding, that the defendant made the admission. At least, it so appears to us.

While we are compelled to enforce the agreement, we do not concur with the plaintiff's counsel in his view as to its scope and extent. Parties undoubtedly have the right to make agreements and admissions in the course of judicial proceedings, especially when they are solemnly made and entered into, and are committed to writing, and when, too, they bear directly upon the matters involved in the suit. Such agreements and admissions are of frequent occurrence and of great value, as they dispense with proof and save time in the trial of causes. The courts recognize and enforce them as substitutes for legal proof, and there is no good reason why they should not. "Admissions of attorneys bind their clients in all matters relating to the progress and trial of the cause, and are, in general, conclusive." 1 Greenleaf on Ev. 186. "Unless a clear case of mistake is made out, entitling the party to relief, he is held to the admission, which the court will proceed to act upon, not as the truth in the abstract, but as a formula for the solution of the particular problem before it, namely, the case in judgment, without injury to the general administration of justice." Id. 206; Wharton on Ev. 1184, 1185, 1186. While this is so, the court will not extend the operation of the agreement beyond the limits set by the parties or by the law. The agreement in this case contains two branches: The first is an admission of a fact, to wit, that defendant had trespassed; the second is a stipulation to refer the question of damages. The parties had the right to make the admission, but did they have the right to agree to the reference without the assent of the court thereto? By Code 1883, § 416, it is provided that trial by jury may be waived by the parties to an issue of fact in actions on contract, and, with the assent of the court, in other actions. This section appears under the chapter entitled "Trial by the Court," and that chapter further provides for the trial of the issue by the court when a jury trial is waived. Section 398 provides that an issue of fact must be tried by a jury unless a trial by jury is waived under section 416, or a reference is ordered. Section 420 provides that all or any of the issues, whether of fact or of law, or both, "may be referred," upon the written consent of the parties, except in actions to annul a marriage or for divorce and separation. This section is in the chapter entitled "Trial by Referees." The Constitution (article 4, § 13) provides "that in all issues of fact joined in any court, the parties may waive the right to have the same determined by a jury, in which case the finding of the judge upon the facts shall have the force and effect of a verdict of the jury." We do not think it was intended by this provision that the waiver should operate, proprio vigore, and without the assent of the court, to dispense with a trial by jury. The Constitution confirmed and guaranteed the ancient right of trial by jury, and section 13 of article 4 was intended merely to permit that right to be waived, and to substitute the findings of the judge for the verdict of the jury, with all the force and conclusiveness of the latter. To extend its effect and meaning so as to take away the power and jurisdiction of the court to control its own proceedings, as it had theretofore been accustomed to do, is a construction not required by the exigencies of the case. What is said arguendo in Stevenson v. Felton, 99 N. C. 58, 5 S. E. 399, does not militate against this view, and, if it did, we can easily see that such a question was not at all involved in that decision. In that case the judge who ordered the reference had, of course, assented thereto, and it was not competent, as the court correctly decided, to another judge to set aside the report of the referee upon the ground that the reference was improperly ordered by his predecessor. The Constitution provides only for a trial by the court upon waiver of a jury trial, and says nothing about a reference. Unless restricted by that instrument, as it is not, the Legislature undoubtedly had the right to provide not only that there should be no waiver of trial by jury in actions other than actions on contract, without the assent of the judge, but it could also provide that all references should be with his consent. Any other conclusion would, we think, be contrary to the accepted construction of the Constitution and statute, as indicated by the uniform practice in the courts since their adoption.

While we have not been able to find any case in our own Reports directly bearing upon this question, there are cases which have been decided in the other states, upon substantially similar constitutional and statutory provisions, which sustain the views we have expressed. In Wittenberg v. Onsgard the court thus refers to the subject: "The authorities are generally, if not uniformly, to the effect that the judge may disregard the waiver of a jury by the parties, and, on his own motion, require the issues of fact to be submitted to a jury; that this is a matter addressed to his sound discretion." Citing Burke v. Breazeale, 1 Rob. (La.) 73, and other cases. The court further says: "The authorities seem to be also to the effect that a waiver of jury trial, so long as not yet acted on, may be withdrawn, with the consent of the court, and a trial by jury demanded; at least where the withdrawal will not prejudice the opposite party. All that is decided in State v. Bannock, 53 Minn. 419, 55 N. W. 558, is that the waiver cannot be recalled at will or as a matter of right. The law zealously guards the right of trial by jury. Waivers of the right are always strictly construed, and are not to be lightly inferred or extended by implication. It is reasonably apparent that the waiver of a jury in this case was made only with reference to the exigencies of the then current term of court, and should not be extended so as to apply to a subsequent term. The action of the court in ordering the case to be tried by a jury may be sustained on any of these grounds." 78 Minn. 348, 81 N. W. 16, 47 L. R. A. 141. "The right of trial by jury is deemed a valuable right, and is guaranteed in actions at law by our Constitution. The effect of the above statutes merely is to allow the parties to waive that right, if they should see fit to do so; but they do not extend so far as to oblige the judge to try the issues of fact in a case at law, although requested so to do by both parties, if he should deem it a proper case for trial by a jury. Ordinarily the judge will accede to the wishes of the parties where they waive a jury, and try the issues of fact himself [or, it may be added, will refer the same]; but there may be reasons in the breast of the judge why he should call a jury, although parties may prefer that the issues should be tried by him [or referred]. Whether he will do so seems to be, like many other matters relating to the conduct of civil trials, a question for the exercise of a sound discretion on his part, which exercise of discretion will not be reviewed on appeal, except in manifest cases of abuse. Not only is there no abuse of discretion apparent in this case, but, as the question is here presented, the very statement of it seems to suggest its answer. What more is it then, than the case of one party to an action at law objecting that the facts were tried and ascertained in the usual mode pointed out by the Constitution and the laws?" McCarthy v. Railroad, 15 Mo. App. 388. "The court, however, has the right, notwithstanding such waiver, to direct an issue of fact to be tried by a jury. Besides this, it would not be presumed that any injury had accrued to the plaintiff in consequence of the issues of fact being tried by a jury instead of by the court. [Citing Doll v. Anderson, 27 Cal. 249.] The action there, as in the case at bar, was upon a contract." Bullock v. Lumber Co. (Cal.) 31 Pac. 367. Even if it were not for these authorities, and for what we conceive to be the reasonable construction of the Constitution and statute, we would still be reluctant to hold that it was intended to deprive the trial court of a function so essential to its efficiency, and so important in every well-regulated system of judicial procedure, unless compelled to do so by the expression of that intention in a clear and unmistakable manner.

Having reached the conclusion that the court had the power to submit the third issue notwithstanding the agreement of counsel, it only remains to be considered what effect that issue and the response of the jury there-to have upon the result. The agreement admitted the fact of a trespass, and to this extent it is valid and effective, and the court could not in any way disregard it. The issue directs the jury to inquire not only whether the defendant had cut any timber on the land described in the complaint, inside the Weeks and Valentine grant, which was the particular trespass alleged, but whether defendant had committed any other acts of trespass. The finding of the jury, so far as it is responsive to the last branch of the issue, is in direct conflict with the agreement of the parties as to the technical trespass, and must be disregarded; but the finding that there had been no substantial trespass upon the land is not at variance with any valid stipulation of that agreement, and it must stand, and receive from us its proper weight in the determination of the case. The agreement ascertains only that there has been a trespass; that is, a technical violation of the plaintiff's right, or a simple invasion of his possession. Nothing else appearing, this would entitle plaintiff to nominal damages only, and, as the finding of the jury excludes the existence of actual damages, the recovery must be confined to that compensation which the law gives for the technical wrong, or, in other words, to nominal damages. Chaffin v. Mfg. Co., 135 N. C. 95, 47 S. E. 226; s. c., on rehearing, 136 N. C. 364, 48 S. E. 770. While we will enforce the agreement, it must be done only to the extent that it does not interfere with the legitimate powers of the court; and, as the court submitted the issue in the rightful exercise of its authority or jurisdiction, we must reconcile the verdict upon the third issue and the agreement, if it can be done, and reject so much of either as conflicts with any valid portion of the other, and in doing so the result is that plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for nominal damages by virtue of the agreement and non obstante veredicto—both the clause in the agreement as to the reference, and the finding of the jury that not even a technical trespass had been committed, being rejected. Harris v. Sneed, 104 N. C. 369, 10 S. E. 477.

We do not agree with counsel in the contention that the jury have found by their answer to the first issue that plaintiff is the owner of the land on which the timber was cut. Defendant says in its answer that it has cut no timber on the land described in the complaint, and the jury have so found. The plaintiff must have shown, even if there had been a reference, that the cutting of timber was done on its land, as described in the complaint, in order to recover actual damages. The agreement goes no further than to admit a technical trespass. There may have been such a trespass on the lands described in the complaint, and yet not a tree have been cut, or other substantial injury done on the land. Because the defendant is admitted to have trespassed upon the lands described in the complaint, it does not follow, therefore, that those are the same lands upon which defendant cut the timber. Indeed, the verdict would seem to show that no trespass at all was committed; but we are bound by the admission to hold that there was a trespass, though there was none in fact, or at least a technical though not a substantial trespass. Harris v. Sneed, supra.

The former decision is modified in accordance with this opinion, and judgment will be entered in the court below in favor of the plaintiff for a penny and the costs. As there was, in contemplation of law, substantial error in the judgment of the lower court, to which exception was duly taken, the plaintiff is also entitled to costs in this court, although it does not recover more than nominal damages.

Petition allowed.

Defendant's Appeal.

The plaintiff has also asked us to rehear the decision in this appeal, though no separate petition has been filed, as should have been done. From an examination of the record and the former opinion, it appears that two points only were made and considered by the court, namely: (1) Is the act of 1889, p. 256, c. 243, § 3, amending section 2522 of the Code, constitutional? This involved the question whether the Legislature could by said act declare a forfeiture of land to the state, and vest title to the same in the board of education, for failure to list and pay the taxes properly assessable against it, without provision for some judicial inquiry before condemnation or forfeiture. We decided then (135 N. C. 742, 47 S. E. 757), as we had before in Parish v. Cedar Co., 133 N. C. 478, 45 S. E. 768, after an able and exhaustive discussion of the subject by Douglas, J., for the court, that no such power existed, as it would be a violation not only of the natural but of the constitutional right of a citizen to take his property without notice, hearing, or judgment. We adhere to the decision, which by the way, was in favor of the plaintiff; and we take it that he does not intend to except to that ruling, but to the one we are now about to consider.

We further decided that it was error to include in the judgment a declaration, although pursuing the language of the verdict upon the first and second issues, to the effect that the plaintiff is the owner of the land inside the Weeks and Valentine patent, not including any part of the land described in the Gregory and Burgess grants, because this is not an action for the recovery of real property (ejectment), but solely for the recovery of damages for an unlawful entry upon the land described in the complaint (trespass). The issue as framed was not appropriate to an action of trespass, which should be, substantially, did defendant trespass upon the land of the plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint? And this, coupled with an issue as to the damages, is quite sufficient to present the matter in dispute. Proof of title may be competent under the first of those issues, but an inquiry as to the title is no part of the issue itself. The form of the issue, though, worked no harm to the plaintiff, as the answer of the jury merely ascertained that, being the owner, the plaintiff was entitled constructively to the possession which will support trespass for any injury to the close. But the fact so found by the jury was not proper to be stated in the judgment, and it was ordered by this court to be stricken out. We do not now see any error in this ruling. The plaintiff's recovery must be limited to nominal damages for the admitted technical trespass and the costs, as we have held in the plaintiff's appeal, and this is all that should be stated in the judgment.

There is no other ruling of the court below, as far as appears in the defendant's appeal, which prejudiced the plaintiff, or to which he is entitled to take exception. This dismisses his petition.

Petition dismissed.

HOKE, J. (concurring). I do not understand the proceedings in the court below in the same way as stated in the opinion of the court, nor put exactly the same interpretation upon them. The parties litigant had a right to make the agreement set out in the case, and the court was required to accept it. But in my judgment, there is nothing to indicate that the agreement has been disregarded, for the reason that, by the finding of the jury, the agreement never came into effect. As the issues were originally drawn, the first two were addressed to the question of title, and, on the pleadings, there were two additional issues—one to the question of trespass, and one to the amount of damages. There were two elements in this question of title: (1) That the claimant should connect himself with the state grant by valid and proper deeds; (2) that the claimant should locate the deeds so as to cover the land in controversy. Instead of submitting these two elements of title in the issues as framed, his honor had the second element determined by the jury on a third issue framed by himself. This was, no doubt, done because the court thought the evidence addressed to the question of location could be more clearly presented by a charge on the issues as framed by him. The issue was unfortunately worded, because in its terms the same is in apparent conflict with the agreement of the parties. But it is not really so. The true interpretation of the agreement was simply to this effect: That, if the parties plaintiff could show title covering the land in controversy, then the defendant admitted the physical act of trespass, and the question of amount should be referred. The verdict on the issues determined that, while the plaintiff had a line of deeds connecting him with the Weeks and Valentine grant, he had not been able to locate either the grant or the deeds, and therefore had shown no title covering the locus in quo. The facts stated in the case on appeal and the charge of the court show clearly that on the third issue the parties debated the question of location, and the jury determined that the plaintiff had failed to locate any land. Note the charge of the judge on the issues: (1) That upon the first issue they were to consider only whether the plaintiff had title to the Weeks and Valentine grant, and he further charged that the grant and the deeds introduced by the plaintiff were sufficient to pass that title, and if they believed the grantors in the deed to the plaintiff were the heirs of Jacob Valentine—and, if they believed the evidence, they were—then it was their duty to answer the first issue "Yes." (2) That they were not to take into consideration, in answering the first issue, the location of the grant, but it was only a question whether or not the plaintiff had the title to the land of the Weeks and Valentine grant, without reference to the fact whether or not it could be located; that, under the issues as now submitted by the court to the jury, the question of title simply arose under the first issue, as to the land described in the complaint; that its location was to be considered by the jury in passing upon the third issue. (3) The court charged the jury upon the third issue, among other things, that, when they came to consider the same, they would consider whether or not the plaintiff had located its land; that, if they find from the evidence that the land was not located, they would answer it "No"; if they find the plaintiff had located it, then they would answer it "Yes." Under the charge the jury answered the third issue "No." This shows that on the third issue the jury passed upon the question of location, and determined that the plaintiff had shown no title covering the land. The agreement, which was simply as to acts of physical trespass, in case this was done, never came into operation. I think that, on the verdict, the judgment should simply be that the defendant go without day and recover costs. Inasmuch, however, as the judgment of the court substantially carries out the results of the trial as understood and contemplated by the parties, I concur in the decision as made.

HANCOCK v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

TELEGRAMS—FAILURE TO DELIVER—LAWS GOVERNING CONTRACT—QUESTION FOR JURY—MENTAL ANGUISH—EVIDENCE OF DAMAGES.

1. Where a telegram is delivered to the company in one state to be transmitted to another state, the validity and interpretation of the contract of transmission and delivery, as well as the measure of damages for its breach, are to be determined by the laws of the former state.

2. The testimony as to the law of another state, consisting of the deposition of an attorney as to what he believed it to be, is to be passed on by the jury as to its credibility and value.

3. Mere "disappointment and regret" is not the "mental anguish" for which damages may be recovered, but the latter is a high degree of mental suffering.

4. The mental anguish naturally arising from the loss of a relative is no part of the mental anguish for which recovery may be had of a telegraph company for its negligence in transmission and delivery of a telegram announcing the death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Telegraphs and Telephones, §§ 64, 69, 70.]

5. In an action for mental anguish for failure to deliver a telegram sent by plaintiff to his father announcing his coming with the body of his brother, the contention being that, if it had been delivered, his father would have met him promptly, and all preparations would have been made, so that the interment would have taken place seven hours earlier than it did, plaintiff must prove that the father could and would, had the telegram been properly delivered, have met him promptly and had the necessary arrangements made, avoiding the delay, there being no presumption that he could have done these things.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Council, Judge.

Action by H. S. Hancock against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Civil action for damages on account of mental anguish. The court submitted the following issues: "(1) Did the defendant negligently fail to transmit and promptly deliver plaintiff's telegram as alleged in the complaint? Ans. Yes. (2) What damages has plaintiff sustained by reason of defendant's nondelivery of such telegram? Ans. $300." The defendant appealed from the judgment.

F. H. Busbee & Son and W. W. Clark, for appellant. W. D. McIver, for appellee.

BROWN, J. We gather from the record these facts: The plaintiff and his brother resided in North Carolina, and their father, S. M. Hancock, at New Church, Va. The family burial ground is Goodwill Cemetery, in Maryland, 8 or 10 miles from the father's home. Its nearest depot is Pocomoke City, Md., $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles away. New Church and Pocomoke City are about 11 or 12 miles distant. On Saturday, July 11, 1903, the plaintiff was at Johns Hopkins Hospital, with his brother, Thomas, and his wife. Thomas had gone there for an operation, under which he died. At the defendant's office in the hospital, about 6 p. m. Saturday, the plaintiff filed a telegram as follows: "S. M. Hancock, New Church, Thomas dead. Will arrive at Pocomoke 3 a. m. H. S. Hancock." This telegram was not delivered until Monday, 13th. There being no earlier train, the plaintiff, with his brother's body, and the widow, arrived at Pocomoke City Monday morning a half hour late, at 4 o'clock. A storm prevailed, which prevented the plaintiff leaving the train until 6:30 a. m. There was no one to meet him, and no preparation had been made for the burial. The plaintiff again telegraphed by the Postal Company to his father, who arrived between 9 and 10 a. m. Preparations were made, and the interment took place about 5 p. m.

1. The contract in this case was made in Maryland, and the contracting parties are presumed in law to have had in contemplation only such damages arising from the breach of it as could be awarded under the law of Maryland at the date of the telegram.

In this case the sender was in Maryland at the time he filed his telegram. The sendee was in Virginia. The defendant, we judge by depositions in the record, was under the belief that the law of Virginia in some way affects this contract. The law of Virginia has no relation to it. If a telegraphic message is delivered to the company in one state to be transmitted by it to a place in another state, the validity and interpretation of the contract, as well as the rule measuring the damages arising upon a breach and the company's liability therefor, are to be determined by the laws of the former state, where the contract originated. Bryan v. Tel. Co., 133 N. C. 607, 45 S. E. 938, citing Reed v. Tel. Co. (Mo.) 37 S. W. 904, 34 L. R. A. 492, 58 Am. St. Rep. 609. If, under the law of Maryland, as interpreted and expounded by its highest court, damages on account of mental anguish, not connected with or growing out of a physical injury to the plaintiff's person, could not be awarded, then the plaintiff in this action can recover only the costs of the telegram and costs. Where, as on the trial had in this case, the defendant relied upon the testimony of an attorney at law in Maryland, who testified by deposition as to what he believed the law of that state to be, the court very properly submitted to the jury the testimony to be passed on by them as to its credibility and value. If the jury render a verdict in any case contrary to the clear weight of the evidence, the remedy is, and it is the duty of the trial judge, to set it aside; but we cannot ordinarily review the exercise of such power. Possibly the jury were not satisfied from the deposition of the attorney (Mr. Cross) as to what is the law of Maryland. The defendant will have an opportunity on the next trial to further enlighten the court and jury more specifically upon the law as to the proper measure of damages for mental anguish as it is administered in Maryland.

2. The judge, among other things, charged the jury that: "Upon the question of damages, the message upon its face disclosing its urgency and relating to death, the defendant had notice that a failure to deliver might reasonably cause mental anguish to the sender; and in such case the damages for mental anguish are such damages as the jury shall find the plaintiff has suffered from disappointment and regret occasioned by the fault or neglect of the company in its failure to notify the sendee, in order that preparations and arrangements might be made for the reception and interment of the body." The court erred in using the words "disappointment and regret." There is a very material difference between the significance of those words and that keen and poignant mental suffering signified by the words "mental anguish." The right to recover damages for purely mental anguish not connected with or growing out of a physical injury is the settled law of this state, and it is too late now to question it. Our authorities are up to this time uniform and unanimous as to the general doctrine. Differences, of course, arise as to its application in particular cases. Young v. Tel. Co., 107 N. C. 370, 11 S. E. 1044, 9 L. R. A. 689, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883, to Hunter v. Tel. Co., 135 N. C. 459, 47 S. E. 745. The language used in nearly all the cases in this and other states where such damages are allowed is "grief and mental anguish." We do not find anywhere that damages are allowed for "disappointment and regret." The lexicographers define anguish to be "intense pain of body or mind." It is derived from the Latin words "angula," a snake, referring to the writhing or twisting of the animal body when in great pain. Stornmouth's Dict. Mr. Justice Douglas, speaking for the court, said: "We use the word 'anguish' as indicating a high degree of mental suffering, without which the plaintiff could not recover substantial damages. Mere disappointment would not amount to mental anguish, or entitle the plaintiff to more than nominal damages." Hunter's Case, 135 N. C. 459, 47 S. E. 745. The addition of the word "regret" by his honor does not help the matter. Regret indicates no greater degree of mental suffering than does disappointment. Both are of very frequent occurrence in the lives of most men, and with some scarcely disturb their mental poise. In this connection we desire to supplement what was said by Judge Douglas in Hunter's Case as to what particular mental anguish is to be considered by the jury in awarding damages. Jurors may possibly confound the mental anguish naturally arising from the loss of a near relative with that which grows out of the defendant's negligence. The jury have no right to consider anything except the latter in awarding damages. We commend to the careful consideration of the superior court judges the language of the opinion in the Hunter Case upon that subject, and that they explain the law in reference thereto with great care to the juries, whether requested to do so or not, lest injustice be done the defendant by confounding the natural grief at the loss of a near kinsman with that anguish which is claimed to result from the negligence of telegraph companies.

3. The judge charged the jury that they might consider the failure of the father to arrange for the interment of the deceased, if they should find from the evidence that such arrangements would naturally be presumed to have been made by the sendee if the telegram had been delivered prior to the arrival of the train on Monday. It is plain that the plaintiff has no cause for complaint that his father did not meet the 3 a. m. train Sunday, for the plaintiff did not arrive until Monday at 4 a. m. The only contention the plaintiff makes is that, if the telegram had been delivered with reasonable promptness, his father would have met him promptly on Monday morning, and would have had all arrangements made for the interment, so that it would not have been delayed from about 10 a. m. until 5 p. m. Monday, in consequence of which delay the plaintiff avers he suffered great mental anguish, and claims damages on that account. The plaintiff must therefore prove that his father could and would have met him promptly on Monday morning on arrival of the train at 4 o'clock, and that he could and would have made on Sunday, or prior to the plaintiff's arrival, all necessary arrangements for the prompt interment of his brother's body on Monday morning, and avoided the delay in the obsequies from 10 a. m. until 5 p. m., thereby saving the plaintiff from the pangs of mental anguish which he avers he endured. The law does not presume that the father could have done these things. Many contingencies, such as illness, absence from home, inability to get the work done on Sunday, may have prevented, however willing the father may have been to discharge such a parental duty. There was no evidence tending to prove such facts, and the jury had no right to presume them. In Bright's Case, 182 N. C. 326, 43 S. E. 844, Justice Walker says, referring to defendant's objection to the testimony of Cooper, the addressee, that he would have gone to Wilkesboro had he received the telegram, that the testimony was not only competent, but indispensable; and uses the following language: "We are unable to understand why this is not competent. It tended to prove the very fact which the defendant, in the last exception considered by us, asserted it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove in order to recover substantial damages; and it was necessary to prove this fact if the plaintiff sought, as she did by her complaint and evidence, to recover damages for the mental anguish which resulted from his failure to go to Wilkesboro."

As there is to be a new trial, it is unnecessary to consider the defendant's further exceptions. They relate to alleged errors that may not again occur.

New trial.

H. G. WILLIAMS & CO. v. HARRIS, Sheriff.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ABSTRACT PROPOSITIONS—EXCEPTIONS.

1. It is error to charge an abstract proposition of law not supported by any view of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 698-612.]

2. Under Code, § 550, providing that an appellant, within 10 days after judgment, shall prepare a concise statement of the case embodying the instructions, if there be an exception thereto, and Sup. Ct. Rule 27 (Clark's Code, p. 920), providing that appellant shall file his exceptions in the clerk's office within 10 days after the end of the term at which judgment is rendered, an error upon the face of a charge may be availed of by an exception entered within 10 days after adjournment for the term, and is only waived by failing to enter such an exception within that time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Moore, Judge.

Action by H. G. Williams & Co. against J. R. Harris. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Bunn & Bunn and F. S. Spruill, for appellants. Gilliam & Bassett, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action to recover one barrel of whisky. The evidence was that the plaintiffs shipped the barrel of whisky to one Cuthrell without any order from him, and without his knowledge; that he wrote plaintiffs at once that he had not ordered it, and would not receive it, but had taken it out of depot to save storage charges against plaintiffs, paying freight on it for them (which they paid back); that it was subject to their order, though, if they chose to let it stay till he should want it for use, he would take it, but could not use it at that time. To this plaintiffs assented by letter. Cuthrell never included the whisky in any settlement with plaintiffs, and on an execution against him declined to allow this barrel to be included in the allotment of his exemption, because not his property. The defendant is the sheriff who seized the property under execution against Cuthrell. The only issue found was whether the plaintiffs were the owners of the whisky, to which the jury responded "No." The court charged the jury that upon the evidence Cuthrell did not order the whisky, and that plaintiff's reply to Cuthrell's letter did not constitute a sale; but added that invoicing the whisky to Cuthrell was an offer to sell, and "if Cuthrell, in receiving it from the common carrier, and taking it into his possession, did so with the intention of accepting the offer thus made, this amounted to an acceptance, and vested title to the whisky in Cuthrell." This was excepted to. This instruction was unsupported by the evidence, which was uncontradicted that Cuthrell had then no such intention. Upon the question whether the subsequent offer by Cuthrell to hold the whisky till he should have use for it did not constitute a conditional sale, the court charged that the plaintiffs' reply was not sufficient to constitute such sale, and the defendant is not appealing.

It was error in the judge to give to the jury an abstract proposition of law not supported by any view of the evidence. Brown's Heirs v. Patton's Heirs, 35 N. C. 446; King v. Wells, 94 N. C. 344. It has been uniformly held by this court that a failure to instruct the jury that there is no evidence (cases cited in Clark's Code [3d Ed.] p. 511), or, indeed, an omission or failure to give any proper instruction, is waived unless there is a prayer for such instruction (Clark's Code [3d Ed.] p. 514, and numerous cases cited). But none the less, if there is an error in the instructions given, an exception thereto is valid if entered within 10 days after adjournment for the term. Code, § 550. An error upon the face of the charge (unlike a mere failure to charge, which is waived by not requesting an instruction) is only waived by not entering an exception thereto in the time allowed by law. Rule 27; Clark's Code (3d Ed.) pp. 512, 513, 777, 778, 920; Code, § 550. The instruction here given of a proposition of law without any evidence to support it (King v. Wells, 94 N. C. 344) was duly excepted to, and was error.

KING et al. v. BYNUM et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

JUDICIAL SALE—INFLUENCE ON BIDDERS—HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

In a suit to hold the persons in whose name land was bought at a sale to pay the debts of testator, as trustees for all the persons to whom it was devised, it being claimed that the person who bid it off had agreed with his mother to buy it for the benefit of all of them, and that, because this agreement was known at the sale, no one else bid, testimony of a witness that the reason the land, which he said was worth $2,500, brought only $800 at the sale, was that it was understood the mother was to buy the land for the children, and people did not want to bid against her—"at least, several told me so"—is hearsay, in that it refers to what was told him after the sale; he having previously testified that he did not know whether there was any general understanding among persons present at the sale for whom it was to be bid in, or whether it was talked or understood among such persons that the land was to be bought for all the devisees, or whether that was the reason the land did not sell for more.

Connor, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Council, Judge.

Action by T. B. King and others against A. S. J. Bynum and another. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Jarvis & Blow, for appellants. Skinner & Whedbee and Moore & Fleming, for appellees.

BROWN, J. Although the record in this case is voluminous, and the exceptions many, a brief statement only is necessary to a proper understanding of the exceptions of the defendants sustained by this court, in consequence of which a new trial is made necessary: R. A. Bynum, deceased, by his will devised the land described in the pleadings to the plaintiffs and defendants as tenants in common owning equal interests therein. The executor of R. A. Bynum, to wit, J. N. Bynum, instituted a special proceeding to sell this and other tracts of land belonging to the testator's estate to pay debts. At the sale made in pursuance of the decree in said proceeding, the defendant A. S. J. Bynum, called Zeb Bynum, purchased the tract of land described in the complaint, known as the "Askew Land," for $800, and had it set down to himself and his brother and codefendant, Ben Bynum. They paid the purchase money, and a deed was made to them by the executor. The feme plaintiffs, Mary King and Priscilla Turnage, bring this suit to convert said defendants into trustees for their benefit in respect to one undivided fourth, each, of the land. The plaintiffs allege that they are tenants in common with the defendants; that the land was sold to pay the assessment agreed upon as necessary to liquidate the testator's debts; that the feme plaintiffs were minors, and their mother was their general guardian; that she was aged and infirm, and relied solely on Zeb Bynum, her son, to attend to her business affairs; that Zeb Bynum attended to the proceeding to sell the land, and represented the interests of the plaintiffs; that he agreed that this Askew land should be assessed at $800, and agreed with his mother to buy it in for the benefit of all the owners thereof. The plaintiffs further alleged that it was known at the sale that the land was to be bid off for the mother by Zeb, and in consequence no one bid, and Zeb secured the land at $800—worth $2,500. Upon the trial the court below submitted two issues, one of which is: "(1) Did the defendants purchase the land described in the complaint for the joint use and benefit of themselves and the plaintiffs, their co-tenants, as alleged in the complaint?" Upon the trial of that issue much evidence was introduced.

We do not deem it necessary to consider the many interesting questions argued, or to pass upon all the exceptions in the record. As a new trial is to be had, they may not again arise.

There is one exception in the record which we feel compelled to sustain. That relates to the erroneous admission of evidence, and the error is of sufficient importance to justify another trial. (Exception 7.) P. J. Bynum testified for the plaintiffs that he was at the sale, and that "he did not know whether there was any general understanding among bystanders present as to who was bidding for the land, for whom it was to be bid in, and to whom it was cried off." In response to another question he again stated that he did not know "whether it was talked or understood among those present at the sale that the land was to be bought for all the children of J. P. Bynum [meaning the plaintiffs and defendants], and did not know that was the reason the land did not bring a larger price at the sale." This witness was then asked by the plaintiffs "why was it that the land you say was worth $2,500 did not bring but $800 at the sale?" The witness answered: "The reason was that it was understood my mother was going to buy the land for the children, and people did not want to bid against her; at least, several told me so."

The question and answer were both objected to in apt time by the defendants, and their objections were overruled, and they excepted. In the admission of this evidence we are of opinion there is reversible error; the evidence being both incompetent, very material, and well calculated to influence the jury in a manner prejudicial to the defendants. The objection to the evidence is that it is hearsay. We are of opinion that the evidence comes clearly within the rule prohibiting hearsay evidence, and that it is hearsay of a vague and indefinite character. The evidence of a person present at the sale as to what was done at the time of the sale, and as to the general understanding prevailing among the bidders and bystanders, tending to explain why the land sold for so small a price, is competent. We do not mean to hold otherwise. This witness does not pretend to testify to that. He states he was at the sale, but from his answers to the questions asked him, it is plain he did not undertake to testify to what occurred there. In response to questions by the plaintiffs for the purpose of eliciting such information, he stated he did not know. He was permitted, over the objection of the defendants, to state that several persons told him why it was the land sold for so little, viz., because it was understood the mother was to buy the land for the children. From the entire testimony of this witness, we are bound to conclude he referred to what "several persons" told him after the sale. This is evidently hearsay; the words not implying personal knowledge of the facts, but merely information derived from others. Snodgrass v. Caldwell, 90 Ala. 323, 7 South. 834. It is not under oath, not subject to cross-examination, not a part or res gestæ, and not in presence of the defendants, and could not be corroborative. The witness does not even give the names of those "several persons" who told him. "Evidence, oral or written, is called 'hearsay' when its probative force depends in whole or in part upon the competency and credibility of some person other than the witness by whom it is sought to produce it." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. 520, and cases cited; Coleman v. Southwick, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 45, 6 Am. Dec. 253; State v. Haynes, 71 N. C. 79. There are exceptions to this general rule excluding hearsay evidence laid down in the text-writers on Evidence, such as admissions, confessions, dying declarations, declarations against interest, ancient documents, declarations concerning matters of public interest, matters of pedigree, and the res gestæ. The most ingenious mind can hardly bring the testimony pointed out within any recognized exception to the general rule excluding hearsay evidence. 1 Greenleaf, Ev. Ch. 6 (13th Ed.) gives the recognized exceptions to the general rule. The case of Cheek v. Watson, 85 N. C. 196, is relied upon by the plaintiffs. The distinction is very apparent. In that case Chief Justice Smith says: "It would seem this general impression controlling the conduct of bidders was susceptible of proof as a fact in the case. * * * If the offer was to ascertain from the opinion of one witness the opinion of others, it was properly refused." "If the purpose was to prove as a fact the influence operating on a large number of others, which restrained the brother-in-law from participating in the sale, it was certainly competent evidence in charging the estate thus acquired with a trust." This authority is well sustained by Judge Gaston's opinion in Neely v. Torian, 21 N. C. 410. The witness Bynum did not testify to what was the general understanding at the sale, as a fact. Under the high authority quoted, that would have been competent, had he known of his own knowledge gathered at the sale. He had already stated twice that he did not know what that general understanding was, and it was in response to the repeated questions of the plaintiffs' counsel that he stated finally why the land brought so little, and qualified what he said with the words, "At least, several persons told me so." This falls far short of proving as a fact within his own knowledge, gathered at the sale, what that general understanding was. To constitute reversible error, the evidence admitted must not only be incompetent, but it must be prejudicial and calculated to influence the minds of the jury against the appellant. In our view, the testimony was highly prejudicial to the defendants. The chief contention of the plaintiffs (in fact, before the jury, doubtless their strongest plea) was that the land was bought in by the defendants at a third of its value because the bystanders believed it was being purchased for the mother and the young girls, as well as for the defendants themselves, and therefore no one would bid. The hearsay evidence improperly admitted was well calculated to sustain this plea, and to greatly influence the minds of the jurors.

It is unnecessary to notice the other exceptions. They refer to alleged errors which may not arise on another trial. We deem it proper, however, to observe that the first issue is rather indefinite in form, and, while we do not formulate the issue, we suggest that the first issue tendered by the defendants more nearly presents the issue raised by the pleadings, but this is not intended to preclude the submission of others. The second issue is correct. While the plaintiffs in an action of ejectment would be confined to three years' rents and profits preceding suit, in this action it is necessary to ascertain the entire rents and profits. They can be charged off against the purchase money and betterments in case the plaintiffs shall finally succeed, if such claim is made by the defendants.

For the error pointed out, there must be a new trial.

DISOSWAY v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

BONDS—ACTION—ISSUES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on a bond given by the seller of a business to the purchaser, conditioned that defendant would not engage in the business in the town within a specified time, the first issue was whether the bond was an agreement to pay stipulated damages, and not a penalty, and the court charged that the question for the jury was whether the contract to pay stipulated damages, "the language of which is the substance of the bond entered into between the parties," was entered into at the time of the sale to plaintiff. Held, that the charge was erroneous, it being necessary that it appear that the sum named in the bond was for stipulated damages, and not a penalty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Council, Judge.

Action by Mark Disosway against A. M. Edwards. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. D. McIver, for appellant.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant sold out his liquor business in New Bern to the plaintiff, and stipulated that he would not engage in said business in the limits of said town for the space of 20 years. He executed his bond in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that, if he should violate that stipulation, "then this bond to be in full force and effect; * * * otherwise to be null and void." The first issue was whether such bond was, in substance, an agreement to "pay the plaintiff the sum of one thousand dollars as stipulated damages for the breach" of such stipulation. The court charged that the question for the jury was whether such contract (to pay stipulated damages), "the language of which is the substance of the bond entered into between the parties," was entered into at the time of the contract of sale made by the defendant to the plaintiff; that is, whether it was part of the trade and understanding between the parties. This was error. It was not merely essential that such contract should be made as a part of the contract of sale, but it must appear that the $1,000 was for stipulated damages, and not a penalty. When the case was here before (134 N. C. 254, 46 S. E. 501) the court pointed out that the $1,000 bond did not state that it was intended to cover stipulated damages; that the presumption was that it was a penalty, and this could be overcome only by evidence. And in Wheedon v. Am. Bond. & Trust Co., 128 N. C. 60, 38 S. E. 255, it was held that, even if it had stated that it was for "liquidated damages," it would not be conclusive, but the true intention of the parties must be ascertained, whether in truth the sum stated was not in fact a penalty against which the courts would relieve upon ascertainment of the true damages. It is true the second issue left it to the jury to determine whether stipulated damages were intended, but the judge on the first issue had already told them that was the purport of the bond. There are other exceptions, but it is not necessary to discuss them.

Error.

CARRAWAY et al. v. STANCILL et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

ACTION TO RECOVER REAL ESTATE—BOND REQUIRED OF DEFENDANT—FAILURE TO FILE BOND—JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT.

1. Clark's Code, § 390, provides that, in all actions for the recovery of real property, if defendant fails to file a bond conditioned for the payment to plaintiff of all costs and damages, including loss of rents and profits, plaintiff shall have judgment for the relief demanded in the complaint, unless defendant is excused from giving the bond before answer. Held, that where, in an action for the recovery of real estate, defendant in possession gave the bond, plaintiff properly asked no judgment against him.

2. The bond may be increased, in the discretion of the court, if defendant shows a disposition to delay the trial.

3. Where, in an action for the recovery of real estate, certain defendants are not in possession, their failure to file a bond under Clark's Code, § 390, is no ground for a judgment against them.

4. After foreclosure of a mortgage by the executor of the mortgagee, and sale under the judgment, the sole devisee and legatee of all the estate of the mortgagee, who claimed she had not been a party to the foreclosure, and the administrator de bonis non of the mortgagee, sued to recover the land, and damages for waste, as against the purchaser at mortgage sale, and to recover the mortgage debt and for foreclosure as against the administrator and heirs at law of the mortgagor. The purchaser, who was in possession, claimed that the purchase money paid by him had been applied to the mortgage, and that the plaintiff, legatee and devisee, had received the benefit of it. Defendants other than the purchaser filed no answer or bond under Clark's Code, § 390. Held, that a motion by plaintiffs for judgment against the purchaser for recovery of the land, and as against the others for judgment by default and for foreclosure, was properly denied, as an injustice to the purchaser, and as a judicial sale of the land before settling of the title would be a cloud on the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Council, Judge.

Suit by G. W. Carraway and others against G. A. Stancill and others. From an order denying a motion for judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. M. Lindsay, for appellants. Moore & Fleming, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The plaintiffs moved the court, in writing, for judgment, under section 390 of Clark's Code, "for the failure of the defendants to file a bond required by law for defendants in actions to recover land; as against G. A. Stancill, for recovery of the land described in the complaint, without damages; and, as against all of the defendants except G. A. Stancill, for judgment by default final for the debt set out in the complaint, and for foreclosure of the mortgage set out in the complaint, upon the ground that the defendants other than G. A. Stancill have been duly made parties and served with process, and the plaintiffs having filed their verified complaint, and the defendants having failed to appear either in person or by attorney, and having failed to file any bond or answer or demurrer." The court permitted the defendant Stancill, who is solely in possession of the land, to file the bond required. The motion was denied by his honor, and, as he states in the order, in his discretion. Plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Notwithstanding the able and well-considered argument of Mr. Lindsay for the plaintiffs, we have no difficulty in reaching a conclusion that the court below committed no error.

It appears from the pleadings that on February 5, 1878, B. S. Atkinson executed a deed of mortgage to his mother, S. V. Whitehead, for $19,200, with interest at 8 per cent. from date. Atkinson died intestate in 1884, and the defendant S. V. Joyner qualified as his administrator, and the other defendants (except G. A. Stancill) are his widow and heirs at law. His estate has never been settled. Prior to her death, which occurred in December, 1895, S. V. Whitehead instituted an action to foreclose said mortgage against the widow and heirs at law of Atkinson, which action was pending at her death. She made a will in which she devised and bequeathed to her granddaughter Inez B. Carraway (née Atkinson) one of the plaintiffs, all of her property, real, personal, and mixed, and appointed R. L. Davis her executor. He proved the will, and made himself a party to the action to foreclose the mortgage, and at November or December term, 1897, of Pitt superior court, a consent judgment was rendered. The plaintiff Inez B. Carraway, sole devisee and legatee for life under said will, claims that she was not made a party to the action. The judgment provided for a sale by a commissioner of the land conveyed by the mortgage. The sale was made by the commissioner, and the defendant G. A. Stancill became the purchaser. The sale was reported and confirmed, and Stancill went into possession, and is still in sole possession. This action is brought by G. W. Carraway and wife, Inez, Geo. M. Lindsay, administrator d. b. n., c. t. a., of S. V. Whitehead, to recover the land, and damages for waste, as against G. A. Stancill, and to recover the debt due by the mortgage, and for foreclosure as against the defendants, the administrator and heirs at law of B. S. Atkinson. The defendant Stancill employed counsel to file an answer. The administrator and heirs at law filed neither answer nor bond.

From these facts appearing in the complaint of the plaintiffs and the answer of the defendant Stancill, it will be seen that the plaintiff Inez Carraway seeks to recover possession of the land from defendant Stancill, and in the same action G. M. Lindsay, administrator of S. V. Whitehead, seeks to recover a judgment on a certain note, and to foreclose a mortgage securing said note on the same land, which note and mortgage were given to S. V. Whitehead by B. S. Atkinson, deceased, who was a former owner of the land. The defendant Stancill is the only person in possession of the land, and, as far as we can see, is the only defendant who is interested in setting up a defense and traversing the allegations in the complaint.

It is true, the defendant Stancill had not filed the bond required by section 390 of Clark's Code, securing the rents and profits of the land; but his honor, in his sound discretion, permitted it to be filed, and therefore the plaintiffs properly asked no judgment against Stancill. Clark's Code (3d Ed.) § 390, and cases cited. The bond required by section 390 is not for costs only, but secures to the plaintiff such damages as he may sustain in the loss of rents, and may be increased, in the discretion of the court, if the defendant shows a disposition to delay the trial. It is not required to be given by the defendant in an action where the plaintiff alleges that such defendant is not in possession of the land, and is not, therefore, in receipt of the rents and profits. Therefore the fact that the defendants other than Stancill had failed to file such bond was no ground for judgment against them. The failure of Stancill's codefendants to file an answer should not be allowed to prejudice him, and his honor acted with a due regard to the merits of the controversy in exercising a sound and wise discretion in refusing the plaintiffs' motion.

We have carefully examined the cases pressed upon our attention by Mr. Lindsay, and cited in his brief. None of them are of value in determining this motion. Hall v. Hall, 131 N. C. 186, 42 S. E. 562, was an action for divorce, and decides, among other things, that an appeal lies from the refusal of a judgment to which a party is entitled. The plaintiff's right to his appeal in this case has not been questioned. Timber Co. v. Butler, 134 N. C. 50, 45 S. E. 956, was an action to remove a cloud from title. Griffin v. Light Co., 111 N. C. 434, 16 S. E. 423, was a motion for judgment upon a failure or refusal to verify a complaint. Curran v. Kerchner, 117 N. C. 264, 23 S. E. 177, was an action on two notes, the liability on one of which the defendant had not denied. None of those cases are pertinent.

It is claimed by the defendant Stancill that he purchased the land at a large price at a judicial sale to foreclose the S. V. Whitehead mortgage referred to in the complaint; that he has paid the purchase money, and that it was applied to the discharge of B. S. Atkinson's debts, which were liens on this land; that the plaintiff Inez Carraway received the benefit of it; and that when he purchased he had the right to believe the court was giving him a good title. He further claims that the plaintiff Inez was a party to that action, and is bound by the decree in it. It will be observed that one of the plaintiffs is now endeavoring to get judgment, as administrator of S. V. Whitehead, against the administrator and heirs of B. S. Atkinson, upon the same debts embraced in the decree under which Stancill bought, and also to foreclose the same mortgage again, and to have another judicial sale, and offer the same land to an uninformed public by a decree in this cause, utterly regardless of the possibility that Stancill may establish a good title to the land, and the innocent purchaser get nothing. Courts of equity do not knowingly offer a disputed and litigated title for sale to the public, and especially by decree in the very action in which one of the defendants sets up a bona fide title to the land. Bidders and purchasers at execution sales have to look out for themselves, and they get only such title as the sheriff can convey. They may get something. They may get nothing. They know this when they bid. Judicial sales are decreed and conducted upon entirely different principles. Under such sales the purchaser has a right to look to the court to protect him. If the title fails, and the money is still in custodia legis, the court will refund it, or make such orders and decrees as are necessary and proper to perfect the title, if that be practicable. If the court had made the decree asked for, it would really be perpetrating a wrong on the public in ordering a judicial sale of a tract of land, the title to which is energetically contested in this very action. Besides, it would be a gross injustice to the defendant Stancill, who is really the only defendant, so far as we can see, interested in the result of the action. All the other defendants, as well as the plaintiff Inez and the former administrator of S. V. Whitehead, as Stancill avers, have received their money from him for the interest they had formerly owned in the land. To grant the plaintiffs' motion would be a serious disadvantage to Stancill, and possibly a fatal one, in working out the equities Stancill will doubtless invoke in case his legal title fails. In such event he may seek to be subrogated to the original rights of S. V. Whitehead under her mortgage; he may seek to charge the land with the purchase money he has paid, upon the ground that it discharged liens on the land. A judicial sale of the land before the title is settled would put a cloud upon the title, and, if Stancill should win, this cloud would be hanging over his title, and he would be compelled to seek the aid of the court in removing it.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

DAWSON v. THIGPEN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—RENEWAL—DISCHARGE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CLAIM AND DELIVERY—INTERPLEADER—RIGHTS—NONSUIT.

1. In an action involving the title to property, an interpleader is restricted to the issue as to his title or claim to the property, and cannot raise or litigate questions or rights which do not affect such title.

2. Where defendant in claim and delivery retains the property by filing an undertaking for plaintiff's benefit, a claimant who interpleads may, by filing the affidavit and undertaking required by Code, § 331, either secure possession of the property, or an undertaking for its delivery or the value thereof, and is not entitled to any judgment, other than for costs, against plaintiff, who may therefore take a nonsuit.

3. Where plaintiff in claim and delivery takes a nonsuit, and the cause continues between interpleaders, plaintiff is bound by the result of the suit as privy thereto, and cannot again assert title to the property.

4. The mere taking of a new note and mortgage by a mortgagee does not discharge the original security unless it is intended so to operate.

5. On an issue of priorities between chattel mortgages, whether a new note and mortgage, accepted by one of the mortgagees, was taken with intent to discharge and renew her original note and mortgage, which antedated the liens of the other parties, or whether the original lien was intended to be preserved, held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Moore, Judge.

Action by N. B. Dawson against I. L. Thigpen and another; L. E. McDuffie and G. A. Stancill, interpleaders. From the judgment rendered, interpleader McDuffie appeals. Reversed.

The plaintiff, N. B. Dawson, instituted this action on February 12, 1902, against the defendants Thigpen and wife for the recovery of four mules, one mare, carts, etc., and all crops raised by defendants during the year 1901. At the time of issuing the summons the plaintiff obtained an order for the immediate delivery of the property. Defendants executed an undertaking pursuant to the statute, retaining possession thereof. Defendants Thigpen and wife filed an answer denying the plaintiff's right of action, and alleging that the indebtedness for which the plaintiff's mortgage was executed had been paid, except a small sum, which was tendered in full satisfaction. G. A. Stancill filed an application to interplead in said action, setting forth that the defendants were indebted to him in the sum of $550, which indebtedness was secured by mortgage registered on the 15th day of March, 1900, on the mules and other personal property claimed in plaintiff's complaint and seized by him as aforesaid. No formal order was made permitting said Stancill to interplead, but plaintiff filed an answer to his affidavit, denying his right to the property. L. E. McDuffie filed an affidavit as a basis for the application to interplead, setting forth that she was the owner of the property claimed by the plaintiff, by virtue of a crop lien and chattel mortgage recorded February 2, 1901. An order was duly made, making her party defendant, and permitting her to file an answer setting up any right or title she might have to the property in controversy. She thereupon filed her interplea alleging that she was the owner of the property described in the complaint by virtue of two crop liens and chattel mortgages executed by defendants Thigpen and wife, one recorded January 27, 1900, and the other February 2, 1901, and that there was due her on account of the indebtedness secured therein the sum of $760. The plaintiff filed an answer to her interplea, denying that she was entitled to the property, and further alleging that the mortgage of January 27, 1900, had been fully discharged, and that in respect to the mortgage of February 2, 1901, said mortgage was filed for registration on February 2, 1901, but was withdrawn from the office of the register of deeds by the interpleader and was not returned to said office until February 2, 1902, when it was actually recorded; that plaintiff's mortgage was recorded May 8, 1901.

The case on appeal states: "When the case was called for trial, the plaintiff caused the following entry to be made in the record: 'The plaintiff, N. B. Dawson, comes into court and states that he has been settled with for the amount of his claim upon the agreement of the original defendants to pay the cost, and thereupon prays the court for a nonsuit of the action so far as he is concerned. Thereupon the interpleader Mrs. L. E. McDuffie comes into court and applies to the court for leave to amend her pleading' " by alleging that since the last continuance she has learned that the plaintiff in this action received into his possession before the commencement of this action a large amount of the crops grown on the land of the defendant Thigpen, described in the mortgage and lien held by her; that said crops were not taken by the sheriff pursuant to the process in this action; that the plaintiff should account to her for the value of the said property and crops so received. Thereupon the following entry is made: "The court in its discretion would permit the interpleader to file the amendment to her pleadings as above requested, but believing the court has no power to allow such amendment, after the announcement made by the plaintiff, declines to allow the amendment to be made for want of power, to which ruling the interpleader Mrs. McDuffie excepts."

The court thereupon submitted the following issues: "(1) Is the interpleader Mrs. L. E. McDuffie the owner, by virtue of the crop lien and chattel mortgage introduced, of the crops in controversy? Ans. Yes. (2) What was the value of said crops at the time of the seizure? Ans. $189.25. (3) Is the interpleader Mrs. L. E. McDuffie the owner, by virtue of the crop liens and chattel mortgages introduced by her, of the personal property in controversy, or any part thereof, and, if only a part, what part? Ans. Yes; all of the personal property except the hoes, the hames, and the weeder, but the mules and mare are subject to G. A. Stancil's mortgage. (4) What was the value of said personal property at the time of the seizure? Ans. The value of the mules and mare is $335, and the value of the other property is $54.63. (5) Are the defendants indebted to the interpleader Mrs. McDuffie on account of the bond and crop lien and chattel mortgage introduced, and, if so, in what sum? Ans. One thousand dollars and interest, as shown by the note, less $300, as credited on note. (6) Is the interpleader G. A. Stancil the owner, by virtue of the chattel mortgage and crop lien introduced by him, of the personal property in controversy, or any part thereof, and, if of only a part, what part? Ans. Yes; of the mules and mare. (7) What was the value of such personal property at the date of the seizure? Ans. $335. (8) Are the defendants indebted to the interpleader G. A. Stancil on account of the chattel mortgage and crop lien introduced, and, if so, in what sum? Ans. Yes; $550, with interest from November 1, 1900. (9) As between the interpleaders Mrs. L. E. McDuffie and G. A. Stancil, which has the first lien on the mules and mare in controversy? Ans. G. A. Stancil."

Mrs. McDuffie introduced testimony tending to show the value of the property seized in this action. She also introduced a bond dated January 19, 1901, for $1,000 for agricultural advances, subject to a credit of $300; also bond for $1,000 payable to her, dated January 11, 1900, the witness testifying that Mrs. McDuffie delivered the papers to her attorney, that she had them in her possession, that he was not and had never been her agent, that he did not know there was anything due on the 1900 note, and that it was in the possession of the interpleader, and not marked "Paid."

The interpleader Stancil put in evidence the original mortgage and lien made to him by defendants, recorded March 5, 1900, for $750. He then introduced the defendant Thigpen, who testified that he did not owe anything on the note of 1900 to Mrs. McDuffie; that the note of 1901 was given to renew the note of 1900; that he borrowed $1,000 from her in 1898, and executed a mortgage on his property and crops; that each year he gave a new note and mortgage; that in 1901 he gave the note to D. E. Cobb for Mrs. McDuffie, who was away from home. "We had no agreement. I prepared a new note and lien, and gave it to Cobb for Mrs. McDuffie. After she came back, I asked Cobb to get it for me. Mrs. McDuffie boarded at his house. The note of January, 1901, was given to take up a prior note. It was given to renew a debt due November 1, 1900." To this testimony Mrs. McDuffie excepted. The witness further testified that he executed a lien and mortgage to G. A. Stancil, and that there was due on it a balance of $550; that Mrs. McDuffie did not furnish any money to make the crop; that each year he would go to her with a new note and mortgage, and that she was satisfied; that he kept the lien and paid her interest on it; that the team described in the mortgages of Mrs. McDuffie was the same as described in the mortgage to Stancil.

The court charged the jury that if they believed the evidence, and if there was a balance due on the Stancil debt, he was entitled to recover the possession of the property, and that they should answer the sixth issue "Yes" and the ninth issue "G. A. Stancil." Mrs. McDuffie excepted. She assigns as error, first, the refusal of the court to permit her to amend her plea, and permitting the plaintiff to take a nonsuit; second, the instruction to the jury that the mules, etc., were the property of Stancil. She appealed from the judgment rendered.

G. M. T. Fountain and John L. Bridgers, for appellant. Gilliam & Gilliam, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts). The assignments of error present but two questions for our consideration: First, the right of the plaintiff to withdraw from the action pending the controversy, by taking a nonsuit. He had, by the order of the court, at the institution of the action, procured the seizure of the property, and the defendants had retained it by filing the undertaking, which was available to the plaintiff only in the event of a recovery. While the complaint does not set out the source of the plaintiff's claim to the property, it does allege an indebtedness by the defendants, and they in their answer admit the execution of a mortgage to the plaintiff to secure the payment of the same indebtedness. It is also manifest from the pleadings that the controversy arose out of conflicting claims, based upon several mortgages executed by defendant Thigpen to the plaintiff and the interpleader. It is well settled that, in an action involving the title to property, an interpleader is restricted to the issue as to his title or claim to the property; and cannot raise or litigate questions or rights which do not affect such title. McLean v. Douglass, 28 N. C. 233. He does not, speaking with accuracy, become a party to the action in the same sense and with the same status as the original parties, or those made so pending the action either by the court ex mero motu or upon application. In McKesson v. Mendenhall, 64 N. C. 502, Rodman, J., states the rule in regard to the rights of the original plaintiff to take a voluntary nonsuit: "The principle seems to be that a plaintiff may elect to be nonsuited in every case when no judgment, other than for costs, can be recovered against him by the defendant, and, when such judgment can be recovered, he cannot." If the plaintiff had taken the property into his possession and retained it, he could not, either as against the defendant or the interpleader, have submitted to a nonsuit and gone out of court by simply paying the costs. Manix v. Howard, 82 N. C. 125. In the case before us, the property having been retained by the defendants, it was open to the interpleader, by complying with the provision of section 331 of the Code, to either secure possession of the property or an undertaking for its delivery or the value thereof. It would seem to be clear that in no event could the interpleader recover any other judgment against the plaintiff than for costs. If he had received from the defendants crops to which the interpleader was entitled, he was liable therefor in a separate action. By moving for judgment of nonsuit, the plaintiff conceded that he was not entitled to the property in controversy. This was all that in any event the interpleader, as against the plaintiff, was entitled to. We are of opinion that his honor properly permitted the plaintiff to submit to the nonsuit. In McKesson v. Mendenhall, supra, it is held that, although nonsuited, the action would go on for the interpleader, and the person nonsuited would be bound by the result of the suit as privy thereto. This is an additional reason for sustaining the ruling of the court below. The plaintiff is bound by his action, and cannot again assert title to the property. This in no degree affected the right of the interpleaders to litigate, as between themselves, the title to the property and their interests therein.

In regard to the second assignment of error—the instruction of the jury that the mules were the property of Stancil. We are of opinion that his honor should have submitted to the jury the question as to the intent with which the second mortgage was executed by Thigpen and received by the interpleader. It will be noted that she held the mortgage on the personal property, recorded January 27, 1900, and that on February 2, 1901, the mortgagor signed and sent to her a mortgage by one D. E. Cobb. Cobb testified that he was not her agent and had never been, and that he simply delivered the mortgage to her. The defendant Thigpen testified that he executed a mortgage of January, 1900, and that he prepared a new note and lien and gave it to Cobb in January, 1901; that there was no agreement between them; that it was given to renew the debt due November 1, 1900. She retained both notes and mortgages. It may well be that she accepted the note and mortgage of 1901 for the purpose of securing a mortgage on the crop of that year, retaining the original mortgage as the first lien on the personal property. Thigpen had executed a mortgage on the same property to Stancil, recorded March 5, 1900. If she had notice of this mortgage, it would explain her conduct in retaining her mortgage registered prior thereto. However this may be, it was a question for the jury to decide.

In Smith v. Bynum, 92 N. C. 108, it was held that when there was a settlement between the mortgagor and mortgagee, and a new note and mortgage taken, the property in the first mortgage was released. Ashe, J., says: "If the plaintiff had not come to a settlement with the mortgagor, and taken a new note with another mortgage to secure it, his lien under that mortgage would have continued, and he would have had the right to recover in this action, but by his settlement * * * the mortgage of January, 1882, was discharged." The decision is based upon the fact that the parties came to a settlement. In Joyner v. Stancil, 108 N. C. 153, 12 S. E. 912, the referee expressly found that Stancil "accepted said note in full satisfaction of and in payment of and in discharge of said Rountree & Co's. note, * * * and treated it as a discharge of pre-existing securities." Shepherd, J., after reviewing the decision, says that "the finding of the referee is explicit upon this point, that the new note was accepted in full satisfaction of and in payment of the former one." These cases are distinguished from Hyman v. Devereux, 63 N. C. 624, Vick v. Smith, 83 N. C. 80, and Collins v. Davis, 132 N. C. 106, 43 S. E. 579, by the fact that a settlement was had, and a new note taken in payment of the discharge of the original. The general rule is well settled that the taking of a second note and mortgage, of itself, does not discharge the original security unless it is intended so to operate. Jones on Mortgages, § 924. "Whether a new note shall be treated and have effect between the parties as a payment of a former one for which it is substituted will depend upon the purpose and understanding of the parties to the transaction, but not only will the intention of the parties be determined by the express agreement of the parties, but, in the absence of this, by the circumstances attending the transaction from which such intention may be inferred. * * * In the absence of any express agreement and of any circumstances showing intention, the renewal of the note does not affect the security. The burden is upon the mortgagor to show the existence of an agreement that the mortgage lien should be released upon the execution of the new note, and not upon the mortgagee to show an agreement that the mortgage should continue as a security for the debt covered by the new note." Id. § 926. Again: "The taking of further security for the mortgage debt, whether it be by a second mortgage upon the same land, or real or personal security upon other property, is generally no waiver of the original mortgage." Id. § 929.

There was evidence fit to be considered by the jury upon the issue with what intent Thigpen executed, and Mrs. McDuffie received, the note and mortgage of January 1, 1901. This exception of Mrs. McDuffie therefore must be sustained, and a new trial ordered upon the third, sixth, and ninth issues. In view of our decision, we are of opinion that the costs should be divided equally between the appellant, Mrs. McDuffie, and the interpleader Stancil. Let this be certified to the court below.

New trial.

KIRKMAN et al. v. WADSWORTH et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 8, 1905.)

TRUSTS—DEEDS—POWERS—CONVEYANCE BY DONEE—HUSBAND AND WIFE—HUS-BAND AS WIFE'S TRUSTEE.

1. Where there was added to the tenendum of a deed the words, "free and discharged of any and all incumbrances in fee simple absolutely forever," and then followed a warranty in fee to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, against the claims of all persons whatsoever, the deed conveyed a fee simple.

2. If a deed can have no efficacy except by reference to a power, and the deed has been executed substantially as provided in the instrument creating the power, the estate will pass, although the power is not referred to in the deed.

3. When a trustee, having power to sell land in fee by the written direction of the cestui que trust for life, joins with her in a conveyance of the property on valuable consideration, with warranty, it is a valid execution of the power, though no written direction was given.

4. Where a husband gave a trust deed in favor of his wife to his father, on the death of the father the grantor in the deed, as the father's heir, was clothed with all the powers and trusts declared in the deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Council, Judge.

Suit by Emeline Kirkman and another against Enoch Wadsworth and others. From a decree in favor of defendants, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

On the 15th day of April, 1841, Joseph Merrell executed a deed in fee simple for the locus in quo to his father, John Peter Merrell, upon the following trusts: "In trust for the sole and separate use of Caroline M. Merrell, wife of the said Joseph Merrell during the life of the said Caroline M. Merrell so that said real estate, slaves and their increase and other personal property hereby granted shall not be liable or in any manner subject to the debts, contracts or engagements of the said Joseph Merrell and further to grant and convey said property or any part thereof to such person or persons for such consideration and for such interests and estates as the said Caroline M. Merrell shall by any writing under her hand and seal during her coverture direct, limit or appoint and upon the dissolution of the said marriage by the death of the said Caroline

M. Merkell and on her failure to make the appointment above mentioned in trust to surrender and deliver up said property to such child or children of the said Joseph Merkell and Caroline M. Merkell, his wife as may be living at her death to be held by such child or children in absolute property, but should said Caroline M. Merkell die and leave no issue living at her death then in trust to surrender and deliver up said property hereby granted to the said Joseph Merkell or if he should die before said event then to the proper heirs at law and next of kin of the said Joseph Merkell to be held by him or them as their absolute and indefeasible estate." Prior to May 6, 1843, John Peter Merkell, the trustee under said deed died, leaving Joseph Merkell, the grantor in said deed, his only son and heir at law, to whom said trust estate descended. On the 6th day of May, 1843, while said trust estate was vested in Joseph Merkell, the said Joseph Merkell and his wife, Caroline M. Merkell, the donee of the power of appointment under said trust deed, executed a deed in fee simple for the locus in quo to A. Mitchell. A. Mitchell immediately entered into the possession of the locus in quo, and he and those claiming under him, down to and including the defendant S. E. Wadsworth, have been in possession thereof ever since. On the 9th day of December, 1843, Joseph Merkell and his wife, Caroline M. Merkell, executed a deed to J. T. Lane, as trustee, for the locus in quo; providing that the property conveyed therein should be held upon the same trusts as those expressed in the original deed to John Peter Merkell. The plaintiff Emeline Kirkman is a surviving child of the said Joseph Merkell and Caroline M. Merkell, both being dead at the commencement of this action. The plaintiff Ella Moore is the only child and heir at law of another child of the said Joseph Merkell and Caroline M. Merkell, who died during the lifetime of the said Caroline M. Merkell. Caroline M. Merkell died on the 27th day of December, 1903. The plaintiffs claim the locus in quo under the provisions of the deeds in trust to the said John Peter Merkell and J. T. Lane, and the defendant S. E. Wadsworth claims said property under the deed from the said Joseph Merkell and Caroline M. Merkell to A. Mitchell, and by mesne conveyances in fee.

W. D. McIver, for appellants. W. W. Clark, for appellees.

BROWN, J. (after stating the facts). The plaintiffs contend that the deed of May 6, 1843, from Joseph and Caroline Merkell to A. M. Mitchell, while purporting on its face to convey a fee, conveyed in fact only the life estate given to said Caroline by the deed to John Peter Merkell, trustee, by Joseph Merkell, dated April 15, 1841, and that Caroline Merkell having died December 27, 1903, without having properly exercised the power of appointment given her by said deed, the plaintiffs are now entitled to the property as the beneficiaries under the provisions of the trust. The defendants contend that, under the terms of said trust deed, Joseph Merkell not only gave his wife, Caroline, a life estate in the property, but he also gave her, by express words, a valid power of appointment, whereby, by a "writing under her hand and seal during her coverture," said Caroline could direct, limit, or appoint, through the trustee, a conveyance of said property in fee. Defendants contend that when John Peter Merkell died the fee descended to his only heir and son, Joseph Merkell, husband of Caroline, and that thereafter Caroline and her husband, who was her trustee, executed to A. Mitchell the deed in fee of May 6, 1843, with full covenant of warranty; that the execution of this deed was a valid exercise of the power of appointment given to said Caroline, although in it there is no reference to the power.

In the appellants' brief it is stated that "his honor below announced his opinion as adverse to the claim as an execution of the power, but held that the plaintiffs were barred by the statute of limitations." Our view is quite to the contrary of his honor's. We are of opinion that the statute of limitations would not bar a recovery, but that the execution of the deed of May 6, 1843, does. The court below rendered the correct judgment, but put it on the wrong ground. This deed is a conveyance in fee simple, and nowhere purports to convey a less estate. The draftsman, as if "to make assurance doubly sure," has added in the tenendum the words "free and discharged of any and all encumbrances in fee simple absolutely forever," and then follows a covenant of warranty in fee "to Alexander Mitchell, his heirs and assigns, against the claims of all persons whatsoever." If the English language is capable of making known the thoughts and intentions of the mind, the words used in that deed convey the most unmistakable purpose and intention on the part of Caroline Merkell and her husband, Joseph, to convey a fee-simple estate in the property described therein.

The plaintiffs contend in reference thereto (1) that the deed must refer to the power, otherwise it is not a valid exercise of the power; (2) that the husband cannot be trustee to the wife, and that the conveyance is void as an exercise of the power of appointment, because no legal trustee joined in it. We are against the plaintiffs on both propositions. We take it that the following propositions are established law: If a deed can have no efficacy except by reference to a power, and the deed has been executed substantially as provided in the instrument creating the power, the estate will pass, although the power is not referred to in the deed. If the donee of the power has an estate in the property outside and independent of the instrument creating the power, or any separate estate in the property, however created, and makes a deed, the terms of which will be fully satisfied by such independent estate, which deed contains no reference whatever to the power, his conveyance will be referred to his own independent estate, and it will be presumed that the donee intended to convey his independent estate only, and that he did not intend the deed as an exercise of the power of appointment under a trust. Caroline Merkel had no interest or estate whatever in the property conveyed to Mitchell, except what was given her in the deed creating the power. Having no estate whatever in herself that can satisfy the terms of that deed, when she and her husband and trustee executed it, for a valuable consideration, in fee, and with full warranty, she manifested a most unmistakable purpose to convey under the power given her, and to its full extent. It is not necessary that the deed should refer to the power. Under such circumstances, it is a valid exercise of the power of appointment without it.

The authorities are full and in complete accord upon these propositions. Ashe, J., says, "It is not necessary to refer to the power if the act shows that the donee had in view the subject of the power at the time." Taylor v. Eatman, 92 N. C. 607; 4 Washburn, R. P. (4th Ed.) 658; 4 Kent, Com. marg. p. 334. "An intent apparent upon the face of the instrument to dispose of all the estate is deemed a sufficient reference to the power to make the instrument operate as an execution of it, inasmuch as the words of the instrument could not be otherwise satisfied." 1 Sugden on Powers, 460.

It is not necessary that Joseph Merkel, the trustee, and his wife, the donee of the power, should have executed separate instruments. Neither is it necessary that she should have requested or directed the trustee, in a separate writing, to make the deed. Joining in the same deed with the trustee was the most effectual manner of indicating her wishes and purposes by a writing under seal. When a trustee, having a power to sell land in fee by the written direction of the cestui que trust for life, joins with her in a conveyance of the property on valuable consideration, with warranty, this is a good and valid execution of the power, although the conveyance does not refer to the power. Glndrat v. Gas Co., 82 Ala. 604, 2 South. 327, 60 Am. Rep. 769. Where the deed would be useless and inoperative, and convey nothing except as an exercise of a power, it will be so construed, although there be no reference in it to the power. Matthews v. Capshaw, 109 Tenn. 480, 72 S. W. 964. The estate Mrs. Merkel acquired under the trust deed was a life estate. It could not satisfy the terms of the deed to Mitchell.

The authorities are abundant to the effect that, where one who owns an estate in property is also clothed with a power resulting from a trust in the same property, if the donee executes a conveyance under such circumstances as to make it apparent that it was his intention to execute the power, the conveyance will be referred to the execution of the power, and not to a disposition of the estate owned by him in the property. Lumber Co. v. O'Neal, 131 Ala. 119, 30 South. 466, 90 Am. St. Rep. 22, and cases cited. Where a person conveys land, for a valuable consideration, in fee, he engages with the grantee to make the deed as effectual as he has the power to make it. In addition to the authorities cited, the propositions laid down are fully sustained by the following cases: Warner v. Ins. Co., 109 U. S. 357, 3 Sup. Ct. 221, 27 L. Ed. 962; Campbell v. Johnson, 65 Mo. 439; Yates v. Clark, 56 Miss. 212; Rinkenberger v. Meyer, 155 Ind. 152, 56 N. E. 913; Ladd v. Chase, 155 Mass. 417, 29 N. E. 637; also by an elaborate opinion of Judge Taft in the Circuit Court of Appeals, in which many authorities are cited—Smith v. McIntyre, 95 Fed. 591, 87 C. C. A. 177.

It is insisted by the plaintiffs that it is against the policy of the law for a husband to be a trustee for his wife, and that Joseph Merkel, the husband, when the trust estate vested in him by descent from John Peter Merkel, had no power to convey under the appointment of his wife. The plaintiffs' position as to this is equally as untenable as their first contention. In Oroom v. Wright, 39 N. C. 250, Chief Justice Ruffin says: "He [meaning the husband] therefore can take no beneficial interest in the property under the will, whether the legal estate be vested in his wife's brother, as trustee, or be vested in the husband himself for want of the interposition of another trustee, since it has been long held that, where there is a clear intention to give a separate estate to a married woman, it shall not fall for want of a trustee, but be effectuated by converting the husband in respect to the legal estate, which comes to him jure mariti, into a trustee for her." In Stearns v. Fraleigh, 23 South. 18, 39 L. R. A. 705, the wife appointed her husband her trustee. The Supreme Court of Florida sustained the appointment, and declared that the husband's acceptance binds him to execute the trust according to its terms as fully as any other trustee, and that the husband becomes vested with the same powers and responsibilities, and no others, as any other trustee. If the husband trustee attempts to coerce the wife, she may have him removed. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 431, where many authorities are collected.

When John Peter Merkel died, the estate in the land descended upon his only heir, Joseph Merkel, clothed with all the powers, and charged with all the duties, responsibilities, and trusts, declared in the deed, which trust the courts will enforce. When Joseph and his wife afterwards conveyed in fee, for value, and with warranty, their grantee acquired a good title to the fee.

The judgment is affirmed.

GATES & SON CO. v. CITY OF RICHMOND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

OBSTRUCTING STREETS—CONSTRUCTION OF ORDINANCE.

For one, as occasion requires, to obstruct a sidewalk by a skid from his store door to a delivery wagon for purposes of moving merchandise between them, is not within an ordinance declaring a penalty for constructing or placing any portico, porch, door, window, step, fence, or other projection which shall project into a street, and a like penalty for every day that said portico, porch, door, window, step, gate, fence, or other projection shall be continued; the ordinance applying only to obstructions of a permanent character.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 1446.]

Error to Hustings Court of City of Richmond.

The Gates & Son Company was fined under an ordinance of the city of Richmond, and brings error. Reversed.

George Bryan, for plaintiff in error. H. R. Pollard, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, a corporation, whose place of business fronts on Fourteenth street in the city of Richmond, was fined by a police justice for the alleged violation of an ordinance of the city in obstructing said street.

The obstruction complained of was occasioned by the use of a movable gang plank or skid, a contrivance composed of two parallel pieces of timber about 12 feet long and 12 inches apart, sheathed with iron, and held together by wooden crosspieces. The skid was extended from the front door of the storehouse across the sidewalk to delivery wagons in the street, and the goods of the company were carried over the skid to the wagons on hand trucks.

Upon appeal to the hustings court of the city the judgment of the police justice was affirmed, and the case is here on writ of error to the judgment of affirmance.

The sole question for determination, therefore, is whether the above-mentioned facts, of which there is no denial, constitute a violation of the ordinance in question.

The ordinance is as follows: "No person shall construct or place, or cause to be constructed or placed, any portico, porch, door, window, step, fence, or other projection which shall project into any street, or any gate which shall open outside over any sidewalk, under a penalty of not less than five nor more than fifty dollars for each offense, and a like penalty for every day that the said portico, porch, door, window, step, gate, fence, or other projection shall be continued as aforesaid after notice to remove the same. Whenever in any part of said city a street has been or shall hereafter be encroached upon or obstructed by a fence or any inclosure, or by any building or any part thereof, the owner or owners thereof shall remove the same to the proper line of said street when ordered by the committee on streets to do so. If such removal be not made within twenty days after notice of such order, the owner or owners thereof shall be liable to a fine of not less than ten nor more than one hundred dollars; each day's failure to be a separate offense."

This is a penal ordinance, and is therefore to be construed strictly. It is not to be extended by implication, and must be limited in its application to cases clearly described by the language employed. The books abound with cases illustrating this principle, which is of universal application, except in particular instances in which the doctrine has been modified by statute. Fox's Adm'r's v. Com., 16 Grat. 1; Harris v. Com., 81 Va. 240, 59 Am. Rep. 666; Street v. Broadus, 96 Va. 825, 32 S. E. 468.

In United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 5 L. Ed. 37, Marshall, C. J., observes: "The rule that penal laws are to be construed strictly is, perhaps, not much less old than construction itself. It is founded in the tenderness of the law for the rights of individuals, and on the plain principle that the power of punishment is vested in the legislative, not the judicial, department . . . The case must be a strong one, indeed, which would justify a court in departing from the plain meaning of words, especially in a penal act, in search of an intention which the words themselves do not suggest. To determine that a case is within the intention of a statute its language must authorize us to say so.

"It would be dangerous, indeed, to carry the principle that a case which is within the reason or mischief of a statute is within its provisions so far as to punish a crime not enumerated in the statute, because it is of kindred character with those which are enumerated."

"There can be no constructive offenses, and, before a man can be punished, his case must be plainly and unmistakably within the statute." Chief Justice Fuller in U. S. v. Lacher, 184 U. S. 624, 10 Sup. Ct. 625, 33 L. Ed. 1080.

These and many other cases which could be cited to the same effect tend to illustrate the jealousy with which courts regard any substantial departure from this time-tested canon of construction. Its violation involves a most dangerous innovation, and places persons accused of crime at the mercy and arbitrary discretion of the judge who may chance to preside in the particular case.

There are two other kindred principles of construction to be considered in arriving at a correct interpretation of this ordinance, namely, that of noscitur a sociis and eiusdem generis.

The former rule is succinctly stated as follows: "It is a fundamental principle in the construction of statutes that the meaning of a word or phrase may be ascertained by reference to the meaning of other words or phrases with which it is associated. Language, though apparently general, may be limited in its operation or effect, where it may be gathered from the intent and purpose of the statute that it was designed to apply only to certain persons or things, or was to operate only under certain conditions." 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 608; citing, among other cases, Orange & Alex. R. Co. v. Alexandria, 17 Grat. 176.

The rationale of the principle of eiusdem generis seems to be that, if the Legislature has intended the general words to apply, uninfluenced by the preceding particular words, and without restriction, it would, in the first instance, have employed a compendious word to express its purpose. Rex v. Wallis, 5 Term R. 379. The rule is illustrated and applied in the comparatively recent case of American Manganese Co. v. Va. Manganese Co., 91 Va. 272, 21 S. E. 466, where this court, in construing section 3299 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1740], with respect to special pleas of set-off, held that the language "or any other matter," occurring in a statute which in part reads, "Or any other matter as would entitle him [the defendant] either to recover damages at law from the plaintiff * * * or to relief in equity, in whole or in part, against the obligation of the contract," is restricted to the preceding enumerated defenses, and that no set-off can be relied on by the defendant that does not grow out of the original contract. The court says: "One of these rules of construction is that general words may be limited to the same genus or class as the specific words which precede them. In Sutherland on Statutory Constr. § 268, it is said that, 'Where there are general words following particular and specific words, the former must be confined to things of the same kind.' In Broom's Legal Maxims (side page 651) the rule is laid down as follows: 'Where a particular class (of persons or things) is spoken of, and general words follow, the class first mentioned is to be taken as the most comprehensive, and the general words treated as referring to matters eiusdem generis with such class; the effect of general words, where they follow particular words, being thus restricted.' Sedgwick, in his work on Construction of Statutes (page 361), says: 'Where general words follow particular words, the rule is to construe the former as applicable to things or persons particularly mentioned.' The decisions of the courts fully sustain the text-writers that this is the true rule of construction in such cases, subject to certain limitations, not necessary to be mentioned here."

Lynchburg v. N. & W. R. Co., 80 Va. 237; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Bank, 92 Va. 495, 23 S. E. 935, 44 L. R. A. 449.

Applying the foregoing well-settled principles to the case in judgment, it is quite apparent that the offense charged is not embraced by the provisions of the ordinance under consideration. The ordinance is plainly intended to apply to obstructions and encroachments on the streets of a permanent character, and cannot, without unwarranted enlargement of the ordinary scope and meaning of the language used, be made to embrace temporary obstructions, such as are caused by the use of skids and similar appliances employed in loading and unloading wagons.

If, in the judgment of the city council, the use made of the streets in this instance amounts to an undue interference with the rights of the public, the evil can be remedied by appropriate legislation. But the courts must construe the ordinance as they find it, and cannot enlarge its operation to meet the exigencies of particular cases.

It follows from these views that the judgment complained of must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

PRISON ASSOCIATION OF VIRGINIA v. RUSSELL'S ADM'R et al.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—RESIDUARY LEGATEE.

Testatrix, after disposing of certain specific articles of personalty, bequeathed all the residue of her estate to a charitable corporation. Some time thereafter she made a codicil reciting that by her former will she had left all her property to the charitable corporation, and changing the same so as to give a specific sum for another charitable purpose. This latter bequest was void. Held, that the charitable corporation mentioned in the will was the general residuary legatee entitled to take the amount of the void bequest.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Bill by the Prison Association of Virginia against Russell's administrator for construction of the will of Adeline Pitt Russell, deceased. From the decree, the Prison Association of Virginia appeals. Reversed.

Stiles, Powers & Stiles, for appellant. Overton Howard and James M. Heath, for appellees.

KEITH, P. Testatrix died leaving a will dated April 12, 1890, which, together with a codicil dated May 9, 1898, was duly admitted to probate in the chancery court of the city of Richmond in February, 1902. The will and codicil are as follows:

"I, Adeline Pitt Russell, do make, constitute and appoint this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all other wills and testaments and writings in the nature of wills and testaments heretofore made by me, and particularly my will made some years ago and now in the possession, as I believe, of A. M. Kelley. I revoke that will because of certain conditions therein, which, owing to circumstances which have since arisen and which could not be then foreseen, might possibly defeat my chief object in making a will; and I believe that the purpose of that will can be better accomplished by this. I therefore revoke that will and all other wills heretofore made by me, and make this my last will and testament.

"My jewelry, silver, wearing apparel, &c., I give and bequeath to the person whose name will be found in a memoranda amongst my papers, stating what I give and to whom.

"All the residue of my estate, both real and personal, of every kind whatsoever of which I may die entitled, seized or possessed, I give, devise and bequeath to the Prison Association of Virginia, to use in establishing or in aiding in establishing anywhere within the Commonwealth of Virginia a reformatory, house of correction, work-house or other institution of like aim and character for such criminals, youthful offenders and persons convicted of petty crimes, under the age of twenty-one years, as the courts and magistrates of the Commonwealth of Virginia may see fit to commit to such institution, with full power to said Prison Association of Virginia, or to its board of directors to use any of my said estate in kind for said reformatory or other institution of like aim and character, or, if in the judgment of the said Prison Association, or of its board of directors it seem better to sell any or all of my said estate, real or personal or both, then authority is hereby conferred upon said Prison Association of Virginia or its board of directors to sell the same and to use the proceeds, principal and interest, in establishing and maintaining or in aiding to establish and maintain a reformatory, workhouse, or house of correction, or other institution of like aim and character anywhere within the limits of the Commonwealth of Virginia, for such criminals under the age of twenty-one years as the courts and magistrates of the State of Virginia may see fit to commit to said institution.

"Witness my hand this 12th day of April, in the year of our Lord, 1890.

"Adeline Pitt Russell."

Codicil: "By will, written by, and in the possession of Mr. Overton Howard of this city, the date of said will not being now remembered, I left all the property belonging to me at the time of my death, to the Prison Association, or Reformatory School at Laurel, Va. I desire now to add this codicil to said will: I had purposed leaving a bequest to the Mechanic's Institute at Richmond, Va., but as there is a move on foot to change the title of that institution, I hereby give and bequeath to Rt. Rev. Augustine Van De Vyver, Roman Catholic Bishop of Richmond, Va., or his successor in that office, the sum of six ($6000) thousand dollars, for the purpose of establishing an orphan asylum for negro female children in Richmond, Va., the said asylum to be conducted by the Sisters of the Holy Family (Colored Sisters) of New Orleans, Louisiana—and I do this in loving memory of my old black mammy and daddy, and the other servants who have belonged to me in the past. As a memento of my affection, I give one ($100) hundred dollars to each of the following gentlemen, to Howard T. Vaughan, of Norfolk, Va., to Rev. Herbert M. Hope, of Petersburg, Va., to William O. Hope, of Portsmouth, Va., to Mrs. Russell Tyler Barrett, of Newport News, Va., I also give one ($100) hundred dollars, my diamond ear rings, broach, large cluster ring, ruby ring and long watch chain, and to her child Tyler Barrett my silver mug; to Mrs. Emma Vaughan I give the diamond and emerald ring I wore constantly; to Mrs. Herbert M. Hope of Petersburg, Va., the enameled solitaire diamond ring and the short watch chain, and to Mrs. William O. Hope my cameo, cat's eye ring and watch. I have left sealed instructions with Miss Ellen M. Kelley as to the disposition to be made of my wearing apparel and furniture. To Katie, daughter of Wm. O. Hope, my large emerald and diamond ring.

"Adeline Pitt Russell."

The bill in this case was filed to obtain a judicial construction of this will. All interested were made parties, and by its decree, which is before us for review, the chancery court of the city of Richmond held that the $6,000 legacy given to the Roman Catholic bishop of Richmond, or his successor in office, was void, and from that feature of the decree there has been no appeal.

The chancery court was further of the opinion that the testatrix, with respect to the void legacy, had died intestate, and that it passed to her next of kin.

The Prison Association appealed from that decision, and its contention is, first, that as there was no express revocation of the will by the codicil, and the disposition made by the codicil having become ineffectual by reason of the incapacity to take of the legatee therein named, it will not be allowed to take effect as a revocation. In other words, that "the only idea and intent ever entertained by the testatrix of revoking the will of April 12, 1890, was in immediate connection with and dependent upon the substitution of the new disposition of the $6,000 in place of the old, and that her general testamentary intent will be doubly and shockingly frustrated if her new disposition fail to be effectuated while the old is held to have been revoked."

The second point presented in the argument is that the Prison Association is, by the terms of the original will, the residuary legatee of all the estate, real and personal, of every kind whatsoever, of which the testatrix died entitled, seised or possessed, and that as residuary legatee it takes everything not otherwise effectually disposed of by the will.

We shall only deal with the latter of these two propositions.

By the will of April, 1890, testatrix disposed of certain articles of personal property, her jewelry, silver, wearing apparel, etc. "All the residue of my estate, both real and personal, of every kind whatsoever, of which I may die entitled, seised or possessed, I give, devise and bequeath to the Prison Association of Virginia," etc.

"No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a residuary legatee; any expression is sufficient from which the testator's intention is discernible that the person designated shall take the surplus. Nor is it of controlling consequence that the clause is not the last of the disposing provisions, though such is the usual position." Woerner's American Law of Administration (2d Ed.) § 462.

"The residue is that part of a testator's estate not otherwise disposed of; hence a general residuary bequest carries with it everything not in terms disposed of, and, with such exceptions as are pointed out in connection with the subject of lapsed and void legacies, everything not effectually or well disposed of, as well as lapsed legacies, unless a contrary intent clearly appear from the will." Id.

"Such words as 'rest,' 'residue,' 'remainder,' are not indispensable to a residuary bequest of personal estate, but in various instances words and expressions quite informal have been given this effect, out of regard to the testator's obvious intention. A devise of this character has been held, agreeably to the intent of the will, to carry all the real estate, although 'money' was the term employed. While the residuary clause in a will is usually the last of its disposing provisions, still, the fact that it is not the last is not of controlling consequence as against the true intent to be gathered from the whole will; and, where the words of a residuary clause are sufficient to constitute one a general residuary legatee, it will not be readily assumed from other terms of the will that a less beneficial interest was intended." Schouler on Wills (3d Ed.) § 522.

It is hardly necessary to multiply authorities to show that by the will under consideration the Prison Association of Virginia was the residuary legatee of the testatrix. It is true that only a small portion of the property was specifically disposed of, but the whole scope of the final clause of that will discloses the intent of the testatrix, and uses apt words to convey her meaning. The association is expressly named as the legatee of the "residue" of the entire estate.

It is said in 1 Jarman on Wills, at page 760: "It scarcely need be added that it is immaterial that the enumeration comprises trivial things only, and omits all the important items of the personal estate. To hold the contrary would involve the admission of evidence to prove what the testator's personal estate consists of at the date of the will, which we have before seen is inadmissible. The disposition of the judges of the present day is to adhere to the sound rule, which gives to words of a comprehensive import their full extent of operation, unless some very distinct ground can be collected from the context for considering them as used in a special and restricted sense."

In the first clause of the codicil it is stated that "by will written by, and in the possession of Mr. Overton Howard of this city, the date of said will not being now remembered, I left all the property belonging to me at the time of my death, to the Prison Association," etc. That language was plainly used merely for the purpose of identifying the instrument to which she referred, and not for the purpose of changing the character of the disposition made by it. It had for its sole object the making of a bequest of $6,000 to the Roman Catholic bishop of Richmond, and it left the Prison Association just where it found it—the residuary legatee of all her estate not otherwise disposed of. The bequest to the Catholic bishop having failed, does it fall into the residuum or pass to the next of kin?

The contention of appellees is that the codicil undertook to dispose of a part of the residue, and, this attempted disposition having failed, the bequest does not pass with the residuum, but goes to the next of kin.

The law on this subject is thus stated in Jarman on Wills, vol. 1, p. 764: "When the disposition of an aliquot part of the residue itself fails from any cause, that part will not go in augmentation of the remaining parts, as a residue of the residue, but will devolve as undisposed of. In illustration of this well-settled rule it will suffice to mention the case of Skrymsner v. Northcote, 1 Swanst. 566, where a testator gave his residuary estate equally between his two daughters, but, in the event (which happened) of either of them dying and leaving no children, then out of the moiety of the one so dying he gave 500 pounds to H., and 'the remainder of that moiety' to the other sister. The testator revoked the gift of 500 pounds without making any fresh disposition of it, and Sir T. Plumer, M. R., held that it went to the next of kin. 'Residue,' he said, 'means all of which no effectual disposition is made by the will, other than the residuary clause. In the instance of a residue given in moieties, to hold that one moiety lapsing shall accrue to the other would be to hold that a gift of a moiety shall eventually carry the whole.' And this rule has been held to prevail, though the testator directed that in a certain event (which happened) the aliquot part should sink into the residue and be disposed of accordingly; this not being equivalent to saying it should belong to the other residuary legatees. But it is a mere question of intention, and in Evans v. Field, 8 L. J. (N. S.) 284, where a testatrix directed her executors to stand possessed of her residuary personal estate, after satisfying legacies, and also of so much of her personal estate the trusts whereof should fail, upon trust for division in elevenths, one share being separately given to each one of eleven named persons, one of these died before the testatrix, and it was held by Sir L. Shadwell, V. C., that the whole residue went to the other ten. He said the gift of the residue was in the first place among the eleven; but then the testatrix directed that so much of her personal estate, the trust whereof should fail, should be disposed of according to the same trusts, and, one share having lapsed, he thought the necessary effect of that direction was to make the residue divisible into ten parts instead of eleven."

It will be observed that Jarman uses the word "aliquot" throughout this quotation. His whole text, and the cases cited in support of it, refer to residuary bequests where there is more than one residuary legatee, and the aliquot part given to one of such legatees fails. In such case the part so failing goes, not in augmentation of the share or shares of the other residuary legatees, but passes as undisposed of to the next of kin. This clearly appears from the case of Skrymsner v. Northcote, cited by Jarman, where the residuary estate was divided equally between the testator's two daughters, and the Master of Rolls held that, the disposition of one of these moieties having become ineffectual, it went to the next of kin. "For," he said, "'residue' means all of which no effectual disposition is made by the will, other than the residuary clause."

Redfield on the Law of Wills (3d Ed.) vol. 2, p. 115, says: "It seems to be well settled that a residuary bequest as to personal estate carries not only everything not attempted to be disposed of, but everything which turns out not to have been effectually disposed of, as void legacies and lapsed legacies. A presumption arises in favor of the residuary legatee, as to personalty, against every other person except the particular legatee. The testator is supposed to give it away from the residuary legatee only for the sake of the particular legatee."

In Reynolds v. Kortright, 18 Beav. 417, 427, it is said that everything which is ill-given falls into the residue.

"A general residuary bequest of personal estate, or of chattels real, carries to the residuary legatee not only such estate and such interests therein as the testator did not attempt to dispose of by his will, but also such as by lapse or otherwise have not in fact been effectually disposed of by him." King v. Strong, 9 Paige, 94.

Morton v. Woodbury, 153 N. Y. 243, 47 N. E. 283, is a case of much interest, and is pertinent to several questions considered in this case. It decides that: "While the residuary clause in wills is usually the last of its disposing provisions, still the mere fact that it is not the last is not of controlling consequence, and can have no effect except as it bears upon the question of the intent of the testator."

"In seeking to discover the intent of the testator, all the provisions of the will are to be treated as valid; and the fact that a certain provision is invalid is irrelevant in determining the intent."

"Where the words of a residuary clause are of themselves sufficient to constitute the person named therein a general residuary legatee, a clear expression in the will or special words of unmistakable import are required to render him the legatee of a particular, instead of a general, residue."

"Where there is a disposition of a part of the residue, and it fails, it will not go in augmentation of the remaining parts as a residue of a residue, but will devolve as undisposed of."

The quotations made are from the syllabus of the case, and we shall quote from the opinion in explanation of the last paragraph. In support of the principle announced, the citation is made from Jarman on Wills which we have already quoted. The opinion says: "Where there is a disposition of a part of the residue, and it fails, it will not go in augmentation of the remaining parts as a residue of a residue, but will devolve as undisposed of. "'Residue' means all of which no effectual disposition is made by the will, other than [by] the residuary clause. In the instance of a residue given in moieties, to hold that one moiety lapsing shall accrue to the other would be to hold that a gift of a moiety shall eventually carry the whole.' 1 Jarman on Wills, 764, and cases cited. We find no such principle involved in this case. Here was a residuary clause, following which there was a provision by which the testatrix sought to dispose of a portion of her estate to hospitals and homes for women. This bequest was void, and consequently lapsed, and, as it cannot be properly regarded as a residue of a residue under the rule previously adverted to, it fell into the residuum, and passed to the respondent as general residuary legatee."

If the legacy which failed in Morton v. Woodbury had been effectual, it would have, to that extent, diminished the interest of the residuary legatee. As it was void, it left the residuary legatee unaffected. And this is true of all void or lapsed legacies. The residuary legatee not only takes that which is not otherwise effectually disposed of by the will, but he takes that which the will attempts, ineffectually, to dispose of, and which from any cause lapses or is void, except where the residuary clause itself, or some part of it, fails to become effectual, in which case it is denominated a residue of a residue, and passes to the next of kin.

The court in Morton v. Woodbury, supra, refers to a class of English cases "where the courts seem to have inferred that a bequest in general terms could not have the effect to carry the entire residuum if particular portions were subsequently given to other persons, of which Crichton v. Symes, 3 Atk. 61, may be regarded as an illustration. This ground of inference is said by Redfield in his work on Wills, to be 'entirely unsatisfactory, since the testator may have accidentally omitted some one whom he intended to remember in his will, until after the insertion of the residuary clause; or he may have chosen to begin his will by naming the residuary legatee.'" Adverting to the terms of the will in the case, the court further said: "It is plain that she intended to divert a portion of her estate from the general residuum, and to give it to homes and hospitals; but that fact is not controlling, as in most cases of lapsed or void legacies such an intention exists. Nor do we think it denotes any intention on her part to make her executors, or the objects of her bounty, her residuary legatees. We feel assured that the fifth article of the testatrix's will contains no such special words, nor any such express terms, as to show an intention to exclude that portion of her estate from the residuum, in case it should fail, as the rule relating to the subject requires."

In the case of Skrymsher v. Northcote, supra, the intention of the testator was manifest that the part of the residuum which failed should not augment that portion of the residuum which took effect. The two daughters of the testator were the objects of his bounty. It was the manifest purpose of the testator that each should have only a half; and it was tersely said by the court: "To hold that one moiety lapsing shall accrue to the other would be to hold that a gift of a moiety shall eventually carry the whole."

Redfield on Wills, vol. 2, at page 119, discussing the proposition that, where a portion of the residuary bequest fails to become operative at the death of the testator in the manner provided, "the portion thus failing will not go to increase the other portions of the residuum, as a residue of a residue," shows very clearly the extent and limitations of this principle. Referring to Skrymsher v. Northcote, 1 Swanst. 566, which seems to be the leading case upon the subject, in which the residue was given in moieties, one of which lapsed, and it was held that the moiety lapsing should not accrue to the other, but would be held to pass to the next of kin as undisposed-of property, he says: "It is not very apparent how the above reasoning may not apply with equal force to a gift of a residue after particular legacies, which is really rendered as definite by deducting the prior legacies, as if it had been expressed as one-half, or one-eighth, or any other definite proportion of the estate. And to adopt the principle that, if all the particular legacies lapse, the residuary clause shall carry the whole estate, involves the same departure from the expressed intention of the testator as, where the residuary clause is divided into moieties, and one of them fails, to let it go to the other. But this distinction is based upon a presumed intention of the testator to give his whole estate to the residuary legatee, except as it shall be cut down by the deductions necessary to meet the particular legacies. But in regard to the residuary bequest, where it is divided into distinct portions, no such presumption as to increasing the several portions by the failure of the others can so directly arise. And it has been upon this presumed difference of probable intention that the distinction has been made. And having been once established, upon ground however uncertain, it should not now be disregarded, unless upon some satisfactory grounds arising out of the context of the will, or the extrinsic proof of circumstances proper to be received in aid of the construction."

We have examined text writers and a number of adjudicated cases upon this subject, and all of them state the proposition substantially as it is presented by Jarman and Redfield; and all of the adjudicated cases are of the class of Skrymsher v. Northcote, supra. Every case which we have been able to consult involved the construction of wills where the residuary bequest has been to two or more in aliquot parts, which has failed to become operative in the manner provided as to one or more of them. As Redfield in the quotation just given remarks, the distinction as an original proposition is not clearly defined, but it rests upon the presumed intention, and, having been established, "should not now be disregarded unless upon some satisfactory grounds arising out of the context of the will, or the extrinsic proof of circumstances proper to be received in aid of the construction."

In this connection see Creswell v. Cheslyn, 2 Eden's Chy. R. 123; Sykes v. Sykes, 4 Eq. Cas. 200; Ford v. Ford, 1 Swan, 431; Wain's Estate, 156 Pa. 194, 27 Atl. 59; Smith v. Haynes, 111 Mass. 346.

This court considered this general subject in construing the will of Manus Rowan in Gallagher v. Rowan, 86 Va. 823, 11 S. E. 121. The will in that case was as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Fanny P. Rowan, my estate called the 'Grange,' during her life, and at her death I give it to my adopted daughter, Minnie E. McCarty, and to her heirs forever. Should she die without issue, in that event it is to be sold in the customary way, on one, two and three years credit. One-half of the proceeds of the land thus sold to be appropriated to the cause of domestic and foreign missions; the other half to be equally divided between the heirs of my brother, Gilbert Rowan, and the heirs of my four sisters," naming them. After making sundry bequests, the testator, by the fifth and last clause of his will, provided as follows: "All my remaining estate, real and personal, I give and bequeath to my dear wife during her life, and at her death to my dear Minnie McCarty." The bequest to foreign and domestic missions was held to be void for uncertainty, and the question was, to whom should the proceeds of the land thus bequeathed go; and it was held that it fell into the residuary fund, and passed to the husband, as distributee of his wife, Minnie McCarty.

Among other cases cited by Judge Lewis in his opinion is that of Miers v. Bedgood, 9 Leigh, 361, where it is said: "There are many cases to show that property not intended to pass under a residuary clause, as where it is given to charitable uses void by the statutes of mortmain, or where the legacy lapses, or where the specific legatee cannot claim in consequence of fraud practiced on the testator, does yet go to the residuary legatee."

"These authorities," said the court in Gallagher v. Rowan, "are sufficient to show the extensive operation which the courts ordinarily give to a residuary bequest; and the reason is obvious. When a man makes his will, the presumption, as already remarked, is that he intends thereby to dispose of his whole estate, especially where the will contains a general residuary clause, and hence very strong and special words are required to show that the testator intended the residuary bequest to have a limited effect, and thus to rebut the presumption in favor of the residue."

"The courts have for a long time inclined very decidedly against adopting any construction of wills which would result in partial intestacy, unless absolutely forced upon them. This has been done partly as a rule of policy, perhaps, but mainly as one calculated to carry into effect the presumed intention of the testator. For the fact of making a will raises a very strong presumption against any expectation or desire, on the part of the testator, of leaving any portion of his estate beyond the operation of his will. Hence, where a general residuary bequest was accompanied with expressions favoring a more limited construction, and pointing only to a particular surplus beyond the property specifically mentioned, it was nevertheless held to pass the residuum of his property at the time of his decease, as well that which he held at the date of the will as that afterwards acquired. Lord Eldon here said that was the general rule in regard to residuary bequests, to avoid partial intestacy, and that it required very special words to confine a residuary bequest to the property belonging to the testator at the date of his will."

The controlling purpose with courts in the construction of wills is to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the testator, if it be possible; and, seeking for the intention of the testatrix in this case, it seems plain that she intended by her will to dispose of the whole of her estate, and not to die intestate with respect to any part of it. In other words, the conclusion to be deduced from a consideration of the particular will but strengthens the presumption which attaches to all wills. If the codicil had constituted a part of the original testamentary paper, if it had preceded the residuary clause, there would have been no room for controversy. But, as we have seen, the position of the residuary clause has no effect upon the construction of the will. The whole will is to be read; it speaks, every line of it, at the testator's death; it is to be construed in its entirety, and the intention of the testator gathered, not from any one part of it, but from the whole, and that intention, when ascertained, if it be lawful, governs and controls.

We are of opinion that there is error in so much of the decree of the chancery court as directs the $6,000 mentioned in the codicil to be paid to the next of kin. The decree must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, to be further proceeded in, in accordance with the views herein expressed.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. FRITTS.

RAILROADS—FIRES—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. Where it is shown that a fire was set by a locomotive, the railway company is presumptively guilty of negligence, and it has the burden of proving that it used the best mechanical contrivances in known practical use to prevent the escape of fire, and exercised reasonable precaution in selecting competent employes and in operating its train.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, §§ 1709-1711.]

2. A railway company, in regulating the speed of its trains, must consider the dryness of the season, the strength and direction of the wind, the danger to adjacent property, and the surrounding circumstances which increase the danger from fire thrown out by the engines; and a high rate of speed, when taken in connection with the circumstances, may be negligence.

3. Where, in an action against a railway company for the destruction of property by fire set by sparks from an engine, it was shown that a freight train too heavily loaded for one engine was drawn by two engines at double the speed of the schedule time and up a grade, that the engines emitted an unusual quantity of sparks, that the property destroyed was exposed to danger by reason of its nearness to the track, the dryness of the season, and the strong wind blowing directly to it from the passing engines, and it was not shown that the speed adopted, in view of the prevailing conditions, was a necessity to the railway service or a duty owed by the company to its patrons or the public, the question whether the company was guilty of actionable negligence was for the jury.

Error to Circuit Court, Warren County.

Action by R. S. Fritts against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Downing & Richards and Marshall McCormick, for plaintiff in error. Scott & Staples, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the destruction of certain property of the plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by fire communicated from the engine or engines of the defendant company, in consequence of its negligent equipment, management, and operation of such engines.

There was a demurrer to the evidence of the plaintiff, and thereupon the jury assessed his damages at $2,368.70, subject to the opinion of the court upon the law. Upon consideration thereof, the learned judge of the circuit court overruled the demurrer, and gave judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the verdict of the jury. From this judgment the case is before us for review.

No reasonable doubt can be entertained that the fire was set out by sparks from the engines of the defendant. Where this fact is established, the law is well settled that the railway company is presumptively chargeable with negligence, and must assume the burden of proving that it had availed itself of the best mechanical contrivances and inventions in known practical use to prevent the burning of property by the escape of fire, and had exercised and observed every reasonable precaution in selecting competent employees and in operating its trains. Patterson v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 94 Va. 16, 26 S. E. 393; Kimball v. Borden, 95 Va. 203, 28 S. E. 207; White v. N. Y., etc., Ry. Co., 99 Va. 357, 38 S. E. 180.

Assuming that the defendant has shown that it had availed itself of the best mechanical contrivances to prevent the burning of property by the escape of fire, and had observed reasonable precaution in the selection of its employees, we come to the real question at issue—whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence in its operation of the engines and train here involved.

It appears that the plaintiff, R. S. Fritts, was conducting a mercantile business at Success, a station on the line of the railroad of the defendant company, and that the buildings occupied by him for this purpose were wooden structures situated about 35 feet from the railroad track. The fire which destroyed these buildings and their contents occurred on March 26, 1902, at 1 o'clock in the daytime, it being a bright, warm day, and in the midst of a very dry season. At the hour mentioned, a freight train of the defendant, consisting of 30 cars, carrying 841 tons of freight, and drawn by two engines, passed Success going south. The schedule time allowed 15 miles an hour for the speed of the train. It was behind its schedule time, and endeavoring to make it up, and did make up five minutes between White Post and Riverton, a distance of 10 miles.

When the train passed the property of the plaintiff at Success, it was running upgrade at the rate of 30 miles an hour, double its schedule speed, and laboring very hard. The two engines were throwing out an unusual quantity of sparks and cinders, and there was a high wind blowing directly from the engines in the direction of the plaintiff's property.

The question presented is, would the jury, from the facts stated, have been justified in drawing the conclusion that the defendant company was operating its engines negligently?

The defendant insists that the speed of its train was not negligence per se, and that in regulating such speed it was under no obligation to take cognizance of the dryness of the season, the strength and direction of the wind, the danger to the plaintiff's property, nor any of the surrounding conditions and circumstances which increased the danger to others from fire thrown out by its engines; that, if such obligations were imposed, the regular operation of railroads would be impossible.

This position is not reasonable, and is not sustained by authority. It is a well-settled principle of law that care in doing any particular act must be exercised in proportion to the danger attending the act. Mere rate of speed, though unusual, is not negligence per se. But taken in connection with other circumstances rate of speed may be dangerous, and a dangerous rate of speed is negligence. C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Clowes, 93 Va. 189, 24 S. E. 833. In this case Judge Keith says: "We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the mere rate of speed is negligence, although it may be unusual. It is true that 'negligence' is a relative term; that what may be negligence under one condition of facts would not only not be negligence, but the highest prudence, under a different condition of facts. The question for the jury always is, was the act, taken in connection with all of its attending circumstances, negligent?"

It cannot be doubted that it is the duty of a railway company to exercise every reasonable precaution to avoid injury to others by scattering fire along its right of way. It is equally clear, upon principle and authority, that when the danger of doing such injury is increased by the nearness of wooden buildings to its track, the accumulation of combustible material, either on its own or the adjoining land, the dryness of the season, and the direction of high winds, greater caution is required than is necessary when such conditions do not prevail. While ordinary care requires the employes of a railway company to recognize such conditions for the purpose of avoiding, as far as possible, injury to others, such care is to be exercised while at the same time giving due consideration to the interest of the railway service and the duty of the company to its patrons and the public. Thompson on Negligence, § 2263; Elliott on Railroads, § 1228.

In the section just cited from Elliott on Railroads, the law is stated thus: "It is a well-settled principle that care in doing any particular act must be exercised in proportion to the danger attending the act. Where the doing of any particular act is attended with unusual hazards, unusual care must be exercised, but, where the performance of the act is attended with only ordinary hazards, a less degree of care is required. These principles have frequently been applied in railway fire cases, for the circumstances under which fires are likely to occur and do occur are so varied that this degree of care must necessarily be employed. In proportion as the hazards increase, there should be a corresponding increase in the care exercised. Thus, it has been held that it is the duty of a railway company, in an unusually dry season, when all inflammable material is like tinder and liable to be set on fire from the smallest spark, to exercise greater precaution and care than in wet or damp seasons. So, when the wind is blowing directly from an engine towards wooden buildings or combustible material, greater precautions may be required; and when a train is running through a densely populated country or village, where there are a great number of buildings exposed to the hazards of fire, greater precaution must generally be exercised than is necessary when running through the country, where there are no buildings. Unusual precautions are not required, such as the purchase and use of tarpaulins or other similar means to protect against fire."

This statement of the law is fully sustained by the adjudicated cases. Marvin v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 79 Wis. 140, 47 N. W. 1123, 11 L. R. A. 506; Pittsburg, etc., R. R. Co. v. Noel, 77 Ind. 110; Fero v. Buffalo & State Line R. Co., 22 N. Y. 209, 78 Am. Dec. 178; Riley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 71 Minn. 425, 74 N. W. 171.

The case last cited was an action for damages caused by fire scattered from one of defendant's locomotives. It appeared that the country was unusually dry, and vegetation very inflammable, particularly along that part of the defendant's road where the fire in question occurred; also, that on the occasion there was a very high wind. Upon review, the Supreme Court of Minnesota held that it was not error to instruct the jury that "ordinary care" was a relative term, and depended on circumstances and conditions; that in passing upon the management of defendant's engine they were to consider the conditions then prevailing, such as the dryness of the grasses, stubble, and other vegetation near the track, and the speed and direction of the wind; but, on the other hand, they must give due consideration to the necessities of the railway service, and the duty of the defendant to its patrons and the public.

In the case at bar, as already seen, a freight train of the defendant with a load too great for one engine was speeding by the property of the plaintiff at the rate of 30 miles an hour—twice the speed contemplated by its schedule—and emitting an unusual quantity of sparks and cinders. There can be no question that, the harder an engine is worked, the more sparks and cinders it will discharge. The danger of fire is therefore necessarily augmented by the speed of a train, especially when it is pulling upgrade, as it was here. At this time the property of the plaintiff was greatly exposed to danger by reason of its nearness to the railroad, the dryness of the season, and a strong wind blowing directly to it from the passing engines. The burden was on the demurrant to show the exercise of reasonable care in the operation of its train and engines.

It does not appear that the speed adopted, particularly in view of the prevailing conditions, was a necessity to the railway service, or a duty owed by the defendant to its patrons or the public. This was an ordinary freight train, and not one word is offered in explanation of the high rate of speed at which it was moving. The fire was set out by the engines of the defendant, and it was for the jury to say whether or not the act, taken in connection with all the attending conditions and circumstances, was the result of a negligent operation of its engines by the employes of the defendant. A consideration of this question was withdrawn from the jury by the demurrer to the evidence, and we are unable to say that they would not have been justified in finding a verdict for the plaintiff.

Sundry exceptions were taken during the progress of the trial to the action of the circuit court in admitting certain evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff, and in refusing to strike out certain answers of the witness Robert Grigsby on his cross-examination. In the view we have taken of the case, it is unnecessary to pass upon these exceptions, for, if their solution were in favor of the defendant company, it could not alter the conclusion we have reached.

For these reasons the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

STEVENSON v. LEVINSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

APPEAL AND ERROR—RECORD—NEW TRIAL.

It cannot be held that the court erred in granting a new trial, a ground of the motion therefor being misdirection of the jury, and the instructions not being in the record.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Newport News.

Suit by one Stevenson against Max Levinson. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A. C. Garrett and Jno. W. Friend, for plaintiff in error. Lett & Massie, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Stevenson brought suit in the circuit court of the city of Newport News to recover damages for an injury received by him, due, as he alleges, to the negligence of Max Levinson. After the evidence was introduced, the court gave certain instructions, and the case was submitted to the jury, which found a verdict in favor of Stevenson for $650. Thereupon the defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict as being contrary to the law and the evidence, and because of misdirection on the part of the court.

The verdict was set aside and a new trial awarded, to which action of the court the plaintiff excepted, and made the evidence part of the record by a bill of exceptions. There was, however, no exception to the instructions given and refused by the court.

At a subsequent term the case was submitted to a jury, and, the plaintiff not introducing any testimony, a verdict was found for the defendant, upon which the court entered judgment, and the case is now before us for review upon the bill of exceptions taken at the first trial to the action of the court setting aside the verdict.

One of the grounds upon which the court was asked to set aside that verdict was that it had misdirected the jury. As the instructions given are not before us, we cannot say that the court erred in setting aside the verdict upon this ground. The presumption is in favor of the propriety of the court's action.

"The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is always presumed to be right until the contrary is shown, and a party in an appellate court, alleging error in the court below, must show it in the regular way, or the presumption in favor of its correctness must prevail." Burks, J., in Harman v. Lynchburg, 33 Grat. 43; Dove v. Commonwealth, 82 Va. 305; Riely, J., in Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 487, 22 S. E. 458.

In Rocky Mt. Loan & Tr. Co. v. Price, 103 Va. —, 49 S. E. 73, it appears that "one of the grounds for setting the verdict aside was misdirection of the jury, and the instructions given are not in the record. This court [said Judge Harrison] cannot, in the absence of the instructions, assume that they were free from objection, or pass at all upon that ground for setting the verdict aside."

We are bound down, therefore, to the conclusion that the circuit court committed no error in setting aside the verdict of the jury.

Upon the second trial no evidence was introduced by the plaintiff, and the verdict of the jury was for the defendant. In this, of course, there was no error.

Upon the whole case, the judgment is affirmed.

INTERSTATE COAL & IRON CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

TAXATION—MINERAL LANDS—ASSESSMENT AS UNDER IMPROVEMENT.

Under Laws 1902-04, p. 320, c. 217, providing for the assessment every two years of mineral lands at their fair cash value: First, of such portion of each tract which is improved and under development; second, of the improvements, fixtures, and machinery on each tract; and, third, the area and fair cash value of such portion of each tract as shall not be under development—the portion of a tract underlaid with coal is to be assessed as under improvement, where coal mines have been opened on it, and not such portion merely as will be deprived of coal within the next two years.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Proceeding by the Interstate Coal & Iron Company against the commonwealth to correct an assessment. There was an adverse judgment, and the company brings error. Affirmed.

Bullitt & Kelley, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General and W. W. G. Dotson, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. The Interstate Coal & Iron Company is the owner of a tract of coal land lying in Wise county, containing 1,470 acres. In the year 1903 the commissioner of the revenue assessed one-half of this land, 735 acres, as being under development, at the sum of $200 per acre—a total valuation of $147,000—and the remainder at $20 per acre, amounting to $14,714.80.

On the 9th of December, 1903, the coal and iron company, having given the commonwealth's attorney of Wise county proper notice, made motion before the circuit court to correct this assessment, and to assess only 65 acres thereof as under improvement.

The case came on to be heard, and it appeared from the evidence that only 421 acres of the tract was underlaid with coal, and that only about 65 acres thereof will be mined within the next two years; that $200 per acre is a fair valuation of that portion of the land which should be considered as under improvement, that the coal company has upon the land 200 coke ovens, which together with the buildings, machinery, and other structures, are assessed to the Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company, the lessee of the Interstate Coal & Iron Company; that the coal vein upon the land will produce about 8,000 tons of coal per acre, and that the Interstate Coal & Iron Company receives as royalty upon the coal 10 cents per ton, making about $800 per acre which it will receive for every acre of coal which shall be mined; that about one-third of the coal mined from said property is shipped as coal; and that the balance is made into coke; and that various other companies which make about the same proportion of coke and coal have been assessed in Wise county as having about two acres of land under improvement for each coke oven owned by such company. And thereupon, "the court being of opinion that, in order to determine how much land is under improvement, it is right to consider the number of coke ovens being operated on the property, and the output of coal therefrom, and that to consider two acres as under improvement for each coke oven, where two-thirds of the coal is made into coke, is a fair way to estimate the quantity of land under improvement, and being further of opinion that all such companies ought to be taxed ratably, upon the basis of the number of coke ovens operated by each, and the output made by them, respectively, it is therefore considered by the court that 421 acres of the said land—this being all thereof which carries the coal—should be considered as under improvement; and it is further considered by the court that the said assessment be corrected, and that 421 acres of the said land be assessed at $200 per acre, and that the balance of the land, to wit, 1,049.74 acres, be assessed at $20 per acre, and that the taxes be extended upon this corrected assessment."

Thereupon the Interstate Coal & Iron Company appealed to this court, and assigns as error the ruling of the court that 421 acres of its land should be considered as under improvement, instead of holding that only 65 acres should be considered as under improvement, and be assessed at $200 per acre.

The assessment was made under an act entitled "An act to provide for the separate and special assessment of taxes on mineral lands and on the improvements, fixtures and machinery thereon," approved May 13, 1903 (Laws 1902-4, p. 320, c. 217), which is as follows:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia, as follows: The several commissioners of the revenue in this state shall on or before the first day of August nineteen hundred and three, and every second year thereafter on or before the fifteenth day of May, specially and separately, assess at the fair cash value all mineral lands, and the improvements, fixtures and machinery thereon, within their respective districts separately from other lands charged thereon, and shall extend the taxes upon said lands, improvements, fixtures and machinery, assessed as aforesaid, at the rate fixed by law upon tangible property.

"Sec. 2. The commissioner, in assessing mineral lands, shall set forth upon the land book, first, the area and the fair cash value thereof, first of such portion of each tract which is improved and under development; second, the fair cash value of the improvements, fixtures and machinery upon each tract; and, third, the area and the fair cash value of such portion of each tract as shall not be under development. If the surface of the land is held by one person, and the coal, iron, minerals, mineral water, gas or oils under the surface be held by another person, the estate therein of each, and the relative fair cash value of their respective interests shall be ascertained by the commissioner. If the surface of the land and the coal, iron, minerals, mineral waters, gas or oils under the surface be owned by the same person, the commissioner shall ascertain the fair cash value of the land, inclusive of the coal, iron, minerals, mineral waters, gas or oils, and assess the same at such ascertained value."

It appears from the act that the commissioners of revenue are required on the 1st day of August, 1903, and every second year thereafter, on or before the 15th day of May, to assess all mineral lands at their fair cash value: First, of such portion of each tract which is "improved and under development"; and, secondly, of the improvements, fixtures, and machinery upon each tract; and, third, the area and fair cash value of such portion of each tract as shall not be under development.

What is the meaning of the words "improved and under development," as used in the statute? It is evidently something different from "improvements, fixtures and machinery." According to the appellant, only so much of the land as will be deprived of its coal within the next two years after the assessment can be considered as under improvement, while the court was of opinion that, by opening the mines upon the lands, the cash value of the entire body of land underlain with coal was enhanced, and took as an index by which the extent of the improvement was to be measured the number of coke ovens in operation. At the end of two years, if the coal under 65 acres shall have been exhausted, that area ought to be deducted from the aggregate of the mineral lands under improvement, the result of which will be that the owners of mineral lands will pay taxes upon the fair cash value of the land, inclusive of the coal, iron, and minerals, as the statute directs, and will at the end of each period of two years be relieved from taxation upon that land from which the coal has been taken.

The statute fixes no other standard than that the commissioner shall ascertain its fair cash value, and there is no evidence to show that the mode adopted by the commissioner and by the court is not in itself proper, or which suggests to this court a more fair and just method of reaching the object at which the statute aims.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

CHADDUCK v. BURKE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

PUBLIC OFFICERS—APPOINTMENT—POWER OF COURTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—VACANCIES—HOLDING OVER AFTER EXPIRATION OF TERM.

1. A court has no inherent power to appoint to office, and a statute conferring the power must be strictly pursued.

2. Under Acts 1902-04, p. 742, c. 482, § 95 [Va. Code 1904, p. 59], which provides that each county judge shall, on the recommendation of the board of supervisors, appoint a superintendent of the poor, and which declares that the judge may reject the recommendation, and, unless the board recommends another person within 30 days, he shall fill the office by his own appointment, an appointment by a judge, made in the same order which rejects a recommendation of the board, is void.

3. Acts 1902-04, p. 745, c. 482, § 106 [Va. Code 1904, p. 62], which provides that when a vacancy occurs in any county office the same shall be filled by the court or judge thereof, has reference alone to vacancies occurring during the term of an office by death, resignation, removal, and the like, and does not contemplate the filling of an office for the ensuing term on the expiration of the preceding term, where the incumbent holds the office for a fixed term and until his successor has qualified.

4. A circuit court has no authority, under Act December 18, 1903, as amended by Act March 15, 1904 [Va. Code 1904, p. 59, § 95], which provides that each circuit court, on a recommendation of the board of supervisors, shall in November, 1907, and every fourth year thereafter, or at any time before or after November, 1907, in case a vacancy exists, appoint a superintendent of the poor, to appoint before November, 1907, a superintendent of the poor to succeed the incumbent holding over after the expiration of his term ending January 1, 1904.

Error to Circuit Court, Culpeper County.

Petition for mandamus by Roy C. Burke to require John M. Chadduck to surrender an office. There was a judgment awarding a peremptory writ, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Grimsley & Miller and Jeffries & Lawless, for plaintiff in error. Barbour & Rixey, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This writ of error brings before us a controversy over the office of superintendent of the poor of Culpeper county. By the judgment of the lower court a peremptory writ of mandamus was awarded, requiring the plaintiff in error to surrender the office in question, together with all of the property held in connection therewith, to the defendant in error. The correctness of this conclusion is the subject for our consideration.

It appears that John M. Chadduck, the plaintiff in error, had held the office in controversy for several terms immediately preceding this litigation. Under the law as it was prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, the term of office of superintendent of the poor began on the 1st day of July and expired with the 30th day of June four years thereafter. The last term for which Chadduck had been appointed would have expired with the 30th day of June, 1903, but under the new Constitution the term of this office, like others, was made to begin on the 1st day of January, 1904, and, in order to meet the change, section 11 of the schedule [Va. Code 1904, p. cclxxvi] provided that all county officers, and their successors who were in office when the Constitution went into effect should hold their respective offices, and discharge their respective duties, and exercise the respective powers thereof until January 1, 1904. Section 17 of the schedule provided [Va. Code 1904, p. cclxxviii] that all officers whose terms of office are extended by this schedule, who are required by law to give bond, shall, prior to the expiration of the terms for which they were originally chosen, enter into a new bond, with like conditions, for the faithful performance of their duties for the extended term, and until their successors shall have been duly chosen. Section 33 of the Constitution [Va. Code 1904, p. ccxv] provides that all officers elected or appointed shall continue to discharge the duties of their offices, after the terms to same have expired, until their successors have qualified.

The plaintiff in error executed the new bond as required, and hence, under the provisions mentioned, his regular term, which would have expired with June 30, 1903, was extended to the 1st day of January, 1904; and he was authorized to discharge the duties of his office until his successor had been duly chosen and had qualified.

The provision for filling this office when it should expire on the 1st day of January, 1904, is found in section 95 of an act passed by the General Assembly on the 18th day of December, 1903. Acts 1902-04, p. 742, c. 482 [Va. Code 1904, p. 59]. It is there provided that each county judge, upon the recommendation of the board of supervisors of each county in which he holds court, shall, between the passage of the act and the 1st day of January, 1904, appoint for each county in which he holds his court one superintendent of the poor. It is further provided that the judge may, if he thinks proper, reject the recommendation; and, unless the board recommends another person suitable, in his opinion, for the office, within 30 days after the recommendation has been rejected, he shall fill the office by his own appointment in term or in vacation.

On the 31st day of December, 1903, the board of supervisors recommended for appointment as superintendent of the poor Roy C. Burke, the defendant in error, for the term of four years commencing January 1, 1904. On the 11th day of January the judge rejected this recommendation, spreading, as required, his reasons therefor upon the order book of his court, and proceeded by the same order, without any further recommendation by the board, to appoint the plaintiff in error for the four-year term beginning January 1, 1904. A court has no original or inherent power to appoint to office. Its sole power to perform the act is derived from the Legislature. The statute conferring the power must therefore be strictly pursued when the power is exercised. It is manifest that the appointment made by the county judge was void, and of no effect, because of the failure to observe the requirement of the statute, which was mandatory, providing that he should make the appointment on the recommendation of the board of supervisors, unless the board should fail to recommend a person, in his judgment suitable, for 30 days after his rejection of the preceding recommendation, in which latter case alone had he the power to fill the office by his own appointment.

But it is further contended that after the 1st day of January, 1904, the period to which the term of this office was extended by the Constitution, no appointment having been made by the county judge for the next ensuing term, there existed a vacancy in the office, which the judge was authorized to fill under section 106 of the act of December 18, 1903 (Acts 1902-04, p. 745, c. 482 [Va. Code 1904, p. 62]), which, so far as needful here, provides that, when a vacancy occurs in any county office, the same shall be filled by the court of the county in which it occurs, or the judge thereof in vacation. The term of office of any person appointed under this section shall commence as soon as he shall qualify, and continue for the unexpired term of such office.

It is said that the word "vacancy," as applied to an office, has no technical meaning; that an office is vacant or not, according to whether it is occupied by one who has a legal right to hold it, and to exercise the powers and perform the duties pertaining thereto. A vacant office is one without an incumbent. Vacancy in office is one thing and term is another. An office may be vacant and filled many times during a term of four years, but it cannot become vacant at the end of a term where the incumbent is authorized to hold over, for the instant the successor is duly appointed and has qualified he becomes entitled to the office, and there has been no hiatus at all. So long, therefore, as an office is supplied with an incumbent in the manner provided by the Constitution or law, who is legally qualified to exercise the powers and perform the duties which appertain to it, the office is not vacant. Section 106 of the act under consideration contemplates and has reference alone to vacancies occurring during the term of an office by death, resignation, removal, and the like. It does not refer to or contemplate the filling of an office for the ensuing term upon the expiration of the preceding term. That was fully provided for by section 95 of the same act, which has already been adverted to.

The regular term of the plaintiff in error expired, under the law, on the 1st day of January, 1904, but he was just as fully authorized by law to hold the office and exercise the powers and perform the duties appertaining to it after that time, until his successor had been duly appointed and qualified, as he was before the expiration of his regular term. Indeed, the period between the expiration of his term and the qualification of his successor is as much a part of the incumbent's term of office as the fixed statutory period, when the law provides that he shall hold until his successor qualifies.

As said in a California case, the plaintiff in error has, under the law, "a fixed term and a contingent term." He holds absolutely for the full period of his regular term, and contingently after that until his successor is appointed and qualified. It is said that the law abhors vacancies in public offices, and that great precautions are taken to guard against their occurrence. Hence it is, no doubt, that we find so generally adopted the provision that an incumbent shall, at the end of his term, continue to hold the office and exercise its powers and perform its duties until his successor has been duly appointed and qualified. And also the statutory provisions for filling vacancies occurring during a term, which are emergencies often requiring prompt action. Such provisions are founded upon necessity, to prevent vexatious embarrassments in the public service. As far as our investigation has gone, the great weight of authority upholds the view that, wherever the law provides for an incumbent holding over until his successor has been appointed and qualified, there is no vacancy in the office at the expiration of the fixed term. Ex parte Lawhorne, 18 Grat. 85; Ex parte Meredith, 33 Grat. 119, 122, 36 Am. Rep. 771; Mechem on Pub. Officers, § 126 et seq.; Throop on Pub. Officers, § 308 et seq.; Tappan v. Gray, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 507; People v. Van Horne, 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 515; State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 16 N. E. 384, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663; People v. Ward, 107 Cal. 236, 40 Pac. 538; Smith v. Askew, 48 Ark. 82, 2 S. W. 349; Baxter v. Latimer, 116 Mich. 356, 74 N. The case of Johnson v. Mahn, 77 Va. 265, is cited for the proposition that a vacancy exists, which can be supplied by the appointing power for filling vacancies, when the incumbent of an office is holding over, by authority of law, until his successor qualifies. In that case Judge Richardson does employ language justifying this contention; but its use does not appear to have been necessary to the decision of the question there involved, and the dictum is not sound, is contrary to the current of authority, and cannot be followed as a precedent.

Upon reason and authority we hold that there was no vacancy in the office of superintendent of the poor of Culpeper county on the 11th day of January, 1904; that the judge of that county was authorized to fill under section 106 of the act of December 18, 1903; that his action in attempting to fill the office was void; and that the plaintiff in error continued, as the incumbent under the law, in the rightful possession of the office, awaiting the lawful appointment and qualification of his successor.

On the 19th day of April, 1904, the circuit judge of Culpeper county, upon the recommendation of the board of supervisors, entered an order appointing the defendant in error, Roy C. Burke, to fill the office in controversy.

Under the provisions of the schedule of the present Constitution, and of section 3058b, p. 1626, of Va. Code 1904, the circuit courts, created by the Constitution, succeeded to all the power that the county courts had under section 95 of the act of December 18, 1903. This was the only source from which the circuit court derived authority to make an appointment to this office. Section 95 of the act mentioned was amended and reenacted on the 15th of March, 1904, and is now found as section 95, p. 59, in Va. Code 1904. As already seen, the law conferring the power of appointment upon a court or the judge thereof measures and limits the extent of that power. We must therefore look to section 95, as amended on the 15th of March, 1904, for the authority of the circuit court of Culpeper county to fill the office in question on the 19th day of April, 1904.

It seems to be plain from section 95, as amended, that the only power conferred upon the circuit court, or the judge thereof, with respect to the office of superintendent of the poor, is that in November, 1907, he shall, upon the recommendation of the board of supervisors, appoint a suitable person to fill the office for the ensuing term beginning January 1, 1908; and that every fourth year thereafter he shall, upon such recommendation, again appoint for the next ensuing term. The act further provides that at any time before or after November, 1907, the court, or judge thereof, shall fill vacancies that may occur in the office. So that the only power the circuit court or the judge thereof had until November, 1907, touching the office in question, was to fill any vacancy that might occur therein. And, inasmuch as no vacancy existed in the office on the 19th day of April, 1904, the order appointing Roy C. Burke was invalid, and of no effect.

Upon the whole case our conclusion is that John M. Chaddock, the plaintiff in error, is the rightful incumbent of the office of superintendent of the poor of Culpeper county, holding the same by authority of law, and that his term cannot be disturbed until a successor has been duly appointed and qualified. In view of the high testimony borne by the record to his experience, fidelity, and efficiency, the result reached cannot be regretted, so far as the welfare of the public service is concerned.

For these reasons the judgment complained of must be reversed, and, this court proceeding to enter such judgment as the lower court ought to have entered, it will be ordered that the writ of mandamus prayed for by the defendant in error be denied, and his petition dismissed.

LEWIS v. APPERSON.

DOWER—RELINQUISHMENT—DEED—ESTOPPEL.

Code 1887, § 2502 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1272], provides that, when a husband and wife have signed a writing purporting to convey real estate, it may be recorded, and shall then operate to convey the wife's right of dower. In a suit to subject an owner's land to liens, none of which were superior to his wife's dower right, a decree for the sale of the land was made. The wife joined the commissioner in executing a deed to the purchaser, reciting that the wife relinquished to the purchaser her rights in the premises. The deed was acknowledged and admitted to record. The wife was not guilty of any fraud whereby the purchaser was misled. The evidence did not show that she induced the purchaser to purchase the premises. Held, that the wife was not barred from claiming her dower right by her deed under the statute, inasmuch as her husband did not join therein, or by estoppel.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Prince William County.

Suit by Mrs. P. M. Apperson against H. T. Lewis. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jeffries & Hill and Grimsley & Miller, for appellant. Barbour & Rixey, for appellee.

KEITH, P. The suit of Partlow v. John H. Apperson was instituted in the circuit court of Culpeper county to subject the lands of the defendant to the payment of liens, amounting to the sum of $1,872, none of which were superior to the widow's right of dower. Under decrees entered in this cause, the land was offered for sale, and purchased by H. W. Lewis at $12 per acre, amounting in the aggregate to $2,232. On the 14th of September, 1886, the commissioners reported this sale, which was duly confirmed, and by a subsequent decree a reference was made to one of the master commissioners "to take, state, and report to the court an account of the present value of the contingent right of dower of Mrs. P. M. Apperson, wife of John H. Apperson, in the land sold in this cause, and in taking said account said John H. Apperson and wife shall have notice."

Mrs. Apperson, the wife of John H. Apperson, had been at that time married about 45 years. She was older than her husband; she was not a party to the original bill of Partlow v. Apperson; the preponderance of the evidence does not show that she knew of the sale of her husband's land until after it had been made, nor does it show that she had any notice of proceedings under the rule to commute her contingent right of dower. A highly respectable witness states that the subpoena was issued to her, that it was given to her husband to execute, and that he had seen it in the papers, with service acknowledged in the handwriting of Mrs. Apperson. The paper itself has disappeared, and Mrs. Apperson, on the other hand, testifies that she never acknowledged service of the commissioner's notice, and that she never was asked to do so. It does not appear by the preponderance of the evidence that there was an effort to sell the land free from the claim of dower. There is the testimony of witnesses to that effect, but other witnesses are positive that the auctioneer proclaimed more than once that the land was sold subject to dower. The purchaser swears that he bought understanding that he was to get a complete title, and that he paid $12 per acre for land for which he would not have paid more than $6 an acre subject to dower rights. He admits, however, that he knew that Mrs. Apperson was living and had a contingent right of dower in this land.

It appears that the land sold for more than enough to pay all the liens reported against it, together with the sum of $171.87, which the commissioner ascertained to be the value of the contingent right of dower. The commissioner's report, showing the disbursement of the fund in his hands, contains this item: "By cash paid Mrs. P. M. Apperson, present value of her contingent right of dower, she having united in deed to purchaser, $171.87;" and at the foot of the report the commissioner of sale makes this statement: "In paying the present value of the contingent right of dower of P. M. Apperson [the widow], your commissioner only paid her the principal sum ascertained by Commissioner Stallard's report ($171.87). As her husband is still living, he is entitled to the interest, and it was therefore included in the amount of balance paid him, as will be seen above." The commissioner of sale states in his deposition that "I paid her the money, and took hers and her husband's joint receipt for the two amounts paid them. I drew the receipt, and both of them signed it in my presence." Mrs. Apperson, however, says that, "as a matter of fact, Mr. Apperson received all of the money, and I did not have the use of any of it"; and, referring to the commissioner's deed in which she united, and which we will more particularly hereafter advert to, says: "If I had understood it, I would not have signed it. I never employed any lawyer about this matter in my husband's lifetime, and never authorized my husband to do so, and never consulted any lawyer on the subject."

On the 30th of May, 1893, when her husband was still living, the commissioner of sale in the chancery cause of Partlow v. Apperson executed a deed to the purchaser, in which Mrs. Apperson united, conveying this tract of land, and in it there appears this recital: "And whereas the said commissioner was directed to pay to P. M. Apperson, wife of J. H. Apperson, the commuted part of her contingent right of dower: Now this deed witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the premises and of the payment in full of the purchase money aforesaid by the said parties of the second part, the said commissioner as aforesaid doth give, grant, sell and convey with special warranty of title unto the said parties of the second part the aforementioned tract or parcel of land, and the said P. M. Apperson doth hereby relinquish and convey unto the said parties of the second part all right, title and interest she may have in said land in consideration of the commuted value thereof paid her by said commissioner"—signed by the commissioner and P. M. Apperson, duly acknowledged before a commissioner in chancery on the 18th of September, 1893, and admitted to record on October 24th of the same year.

On the 16th of December, 1898, John H. Apperson died, and in June, 1901, Mrs. Apperson filed her bill, claiming dower. The purchaser answered, denying her right, and from the record in the former suit of Partlow v. Apperson, which was exhibited with the bill, and the testimony of the witnesses, the facts appear that have already been related. The circuit court held that Mrs. Apperson was entitled to the relief asked for, and from that decree an appeal was allowed.

By section 2502 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1272], in force at the date of this deed, it is provided that "when a husband and his wife have signed a writing, purporting or contracting to convey any estate, real or personal, or any writing authorizing another to convey, or contract to convey any such estate, such writing may be admitted to record as to each of them according to the provisions of section twenty-five hundred or twenty-five hundred and one, and when it shall have been so admitted to record as to the husband as well as the wife, or if it be a writing executed under a power of attorney, when such writing as well as such power of attorney shall have been admitted to record it shall operate to convey from the wife her right of dower in the real estate embraced therein, and pass from her and her representatives all right, title and interest of every nature which, at the date of such writing, she may have in any estate conveyed or embraced therein, as effectually as if she were, at the date, an unmarried woman. Such writing shall not operate any further upon the wife or her representatives by means of any covenant or warranty contained therein which is not made with reference to her separate estate as a source of credit, or which, if it relate to her said right of dower or to any estate or interest conveyed other than her own, is not made with reference to her separate estate as a source of credit."

It is plain that the deed of the 30th of May, 1893, though signed, acknowledged, and admitted to record as to Mrs. Apperson, was not of itself effectual to bar her right of dower, her husband not being a party to it. It is claimed, however, that this deed, together with the conduct of Mrs. Apperson in connection with the transaction under investigation, were such as to bar her claim.

In volume 14 of Cyc. of Law and Procedure, p. 931, it is said that, "As a general rule, acts of the wife during coverture, to operate as a bar of dower by way of estoppel, must in effect amount to one of the modes pointed out by the common law or recognized by statute as constituting a bar. It has been held, however, that acts and conduct sufficient to constitute an equitable estoppel will bar the right."

In Martin v. Martin, 22 Ala. at page 105, it is said: "Where the subject-matter of litigation arises out of a contract, either express or implied, it may be granted that a married woman may be estopped, like other parties, by acts or declarations upon which others have been induced to act, and against the truth of which it would work fraud and injustice for her to aver; but this doctrine can have no application to dower, which does not arise out of nor is dependent upon any contract. On the contrary, 'it is an estate which arises solely by operation of law, and not by force of any contract, express or implied, between the parties. It is the silent effect of the relation entered into by them; not as in itself incidental to the marriage relation, or as implied by the marriage contract, but merely as that contract calls into operation the positive institution of the municipal law.' Park on Dower, 5. It has for its object the sustenance of the widow and the nurture and education of her children, if she have any, and is favored in law. Indeed, such was the favor with which it was regarded by the ancient common law that it grew into a maxim 'that the law favoreth three things—life, liberty, and dower.' Dower, being an institution of positive law, can only be defeated or barred by some of the modes pointed out by the law." In support of the law as thus stated, there are cited Cro. Jac. 111; 9 Co. 170.

In Rannells v. Gerner, 80 Mo. 474, it is said that "the Legislature has provided but one mode whereby a married woman may relinquish her dower in the real estate of her husband, and that is by their joint deed, acknowledged and certified"; and, with reference to the doctrine of estoppel as applied to such cases, the court says: "Respecting the equitable subject-matter of defendant's answer, it is the established law of this state that estoppels in pais are not applicable to femes covert, except where regarded as femes sole, in consequence of possessing separate estates." In support of this a large number of authorities are cited, and the court then observes that "Isolated cases may perhaps be found supporting the views advanced by defendant's counsel, but they are opposed by the authorities heretofore cited, and, indeed, by the great current of authority."

In Grim's Appeal, 105 Pa. 375, the court said, speaking upon this subject: "If the heirs had been sui juris, they would, under these circumstances, certainly be precluded now from asserting a right inconsistent with the course which by their encouragement they induced the executor to pursue. It is objected, however, that certain of the heirs are married women, and, as it does not appear that they were joined by their husbands in these acts of approval and encouragement, they are protected by their coverture. It is certainly true, as shown in a long line of cases, that a contract, void under the disability of coverture, cannot be made good by estoppel; neither a fraudulent denial of coverture, payment of purchase money, nor silent acquiescence in the making of improvements, nor all of these together, can, by way of estoppel, give validity to a contract void upon this ground."

In Herman on Estoppel, at section 581, the law is thus stated: "In order to give rise to an estoppel by deed, the parties must ordinarily be sui juris, competent to make it effectual as a contract, and the instrument so executed as to be binding in law. The deed of a married woman will not operate as an estoppel where it falls as a grant, or estop her from setting up an estate, obtained subsequently or by purchase, against the grantee. This, like the grant, is limited to the estate the wife has at the time, and does not extend to an interest acquired after the execution of the deed, for she cannot bind herself subsequently by any covenant. Where the deed of a married woman falls as a conveyance from the nonconcurrence of her husband, it is ineffectual for all purposes, and cannot be relied upon as an estoppel or ground of recovery in a subsequent controversy. By common law the warranty deed of a married woman, though executed in such form as to convey her title, did not operate against her by way of covenant or estoppel, because she was incapable of binding herself by covenants of warranty or by agreement to convey her real estate."

In some of the states, as appears from the author just cited, these restrictions are substantially abolished by statute; so that a mortgage deed given by a married woman with her husband's consent, with covenants of warranty, will inure, by way of estoppel, against her in cases of title subsequently acquired. But with us there is no such statute. On the contrary, it is expressly provided that, even where the husband is a party to the deed in which the wife unites, it shall not operate any further upon her or her representatives "by means of any covenant or warranty contained therein which is not made with reference to her separate estate as a source of credit, or which, if it relate to her said right of dower, or to any estate or interest conveyed other than her own, is not made with reference to her separate estate as a source of credit." And here it may be well to remark that the contingent dower interest of the wife was not, at the time Mrs. Apperson united in the deed with the commissioner, a part of the separate estate of a married woman.

In Lowell v. Daniels, 2 Gray, 161, 61 Am. Dec. 448, the court, speaking upon this subject, says: "The material question at issue between the parties is whether a married woman and her heirs may be barred of her estate by an estoppel in pais. She can make no valid contract in relation to her estate; her separate deed of it is absolutely void; any covenants in such separate deed would be likewise void. If she were to covenant that she was sole, was seised in her own right, and had full power to convey, such covenants would avail the grantee nothing. She could neither be sued upon them nor estopped by them. The law has rendered her incapable of such contract, and she finds in her incapacity her protection; her safety in her weakness. Her most solemn acts, done in good faith and for full consideration, cannot affect her interest in the estate, or that of the husband and children. * * * We think a married woman cannot do indirectly what she cannot do directly; cannot do by acts in pais what she cannot do by deed; cannot do wrongfully what she cannot do rightfully. She cannot by her own act enlarge her legal capacity to convey an estate. This doctrine of estoppel in pais would seem to be stated broadly enough when it is said that such estoppel is as effectual as the deed of the party. To say that one may, by acts in the country, by admission, by concealment, or by silence, in effect do what could not be done by deed, would be practically to dispense with all the limitations the law has imposed upon the capacity of infants or married women to alienate their estates."

In Drury v. Foster, 2 Wall. 24, 17 L. Ed. 780, Mr. Justice Nelson said: "It is conceded in this case that the instrument of Mrs.

Foster, signed and acknowledged, was not a deed or mortgage; that, on the contrary, it was a blank paper; and that, in order to make it available as a deed or mortgage, it must be taken to have been signed and acknowledged with the design to have the blanks filled by the husband, or some other person, before the delivery. We agree, if she was competent to convey her real estate by signing and acknowledging the deed in blank and delivering the same to an agent, with an express or implied authority to fill up the blank and perfect the conveyance, that its validity could not well be controverted. Although it was at one time doubted whether a parol authority was adequate to authorize an alteration or addition to a sealed instrument, the better opinion at this day is that the power is sufficient. But there are two insuperable objections to this view in the present case. First, Mrs. Foster was disabled in law from delegating a person, either in writing or by parol, to fill up the blanks and deliver the mortgage; and, second, there could be no acknowledgment of the deed, within the requisitions of the statute, until the blanks were filled and the instrument complete. Till then, there was no deed to be acknowledged. The acts of the feme covert and of the officers were nullities, and the form of acknowledgment annexed as much waste paper as the blank mortgage itself, at the time of signing. It is insisted, however, that Mrs. Foster should be estopped from denying that she had signed and acknowledged the mortgage. The answer to this is that to permit an estoppel to operate against her would be a virtual repeal of the statute that extends to her this protection, and also a denial of the disability of the common law that forbids the conveyance of her real estate by procuration. It would introduce into the law an entirely new system of conveyances of the real property of femes covert. Instead of the transaction being a real one in conformity with established law, conveyances by signing and acknowledging blank sheets of paper would be the only formalities requisite. The consequences of such a system are apparent, and need not be stated."

There are authorities which, conceding that a married woman cannot be estopped by her contract, hold that she may be estopped by a fraudulent act. It is needless to discuss this distinction. It will be time enough to undertake to define its extent when a case arises which renders it necessary. Mrs. Apperson was in this case guilty of no fraud, in relying upon which the appellant could have been misled to his prejudice. She has established a prima facie right to the relief sought by her, and the burden was upon those who sought to defeat it to establish all the elements of an estoppel, assuming that such a defense would have been effectual. The preponderance of the evidence does not show that Mrs. Apperson, by word or deed, induced or encouraged Lewis in the purchase of this property. It does not show that she even had knowledge of his being the purchaser until after the sale was made to him. It is not shown by a preponderance of the evidence that she received the money in lieu of her contingent right of dower, or, if she did, that she was advised with respect to her rights.

We are of opinion that the deed of the commissioner, in which Mrs. Apperson united, did not convey her dower; that she is not estopped by her conduct from asserting her right; that under the circumstances disclosed in this record we cannot burden that right with the money which she is alleged to have received, during her coverture, in lieu of her contingent right of dower; and that, upon the whole case, the decree of the circuit court should be affirmed.

ADAMS v. JENNINGS.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION—SPLITTING UP DEMAND—JUDGMENTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

A claim due under a contract exceeding the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace was split up into several amounts, each of which was within his jurisdiction. Suits were brought before a justice, and judgments recovered for the amounts claimed. The debtor had notice of the proceedings, but made no objections thereto. Held that, in proceedings after judicial sale of the debtor's land for distribution of the proceeds, the judgments were not subject to collateral attack by a subsequent judgment creditor of the same debtor, though the debtor might have obtained a writ of prohibition to prevent the justice from proceeding for want of jurisdiction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Proceedings by one Jennings for a rule against one Adams to show cause why he should not be debarred from participating in the purchase money on the sale of land under an execution. From a decree debarring Adams from participating in the purchase money on the ground that his judgments were invalid, Adams appeals. Reversed.

Caskie & Coleman, Jas. H. Guthrie, and A. S. Hester, for appellant. Frank Nelson and Wilson & Manson, for appellee.

KEITH, P. The question for decision in this case arises upon a decree entered in the chancery suit of Canada v. Ward, pending in the circuit court for Campbell county, rejecting certain judgments obtained by Adams against Vandegrift before a justice of the peace, three of which were for the sum of $100 each, and the other for $80.30, with interest and costs. These judgments stood upon the office judgment docket of Campbell county, and the commissioner refused to report them, upon the ground that the justice before whom they were recovered had no right to split up the claim of R. E. Adams in order to bring it within his jurisdiction.

The land in this suit was sold to Burruss, who, being advised of the existence of these judgments, and that Adams had not been made a party to the cause, excepted to the confirmation of the report of sale; and the court awarded a rule against Adams, requiring him "to appear and show cause why he should not be debarred from participating in the purchase money."

In answer to the rule, Adams appeared, and stated that the judgments in controversy were recovered by him at the date mentioned, and were for the several amounts stated in the report; that they were in all respects valid, and had never been called in question by Vandegrift, the defendant in the judgments. Adams insisted that these judgments could not be collaterally inquired into, and that no testimony with respect to them was admissible; but it was agreed that, if the law upon that point should be otherwise, the facts with reference to the judgments were as follows:

"Beauregard Vandegrift was indebted to R. E. Adams in the sum of $380.30 under a contract for the purchase of timber, which debt arose out of one contract, and was all due at one time. After said debt was due, the claim was sent by the creditor, Adams, to G. R. Nicholls, a constable of Campbell county, for collection. Nicholls, without the knowledge of Adams, cut up the original debt into four notes, three for $100 each, and the fourth for $80.30, all falling due on February 20, 1897, and on the 20th of March, 1897, obtained four judgments on the said notes, three of which were for the sum of $100 each, and the fourth for $80.30, before J. W. Lindsay, a justice of the peace of Campbell county, abstracts of which are filed in the record."

When the case came on to be heard, the judge of the circuit court was of opinion that those judgments were invalid, and from that decree this appeal was taken.

In addition to the facts already stated, it is pertinent to observe that the judgments are in all respects regular—that is, there is no question that the amount represented by them was due; that Beauregard Vandegrift was fully cognizant of all that was done with respect to the debt, and had notice of the proceeding before the justice, and made no objection thereto, and, so far as this record discloses, is not now objecting to the claim of appellant, Adams.

One of the cases relied upon in support of the decree of the circuit court is Hutson v. Lowry et al., reported in 2 Va. Cas. 42. In that case it appears that A. owed B. $80, and gave four several single bills, for $20 each, payable at one day, and at one, two, and three months, after date, respectively, and that, after the last note fell due, B. obtained warrants from a justice to recover these several sums. "Held, that A. may obtain from the superior court a writ of prohibition to prevent the justice from proceeding, because the justice has not jurisdiction in the cases, all the notes constituting only one debt; that, if the money is in the hands of the constable, the prohibition will still go, the defendant having given notice to the constable not to pay over the money to the plaintiff."

The grounds upon which that case went were "(1) that the creditor, by choosing to sever the debt into parts, deprives the debtor of the benefit of counsel, who are not admitted, nor themselves or their fees noticed, before a single justice; (2) the creditor thereby chooses whether he will oust the defendant of the benefit of jury trial; and (3) the creditor thereby eventually might choose whether his debtor should have a writ of error in the supreme tribunal of Virginia, although the amount in controversy is of sufficient magnitude to admit of an appeal or writ of error." The court held that the justice had not jurisdiction to render the several judgments mentioned, and awarded the writ of prohibition.

In James v. Stokes and James v. Harris, 77 Va. 225, the case of Hutson v. Lowry was followed; the syllabus stating that "the law limiting the jurisdiction of justices is founded on public policy, and no manipulation of a debt can affect such jurisdiction; that the limitation by law cannot be changed by one or by both of the parties, and such efforts have been held to be in fraudem legis; and that the views in the case of Hutson v. Lowry are founded upon the soundest principles of public policy, and are within the plainest terms of the law." In that case, also, the writ of prohibition was awarded.

In all the cases to which our attention has been called, the remedy resorted to has been the writ of prohibition, sued out by the debtor. In the case before us the question is raised by an exception to a commissioner's report, interposed by a subsequent judgment creditor, and not by the debtor; and the appellant, Adams, was brought before the court by a rule to show cause, entered at the instance of a purchaser of real estate, who desired to protect his title.

Mr. Minor (part 1, vol. 4, p. 219), in treating of the subject, says that where an entire claim exceeds $20, and has been divided into several parts, each not exceeding $20, and separate securities are taken therefor, and all are due, it seems the better opinion that courts of record cannot thus be deprived of their jurisdiction, nor the defendant of his right to trial by jury, and that a writ of prohibition will be awarded by the circuit court in order to prevent the usurpation. So, also, it may be remarked, a prohibition will be awarded if a justice of the peace in any case usurp an illegal jurisdiction, as by taking cognizance of a controversy involving the title to a freehold, etc., or by transcending otherwise his lawful cognizance.

But in every case cited, and in all the text-writers consulted, it appears that the attack upon the judgment must be made by means of a writ of prohibition, and by the party who has been aggrieved. Where the proper remedy by prohibition has been resorted to, the relief is granted upon the ground that the jurisdiction usurped by the justice is a fraud upon the jurisdiction of courts of record, by which a defendant may be deprived of his right to a trial by jury, and of his right to an appeal or writ of error.

Suppose the same thing had been done in a court of record, and that, instead of instituting one suit upon this debt of $380.30, it had been divided, with the assent of the debtor, into four parts, and separate suits brought upon each at the same time in the circuit court. It would have been a manifest wrong to the defendant to vex him with costs in four suits instead of one, but it would not have constituted a ground for a plea in abatement or in bar, and the debtor's remedy would have been to ask the court to consolidate the actions. If, however, this were not done, and the court proceeded to judgment in each case, it cannot be doubted that the judgments would be valid.

It savors of refinement to say that there has been in this case a fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court, for which the party proceeding before the justice should be condemned to lose his debt. If there has been a fraud committed, who has been defrauded? The defendant, if any one, and he is not complaining. The whole proceeding was taken with his knowledge and consent. It deprived him of no right. It imposed upon him no penalty. He was content, and perhaps preferred to be sued before a justice, rather than to incur the greater cost attending litigation in courts of record.

Suppose that he were at this day to ask for a writ of prohibition; should it be awarded? Would not the courts say to him: "You have slept upon your rights. The act of which you complain was committed in 1897. You have stood by without objection and seen rights accrue which would render it an act of injustice at this late day to disturb those judgments. Had you been vigilant, you would have been awarded the writ; but you have slept upon your rights, and justice to others now requires that it should be denied." Can it be doubted that such would be the decision if Vandegrift had at the date of this decree applied for a writ of prohibition against Adams with respect to these judgments? We think not. And that consideration alone should be conclusive of the controversy.

This result will not in any degree impinge upon the maxim that consent cannot give jurisdiction. The justice had jurisdiction over the amount represented in each of these judgments. Had he undertaken to give a judgment in excess of his jurisdiction, that judgment would have been void. The question here is whether those not parties to the judgment may, after a lapse of years, introduce evidence of collateral facts, the effect of which, if properly pleaded in due time, would have prevented the judgment from being rendered, or would have avoided it after it was rendered, if presented in a petition for a writ of prohibition. The real point is not that the justice did not have jurisdiction of the matter of which he took cognizance, but that he acquired that jurisdiction by what is denominated a fraud upon the law. That view of the question we have already treated.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that so much of the decree of the circuit court as denies to Adams the right to participate in the distribution of the purchase money of the property sold to Burruss is erroneous, and should be reversed.

(108 Va. 661)

VIRGINIA IRON, COAL & COKE CO. v. ROBERTS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

JUDGMENTS—PERSONS CONCLUDED — PURCHASERS PENDENTE LITE—SCOPE OF ADJUDICATION — ESTOPPEL—CONCEALMENT OF TITLE—PARTITION—FINALITY OF DECREE—LIEN FOR COSTS—ENFORCEMENT.

1. A defect in a bill, in failing to sufficiently allege the facts relied on as fraudulent, does not justify sustaining a demurrer to the bill, where other allegations thereof sufficiently set forth an estoppel against defendants.

2. Acts of defendants in inducing others to purchase land which had previously been conveyed to defendants themselves estop them to claim any rights under their deed to the prejudice of those whom they induced to purchase, or those claiming under them, where the purchasers acted in good faith, relying on defendants' acts, without notice or knowledge of the conveyance to defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Estoppel, § 232.]

3. Where a bill was demurred to on specific grounds, its failure to expressly allege the majority of defendants against whom an estoppel was sought to be raised, which was not stated as one of the grounds of demurrer, was not available to sustain the demurrer on appeal.

4. In 1879 A. and others instituted suit for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land to them, and for the confirmation of a partition between themselves. The relief sought was obtained, but, before the report of partition was confirmed, A. died, and the suit was revived in the names of his children as his heirs. A. had conveyed a portion of the land to his children in 1882, and in 1887 had executed a deed purporting to convey mineral rights in the same portion to B. B. was not made a party to the suit. The report of partition was confirmed in 1895, and the portion of the property claimed by them was conveyed by commissioner's deed to A.'s children. Held that, while B. was a purchaser pendente lite, his right to attack the deed under which A.'s children claimed was not affected by the proceedings and decree, as A.'s children succeeded to the suit as heirs, and not as purchasers, and their rights under the deed were not involved therein.

5. The fact that children, to whom land has been conveyed by their father, revive a suit brought by their father, involving the land, in their names as heirs, and not as purchasers, does not estop them to claim under the deed.

6. A decree in partition, entered after everything has been done in the cause except the settling of costs, ascertaining and apportioning the costs, is a final decree; and subsequent proceedings by which a part of the land is sold to pay the costs assessed against it are not binding on a purchaser pendente lite who has no notice of such proceedings.

7. In a suit for partition, where no sale is necessary and none is made for the purpose of partition, the court has no jurisdiction to sell the land assigned to one of the parties to satisfy his share of the costs, but such costs are a lien upon the land assigned to him, which must be enforced, like other judgment liens, by bill in equity, as provided by Code 1887, § 3571 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1907].

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Suit by the Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company against Wade H. Roberts and others. From decrees rendered, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, except as to a certain decree, appeal from which is dismissed.

D. D. Hull, Jr., G. C. Perry, and Bond & Bruce, for appellant. E. M. Fulton, O. M. Vicars, and Bullitt & Kelley, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court for Wise county sustaining a demurrer to a bill, as amended, filed by the appellant against the appellees, and dismissing the same; to a decree dismissing a bill of review filed by the appellant to review that decree; and to a decree striking from the docket the cause of Hunsucker, etc., v. Spear, etc., in which the appellant's bill, as amended, was asked to be treated as a petition to rehear. The object of appellant's bill was to remove a cloud upon its title to certain coal and mineral rights claimed by it.

It is insisted by the appellees that the demurrer to the bill of the appellant, as amended, was properly sustained, upon several grounds: First, because the deed of W. L. Roberts to his children, dated April 26, 1882, passed to his said children all his right, title, and interest in the land in controversy, and therefore the deeds made by him to Greenway & Warner and to Barrett & Trigg in the year 1887 passed no interest whatever in the lands.

The appellant, in its amended bill, attacks the deed of April 26, 1882, upon two grounds: First, that it was voluntary and fraudulent; and, second, that the grantees in it are stopped from setting it up as against the appellant.

The appellees insist that the charge in the bill (and when we speak of the bill we mean the bill as amended) that the deed was voluntary and fraudulent is not sufficiently definite and specific, and that the facts relied on to show that the deed was fraudulent as against the appellant, or those under whom it claims, should have been set forth.

This objection to the bill is well taken, but that defect was not sufficient to justify the court in sustaining the demurrer to the bill if the allegations of the bill are sufficient to estop the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, or those who claim under them, from asserting rights under it to the prejudice of the appellant, or those under whom it claims.

The estoppel set up in the bill is of two kinds—estoppel by the record and estoppel in pais. As the question of estoppel by the record belongs more properly to another ground of demurrer, it will not now be considered.

As to the estoppel in pais: The bill alleges, in substance, that Wade H. Roberts, one of the grantees in the deed of April 26th, actively participated in the negotiations that led up to the sales by W. L. Roberts to Greenway & Warner and to Barrett & Trigg, and induced them to purchase; that said sales were made by W. L. Roberts with the knowledge, acquiescence, and consent of the grantees in the deed of April 26th; and that Greenway & Warner and Barrett & Trigg, and the parties through whom the appellant claims, each and all of them, at the time of their respective purchases, had no knowledge or notice of the alleged deed of April 26th, but that they and each of them purchased in good faith, relying upon the assurances, representations, and conduct of the said Wade H. Roberts and the other grantees in that deed.

If these allegations are true—and upon demurrer they must be so treated—they are sufficient to estop the grantees in the deed of April 26th from claiming any rights under it to the prejudice of the appellant (C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 40 S. E. 633, 914, and authorities cited), unless, as is urged, the bill was defective in not specifically alleging that the grantees therein had reached their majority when their father and grantor made his sales to Greenway & Warner and Barrett & Trigg.

The deed of April 26th provides that the grantees therein and neither of them have the right to sell or dispose of the real and personal property embraced in the deed, nor any part thereof, until they arrive at the age of 21 years. The bill does not specifically allege that the grantees had reached their majority at the time the sales to Greenway & Warner and to Barrett & Trigg were made, but it does charge that they were made with their consent, which could not be true ordinarily unless they had reached the age of 21 years. The appellant, as appears from its reply brief, construes the language as averring that the grantees had reached their majority. Whether or not this averment would have been sufficient in setting up the estoppel, if that question had been raised at the proper time, it is not necessary to determine. The grounds of demurrer relied on in the circuit court were specifically stated. The objection now under consideration was not one of them. If the objection had been made in the trial court, the defect, if it be one, might have been remedied without costs or delay.

It is purely technical, and will not in the slightest degree affect the rights of the parties on the merits, as the same proof will be required to sustain the allegation as made as would be necessary if the bill had specifically charged that the grantees had reached their majority.

The next ground relied on here by the appellees to show that the demurrer to the bill was properly sustained is that the appellant and those under whom it claims purchased during the pendency of the suit of Hunsucker and others v. Spear and others, and are conclusively bound by the proceedings in that cause, by which certain of the children of W. L. Roberts, grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, who were also pendente lite purchasers, acquired absolute title to the land in controversy.

In the year 1879 John Hunsucker, James Hunsucker, and W. L. Roberts instituted a suit in the circuit court for Wise county against the heirs of Thomas Rogers and others for the purpose of having a contract for the sale of a tract of land (which includes the land in controversy) entered into by the complainants in that suit with the heirs of Thomas Rogers specifically executed, and also to have a partition of the land made by the complainants between themselves confirmed. By a decree entered in that cause the contract of sale was specifically executed as to a part of the land, and partition made between the parties to the suit. Before the report of partition was confirmed, W. L. Roberts departed this life, and on motion of his children the suit was revived in their names, as his heirs. At that term of the court (September, 1895) the report of partition was confirmed, and O. M. Vicars was appointed a commissioner to convey to the heirs of W. L. Roberts the land assigned him in the partition, except a certain tract of 47 acres. Pursuant to that decree the commissioner executed a deed to the said heirs of W. L. Roberts. During the same term the court set aside that conveyance by decree, in which it is recited that "it appearing to the court that the land assigned to Wm. L. Roberts should not be conveyed to his heirs in equal proportions," and directed that the commissioner should convey to James A. Roberts, W. F. Roberts, and W. H. Roberts, each $\frac{6}{25}$; to Louisa Roberts and Alice Hubbard, each, $\frac{1}{25}$; and to W. H. Roberts, as trustee, etc., of Isaac Roberts, deceased, $\frac{5}{25}$ —of the land. The land was conveyed to these parties in accordance with that decree by the commissioner, report made to the court, and his report confirmed.

The proceedings in the case of Hunsucker and others v. Spear and others, which resulted in the conveyance last mentioned, it is insisted by the appellees, was an adjudication that the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, were entitled to the land in controversy, and conclusively binds the appellant and those under whom it claims, all of them being pendente lite purchasers.

The general rule is that a person who acquires an interest in land involved in a pending suit, and from a party litigant, takes subject to the rights of the other parties to the suit, as finally adjudicated, and is concluded by the judgment or decree, whether he becomes a party to the suit, and has a day in court, or not. This rule is necessary to give effect to the proceedings of courts of justice. Without it the administration of justice might in all cases be frustrated by successive alienations of the property which was the subject of litigation, pending the suit, so that every judgment or decree would be rendered abortive where the recovery of specific property was the object. "But while there is no principle in the law," as was said by Judge Tucker in French v. Loyal Co., etc., 5 Leigh, at page 681, "more essential to the administration of justice than the doctrine of lis pendens, when properly understood, there is none which is attended with greater occasional hardship; nor would any be more pernicious, if extended beyond its proper limits." It is therefore "confined," as was said by Judge Green in Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93, 102, 103, 14 Am. Dec. 766 (the leading case in this state on the subject), "in its operation, to the extent of the policy on which it was founded; that is, to give effect to the judgment or decree which might be rendered in the suit depending at the time of the purchase." See French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh, 681, 683.

Applying these well-settled principles to the facts of the case of Hunsucker and others v. Spear and others, do the proceedings in that cause which resulted in a conveyance of the land in controversy to the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, conclude the appellant from setting up claim to the coal and mining rights in the land, as against the grantees in that deed? Neither the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, as such, nor the appellant, nor those under whom it claims, were ever parties to that suit. W. L. Roberts, the vendor of both sets of claimants, was a party until his death. Then the suit was revived upon the motion of his heirs, and afterward prosecuted in their names as heirs, not as purchasers. The question whether the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, or the appellant, had the better right to the coal and mining rights involved in this case, was not in issue in that case. A decision of that question was wholly unnecessary in determining the questions which were in issue. There was nothing in the record of that suit at the time of the purchases of Greenway & Warner and of Bartlett & Trigg which could have given them notice, actual or constructive, that the question of the rights of the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, was involved in that case. It could not have been involved in it at that time, for the vendees in that deed were not then parties to that suit in any capacity whatever.

A purchaser having actual or constructive notice of a pending suit can only be held chargeable with knowledge of the facts of which the record in the suit, as it existed at the time of his purchase, would have informed him. He cannot be charged with knowledge of facts afterwards brought into the case. Davis v. Christian, etc., 15 Grat. 11; Stout v. Philippi Mfg. Co. (W. Va.) 23 S. E. 571, 58 Am. St. Rep. 843.

But even if it did appear in the record of that court, as appellees insist, that the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, had some interest in or claim to the land which W. L. Roberts was seeking to have assigned him, it only appeared incidentally, and did not in any manner affect the litigation between the complainants and defendants in that suit; and a decision as to the validity of such claim was not essential to giving complete relief under the pleadings in the case. In such a case, even where the person whose interest only incidentally appears is a party to the suit, an adjudication of such a claim does not bind a pendente lite purchaser who has no notice of such claim; and for a much stronger reason it would not bind where such person was not a party to the suit.

In the case of Bellamy v. Sabine, 1 De G. & Jo. 566, the question was raised, how far a purchaser from a pendente lite defendant is affected by the right of another defendant in that same suit. It was there said that it seems where a person, without notice of a suit, purchases from one of the defendants property which is the subject of it, he is not, in consequence of the pendency of the suit, affected by the equitable title of another defendant, which appears on the face of the proceedings, but of which he has no notice, and to which it is not necessary for any purposes of the suit to give effect. White & Tudor's Lead. Cas. in Eq. vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 142.

In Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 200, it is said, in discussing the doctrine of lis pendens, that "if, in an action by one plaintiff against two or more defendants, it appears from the pleadings that one of the defendants has certain equities against others, but those equities do not in any way affect the present litigation between the plaintiff and defendants, and the rights of the defendants between each other are not sought to be determined, no lis pendens can be created beyond the purposes of the suit, and an alienee of one of the defendants is not charged with implied notice of the equities between the codefendants. It would seem to be perfectly clear, in the absence of authority on the subject, that there could be no lis pendens between coplaintiffs and codefendants in any action not designed to settle the rights of such plaintiffs or defendants between each other, no matter how many facts not material to the present controversy happened to find their way into the record. If, however, upon proper pleadings, one of the defendants is shown to have certain rights, as against the others, affecting specific property, and entitling him to relief with respect to such property in the present action, a purchaser, after such pleadings have been filed, and notice of the defendant's claim for relief registered (where registry is required), is bound as a purchaser pendente lite."

We are of opinion, therefore, that the decree of the September term, 1895, and the conveyance made pursuant thereto of the land in controversy on the 17th of that month, by Vicars, commissioner, invested the grantees in that deed with such title as W. L. Roberts was entitled to at the time of his death; that they took as heirs, and not as purchasers from said Roberts; and that said decrees and deed in no way affected the rights of the appellant, or those under whom it claims. Neither does the fact that the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, had the suit of Hunsucker, etc., v. Spear, etc., revived in their names as heirs, merely, and not as purchasers, estop them, as the appellant insists, from asserting in this case their rights under the deed of April 26, 1882.

The appellees further insist that "the decrees entered by R. T. Irvine, special judge, in September, 1901, directing sale of the land in controversy for costs, the sale made pursuant thereto, and the decree confirming the sale, and the deed made by Commissioner Vicars, and decree confirming this deed, dated April 8, 1902, are all valid and binding, and cannot be set aside," and that the bill, as an original bill, was demurrable.

The purposes of the suit of Hunsucker, etc., v. Spears, etc., had been accomplished by the proceedings had therein prior to the decree of April 12, 1899. Nothing further remained to be done in the cause, except to settle the question of costs. By that decree the amount of costs was ascertained and apportioned among those liable to pay. Of that sum, as costs for partitioning the land, W. L. Roberts, though dead, was directed to pay $40; and it was decreed to be a lien on the land assigned him, and theretofore conveyed to his heirs by a commissioner of the court. By the same decree a receiver was appointed to collect and disburse the costs, and, if the parties against whom costs were decreed did not pay within 30 days, executions were directed to be issued in favor of the receiver against them. On the 10th of September, 1901, more than two years thereafter, a decree, in which it is recited that the receiver having reported that the costs adjudged to be a lien upon the Roberts land had not been paid, was entered, directing O. M. Vicars, who was appointed a special commissioner for the purpose, to sell the land, or so much thereof as might be necessary, to satisfy the said costs. Pursuant to that decree the whole tract of 230 acres of land, alleged to be then worth $4,000, was sold, and purchased by W. H. Roberts, one of the heirs of W. L. Roberts, at the price of $42. The sale was reported to the court, and confirmed by decree of April 8, 1902.

If the decree of April 12, 1899, was a final decree, as insisted by appellees, and as, under our decision, we think it was (Cocke's Adm'r v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 20; Ryan v. McLeod, 32 Grat. 367; Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 76; Sims v. Sims, 94 Va. 590, 27 S. E. 436, 64 Am. St. Rep. 772), the subsequent proceedings by which the land assigned W. L. Roberts was sold would seem to be without authority of law, at least as to the appellant, who had no notice thereof.

In Johnson v. Anderson, 78 Va. 768, 771, where the court had given all the relief contemplated in the cause, Judge Burks, speaking for the court, said: "The cause was ended, and the court could proceed no further. It had no further jurisdiction in that proceeding either of the subject-matter or of the parties. * * * The original cause being ended, the proceeding was a new one against the defendant; and, being without notice, the personal decree against him is a nullity, and would be so treated, we presume, everywhere." See Battaille, etc., v. Maryland Hospital, etc., 76 Va. 63; Smith v. Powell, 98 Va. 431, 36 S. E. 522.

If it had been necessary in the suit of Hunsucker, etc., v. Spear, etc., to have sold the land, the subject-matter of the suit, for the purpose of partition, of course the costs adjudged against each party would have been a charge upon, and should have been paid out of, his share of the proceeds of the sale. But in that case there was no necessity for sale for the purpose of partition, and none was made or could have been made therein without the consent of parties. Howery v. Helms, 20 Grat. 1. It would therefore seem clear that in a suit for partition, where there was no sale necessary or made for the purpose of partition, the court would not have jurisdiction to sell the land assigned one of the parties to satisfy his share of the costs of partition. The costs adjudged against such party would be a lien upon the land assigned him, and perhaps a preferred lien, as they were necessary to perfect his title in severalty to it; but it would have to be enforced, like other judgment liens upon the land, by a bill in equity, as provided by section 3571 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1907].

But if it be held that the proceedings in question which resulted in the sale of the land are binding upon the heirs of W. L. Roberts, since they, being parties to the suit, are presumed to have had notice thereof and made no objection, still they are not binding upon the appellant, who had no notice of them. As before stated in this opinion, a purchaser having actual or constructive notice of a pending suit can only be held chargeable with knowledge of the facts of which the record in the suit, as it existed at the time of his purchase, would have informed him, and he cannot be charged with knowledge of facts afterward brought into the case (Davis v. Christian, supra), or be bound by proceedings had therein affecting the land after a final decree, and beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Having reached the conclusion that under the allegations of the bill the grantees in the deed of April 26, 1882, are estopped by their conduct from asserting a claim under it to the prejudice of the appellant; that the proceedings in the cause by which the land assigned to W. L. Roberts was directed to be conveyed, and was conveyed, to his heirs, did not adjudicate any question between them and the appellant as to which had the better title to the coal and mining rights in controversy; and that the proceedings in the case after the final decree of April 8, 1899, are not binding on the appellant—we are of opinion that the appellant was entitled to maintain its bill as an original bill to remove a cloud from its title, and that the circuit court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the bill and dismissing it.

Having reached this conclusion, it will be unnecessary to consider the other grounds of objection to the validity of the proceedings in the cause of Hunsucker, etc., v. Spear, etc., set up in the bill, as a decision of the questions raised by them, however decided, could not render the bill demurrable, or affect the conclusion we have reached.

The decree of the circuit court of April 11, 1903, dismissing the appellant's bill, and its decree of April 7, 1904, dismissing the appellant's bill of review, must be reversed and annulled; and this court will enter such decree as the circuit court ought to have entered, overruling the demurrer to the bill, and remand the cause to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion. And the appeal from the decree of April 10, 1903, in the case of Hunsucker, etc., v. Spear, etc., must be dismissed as improvidently awarded, as there was a final decree rendered in that cause more than one year before the bill in the case of Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Co. v. Roberts was asked to be treated as a petition to rehear in that cause.

WORRELL & WILLIAMS v. KINNEAR MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

SALES—MANUFACTURED ARTICLES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES—ASCERTAINMENT OF FIXED CHARGES—WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAM-INATION—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—FOR-EIGN CORPORATIONS—PLEADING.

1. The measure of damages for an unqualified annulment without reasonable cause by the vendee in an executory contract for the sale of an article not manufactured at the time of the breach is the difference between the cost of manufacturing and delivering the article and the contract price.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 1108.]

2. The latitude permissible in cross-examining a witness must be left largely to the sound discretion of the trial court, which will not be interfered with unless plainly abused to the prejudice of the party excepting.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3854.]

3. In an action for the breach by the vendee of an executory contract for the sale of articles to be manufactured it was charged by plaintiff that a rival concern was back of the suit, and the vice president of that concern was actually in court as the chief witness for defendant. Plaintiff's president was asked on cross-examination, under the guise of showing the "fixed charges" of manufacturing the articles in question, what amount of business plaintiff did, what it spent for advertising, what it spent for salesmen, what were the salaries of its officers, and what was spent for freight. Held, that the questions were properly excluded.

4. Plaintiff's president, having testified that the cost of steel under continuing contracts was three cents a pound, was further asked on cross-examination with whom his company had continuing contracts. Defendant's counsel stated that his purpose was to test the credibility of the witness, and that he intended to show that steel could not be bought at that price. In response to a question of the court, he further stated, however, that he could not say that he would attempt to show that the witness did not have any of the contracts testified to. Held that, as the only legitimate object of the question would have been to lay a foundation for impeachment, and as counsel disclaimed that purpose, the exclusion of the question was proper.

5. The vendor of material to be used in the manufacture of an article is not a subcontractor within the meaning of the rule excluding supposed advantages of a subcontractor in computing profits in the sale of a manufactured article.

6. Representations that plaintiff's bid for the work was as low as it could be done, and that there was no profit in it at the price bid, are mere expressions of opinion, and, although false, do not invalidate a contract made in pursuance thereof.

7. Rejecting a special defense is not prejudicial to defendant where the evidence in support of such special defense is admitted under the general issue.

8. A specification of a defense in that plaintiff corporation had not complied with the provisions of Code 1904, § 1104, prescribing the conditions upon which foreign corporations may do business within the state, was defective where it did not specify the particular in which plaintiff had failed to comply with the statutory requirements.

9. In an action for the breach by the vendee of an executory contract for the sale of articles to be manufactured defendant could not complain of the ascertainment of plaintiff's "fixed charges" of manufacturing the articles by testimony as to the customary percentage to be deducted for such charges, where he introduced such testimony himself, and the jury returned a verdict for less than the amount of plaintiff's claim as computed by deducting the highest estimate made by defendant's witnesses for fixed charges.

10. A new trial will not be granted for refusal to permit evidence to be introduced, where substantially the same evidence is received without objection at a later stage of the trial.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the Kinnear Manufacturing Company against Worrell & Williams. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

John B. Jenkins and Green, Withers & Green, for plaintiff in error. Jeffries & Lawless, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. On June 8, 1903, the defendant in error, by a written contract, obligated itself to manufacture and erect for the plaintiff in error 73 galvanized steel shutter doors, to be used in the union warehouses and slip of the Southern Railway Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railway, at that time in process of erection in the city of Norfolk, at the price of $5,553.90.

On the following day the plaintiff in error despatched a telegram to the defendant in error, withdrawing its acceptance of the offer by which the contract in question had been consummated; and immediately awarded the contract to the Wilson Manufacturing Company for fifty-odd dollars less than the price stipulated for in the original agreement. The sole reason assigned by the plaintiff in error for the violation of its contract was that it was to its interest to cancel it.

Thereupon this action was instituted in the court of law and chancery for the city of Norfolk to recover damages for the breach of contract, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $1,647.14. To review that judgment the defendant brings this writ of error here.

A bill of particulars was filed with the declaration in the case, furnishing plaintiff's estimate of the material necessary to have completed the contract, with the cost of such material, and also the cost of labor for preparing material and manufacturing and erecting the doors pursuant to contract, to which was added the freight charges and drayage for their transportation from the factory at Columbus to Norfolk. These several items amounted in the aggregate to $3,326.22.

It is settled law that the measure of damages for an unqualified annulment, without reasonable cause, by the vendee in an executory contract for the sale of an article not manufactured at the time of the breach, is the difference between the cost of manufacturing and delivering the article and the contract price. Masterton v. Mayor of City of Brooklyn (N. Y.) 42 Am. Dec. 38; Morrison v. Lovejoy, 6 Minn. 319 (Gil. 224); Kelso v. Marshall, 24 App. Div. 128, 48 N. Y. Supp. 728; Dryfoos v. Uhl, 69 App. Div. 118, 74 N. Y. Supp. 532; Todd v. Gamble, 148 N. Y. 382, 42 N. E. 982, 52 L. R. A. 225; Indiana Canning Co. v. Priest, 16 Ind. App. 445, 45 N. E. 618; Beardsley v. Smith, 61 Ill. App. 340; Kingman v. Hanna Wagon Co., 74 Ill. App. 22; Rice Co. v. Penn Plate Co., 88 Ill. App. 407; Kimball v. Deere, Wells & Co., 108 Iowa, 676, 77 N. W. 1041; Hauser & Co. v. Tate, 105 Ky. 701, 49 S. W. 475; Berthold

v. St. Louis El. C. Co., 165 Mo. 280, 63 S. W. 784.

The fact that there has been an entire breach of contract in this instance is not denied; and the general doctrine stated above, as to the measure of damages in this class of cases, is also conceded. But the defendant maintains that the plaintiff has altogether omitted the constituent element of "fixed charges" from its computation of the cost of the manufactured product, by which omission, it is insisted, the net profit demanded is materially enhanced.

By the term "fixed charges" is meant the general running expenses which attach to every business, and it is true, as contended, that such "fixed charges" do compose an essential element in the cost of a manufactured article.

The ruling of the trial court refusing to allow certain questions to be propounded to the president of the plaintiff company for the alleged purpose of ascertaining the proportion of the "fixed charges" of the business, proper to be taken into account in determining the plaintiff's profit, constitutes the first assignment of error.

As the rulings of the court with respect to the second and fourth assignments of error are germane to the first assignment, they may be conveniently treated together.

In order to reach an intelligent conclusion in regard to the refusal of the court to permit the defendant's counsel to pursue the line of investigation indicated, it is material to know the circumstances under which the proposed examination arose.

It appears that the Wilson Manufacturing Company, to which company, as remarked, the second contract for the manufacture of the doors in question was awarded after the original contract had been breached, was an active, and, indeed, the sole, competitor in the United States of the plaintiff in the manufacture of that class of doors, and that a suit was then pending between these rival companies for an alleged infringement of a patent upon these doors; that the vice president and factory manager of the Wilson Manufacturing Company was present during the trial as chief witness for the defendant; and it was openly charged by the president of the plaintiff company while on the witness stand that his business rival "is at the back of this suit," and "is here to get all the information he can as to the methods of our manufacture, and I do not propose to give it." This statement, thus directly made, was not denied by the party referred to, and the circumstances strongly tended to sustain the charge.

Under these conditions the trial court declined to permit the witness to be subjected to an examination, the general character of which may be gathered from the following interrogatories:

"What amount of business was done by your house last year?"

"What is the average of your business per annum?"

"What was spent for advertising by your concern last year?"

"What is the average expense for advertising your business?"

"What did you spend for salesmen last year?"

"What were the salaries of your officers last year?"

"What was spent for freight?"

"How many officers are in your company and what salaries do they receive?"

From the necessity of the case, the latitude permissible in cross-examining a witness must be left largely to the sound discretion of the trial court; and the rule is well established that an appellate court will not interfere, unless that discretion has been plainly abused. Burke v. Shaver, 92 Va. 345, 23 S. E. 749; Savage v. Bowen (decided at the January term) 49 S. E. 668. See, also, authorities cited in 8 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 110, note 1.

In order to warrant a reversal on that ground, it must plainly appear that the ruling has resulted to the prejudice of the exceptor. Morotock Ins. Co. v. Fostoria Novelty Co., 94 Va. 361, 26 S. E. 850.

That the trial court properly exercised its discretion in refusing to allow the witness to be subjected to the inquisitorial examination proposed, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, cannot be doubted. Plaintiff was the owner of an extensive manufacturing establishment, engaged in various kinds of work, and manufacturing a variety of articles on a large scale, with the buildings, machinery, capital, officers, and employees incident to a business of that magnitude. The entire "fixed charges" of such a business would necessarily have afforded unsatisfactory data to a jury from which to estimate the proportional part of such "fixed charges" proper to be borne in the manufacture of an isolated article. Besides, it is contrary to the policy of the law to permit a person, who, without cause, has violated his contract and been sued for the breach, under the guise of determining "fixed charges" to unduly pry into and expose the private business methods of the injured party to the scrutiny of a vigilant competitor.

"Fixed charges," as remarked, constitute an element of the cost of manufacture, and were the subject of proper inquiry in this case; but, as shall be seen presently, they were susceptible of approximate ascertainment without unnecessary exposure of the plaintiff's trade secrets. To entertain a suit or only on the terms of such business disclosures would tend to deter one who had suffered wrong from resorting to the courts for redress.

In this connection the witness, who, in response to a question had stated that the cost of steel to his company, under continuing contracts, was three cents per pound, was also asked on cross-examination with whom his company had said continuing contracts, to which question he made the following reply: "I decline to answer. I will make oath that the costs embodied in the bill of particulars are absolutely true, * * * but for the protection of those from whom we have bought I decline to answer." Thereupon counsel for the plaintiff objected to the question, and counsel for the defendant insisted upon the question being answered, stating that his purpose was to test the credibility of the witness, and he intended to show that steel could not be bought at that price. In response to the court's inquiry, if he intended to impeach the witness by showing that his company did not have the continuing contracts claimed, counsel stated "that he could not say that he would attempt to show that the witness did not have any such contracts." The court then sustained the objection to the question, and declined to require the witness to answer it.

The only legitimate object of such a question would have been to lay the foundation for impeaching the witness, and, counsel having disclaimed that purpose, the action of the court in ruling out the question was obviously proper.

It is further suggested in the fourth assignment of error that the plaintiff's estimate of the actual cost of material is based upon subcontracts for material, which, it is said, is not a correct criterion in calculating profits. But the doctrine invoked has no application to the purchase of material out of which an article contracted for is to be manufactured. The reason of the rule for excluding the supposed advantages of a subcontract in computing profits is that it introduces a collateral undertaking, uncertain and contingent in its character, to which the person sought to be affected was not a party, and which was not in contemplation of the parties when the original contract was entered into. Devlin v. Mayor, etc., 63 N. Y. 8. But the vendor of material to be used in the manufacture of an article is not a subcontractor within the meaning of the rule.

In support of the assignment of error No. 3 two averments are made:

(1) That the defendant was induced to enter into the contract by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of the agent of the plaintiff that its bid for the work was as low as the work could be done, and that there was no profit in it at that price; and

(2) That the plaintiff had not complied with the provisions of section 1104, p. 521, of the Code of 1904, prescribing the conditions upon which corporations of other states or countries may conduct operations in this state.

There was an agreement between counsel that the defendant should be permitted to show under the general issue anything which it might be lawful to set up and prove under special pleas, provided such matters were embraced in its specification of defenses, and contained a statement of facts, which, if true, would amount to a valid defense to the action. The above grounds were embraced in the statement of defenses filed, but, on motion of the plaintiff, were rejected by the court.

With respect to the first ground of defense, the alleged false representations were mere expressions of opinion—"dealer's talk"—and were not such as, if proved, would have invalidated the contract. 1 Benj. on Sales, 561. Besides, it appears that, notwithstanding the rejection of that specification of defense, the court allowed evidence of the alleged false representations to be introduced under the general issue, and the question was in that way submitted to the jury; so that the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the court's ruling upon that issue. Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 30 S. E. 472; Norfolk, etc., Ry. Co. v. Marpole, 97 Va. 594, 34 S. E. 462.

The second ground of defense—that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, doing business in the state without having complied with section 1104 of the Code—was defective in not specifying the particular in which it had failed to comply with the requirements of the statute, and for that cause, if for none other, was properly rejected. Nat. Bldg., etc., Ass'n v. Ashworth, 91 Va. 706, 22 S. E. 521.

Finally, in regard to the contention that the court erred in excluding testimony tending to show the amount which ought to have been deducted for "fixed charges." The record shows that the court permitted the introduction of admissible evidence on the subject, and also that the jury made some allowance for such charges in arriving at their verdict.

While the vice president and factory manager of the Wilson Manufacturing Company testifies that from 35 to 40 per cent. of the aggregate cost of material and labor was the customary percentage to be deducted for fixed charges, an intelligent and disinterested witness declares 25 per cent. to be the usual allowance for such charges in determining profit.

As to the propriety of basing a recovery upon this character of evidence, in the leading case of Masterton v. Mayor of City of Brooklyn, supra, the court said: "The constituent elements of the cost should be ascertained from sound and reliable sources; from practical men, having experience in the particular department of labor to which the contract relates."

It appears, therefore, that the defendant has no ground to complain of the mode adopted for ascertaining "fixed charges" in this instance, and the rule in this state is that "a new trial will not be granted for refusal to permit certain evidence to be introduced when substantially the same evidence was received without objection at a later stage of the trial." Norfolk, etc., Ry. Co. v. Marpole, supra; Taylor v. Mallory, supra.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff shows that the cost of necessary labor and material to have performed the contract on its part would have amounted to.. $3,172 43
25% of that sum is..... 793 10

	$3,965 53
Freight charges	153 79
	$4,119 32

Contract price of article delivered	$5,553 90
Cost of manufacture and delivery	4,119 32

Profit	$1,434 58
Amount of verdict.....	$1,647 14
Profit	1,434 58

Excess of verdict over profit....	$ 212 56
-----------------------------------	-----------

It thus appears that, while it was competent for the jury to have adopted 25 per cent. of the aggregate cost of labor and material for "fixed charges," they have, in assessing the damages, exceeded that estimate by the sum of $212.56.

For that reason the judgment of the trial court must be reversed; but, inasmuch as that is the only error which the record discloses, the case will be remanded, with directions that, unless the plaintiff enter of record its election to release the sum of $212.56, the verdict shall be set aside, and a new trial awarded. But if the plaintiff shall accept a recovery of $1,434.58 as the true measure of its damages in the case, then the motion of the defendant for a new trial will be overruled, and judgment rendered for said sum of $1,434.58, with interest and costs.

VIRGINIA & N. C. WHEEL CO. v. HARRIS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE MACHINERY —PROMISE TO REPAIR—CONTINUING SERVICE
—PLEADING—DEMURRER—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A demurrer to an entire declaration, if one count is good, must be overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, §§ 486, 487.]

2. Where a demurrer is to an entire declaration, the assignment of causes of demurrer applicable to both counts does not enlarge the scope of the demurrer.

3. A declaration, in an action for injuries, charging that it was defendant's duty to use ordinary care to furnish plaintiff with a reasonably safe saw, that defendant was informed of its defective condition and promised to fix it, but directed plaintiff to continue his work, and failed to fix it as promised, by reason of which plaintiff was injured, is sufficient as against a demurrer assigning as grounds that it is indefinite and does not set out the alleged cause of action with sufficient particularity.

4. Where the servant is induced to continue to operate defective machinery by the master's order, coupled with a promise to repair the defect, the question whether a continuance in the service and use of the defective machinery is such negligence as to bar a recovery is for the jury.

5. An averment that a master promised to repair machinery, but failed and "refused" to do so, is not inconsistent with the theory that the promise induced the servant to incur a known danger.

6. Where defendant in an action for injuries by a saw, introduced testimony that it was the truck which caused the trouble, that it was fixed before the accident, and that another employé worked at the saw for six weeks after the accident, evidence showing the condition of the saw a week after the accident, and subsequent repairs, was admissible in rebuttal.

7. A instruction that if defendant promised to repair a saw, and failed to do so in a reasonable time, plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for that cause alone, but if afterwards plaintiff "failed to exercise the increased degree of care, in using the saw, demanded by the increased peril, the jury must find for defendant," is properly modified by substituting, for the clause quoted, "failed to exercise such reasonable care as a prudent man would exercise under the same circumstances."

8. A requested instruction not warranted by the evidence is properly refused.

9. An instruction that if plaintiff complained of the defective condition of machinery, and defendant promised to repair, but failed to do so in a reasonable time, in consequence of which plaintiff was injured, the jury should find for plaintiff, unless he failed to exercise reasonable care, considering his experience, or unless the danger was so palpable that no one but a reckless person would expose himself to it, is not improper on the ground that it does not make the presence of danger a necessary element to a recovery, and does not state that plaintiff relied on the promise to repair.

10. In an action for injuries by a saw, an instruction that if defendant refused to repair the saw, or by its conduct gave plaintiff to understand that it did not intend to repair, plaintiff assumed the risk, is properly refused, as the presumption is that when a servant complains of defective machinery, which the master refuses to repair and directs him to proceed, unless the defect is so palpable that only a reckless man would use it, the servant may presume that the master considers it reasonably safe.

11. An instruction that if plaintiff knew the machinery was out of order, and reported it to the foreman, and it was repaired in plaintiff's presence, and he made no further complaint, to find for defendant, is properly refused, as ignoring the principle that the master's duty to use ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe machinery is personal and nonassignable.

Error to Circuit Court, Henrico County.

Action by one Harris against the Virginia & North Carolina Wheel Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. Alston Cabell and L. O. Wendenburg, for plaintiff in error. H. A. Atkinson, Jno. A. Lamb, and Saml. A. Anderson, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The purpose of this writ of error is to review a judgment rendered in behalf of the defendant in error, Harris, against the plaintiff in error, the Virginia & North Carolina Wheel Company, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries.

There was a demurrer to the declaration, which contained two counts, and the action of the trial court in overruling the demurrer constitutes the first assignment of error.

Since the court is of opinion, for reasons to be stated presently, that the second count is sufficient to maintain the action, and as it appears that the evidence, both of the plaintiff and defendant, was addressed to the case made by the second count, it will be unnecessary to consider the alleged insufficiency of the first count.

It has long been the established rule of practice in this state that a demurrer to the entire declaration raises the question whether it sets out sufficient matter to sustain the action, and in such case, where there are several counts, one of which is good, the demurrer must be overruled. Roe v. Crutchfield, 1 H. & M. 361; Hollingsworth v. Milton, 8 Leigh, 50; Henderson v. Stringer, 6 Grat. 130; Wright v. Michle, 6 Grat. 354; Smith v. Lloyd, 16 Grat. 295; Wright v. Smith, 81 Va. 777; Gray v. Kemp, 88 Va. 201, 16 S. E. 225; Grubb v. Burford, 98 Va. 553, 27 S. E. 4.

The defendant seeks to escape the consequences of the above-mentioned rule by showing that the assignment of causes of demurrer applies to both counts of the declaration. But the office of the assignment is to indicate the grounds relied on, and not to enlarge the scope of the demurrer.

"Assigning special causes for demurrer does not make a demurrer special which is in its nature general." Miller v. McLuer, Gilmer, 338.

"A demurrer to a declaration, with a statement of special cause of demurrer that one of the counts, or breaches, or parts of the plaintiff's demand, of a distinct and divisible nature, is bad, does not alter the character of the demurrer, and, if there be matter enough in the declaration to maintain the action, the demurrer must be overruled." Henderson v. Stringer, supra.

The second count of the declaration, after stating the employment of the plaintiff by the defendant as a sawyer, alleges that it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary, due, and proper care to furnish the plaintiff with a reasonably safe and proper saw with which to perform his work; and especially was it the duty of the defendant, when it found that the machinery was out of order, to have the same repaired, so that the plaintiff would not be injured while using it. The count then proceeds to charge that the defendant was informed that the saw in question was out of order and ought to be fixed, and promised the plaintiff to fix the same, but negligently, recklessly, and carelessly failed and refused to fix the same, and directed the plaintiff to continue to operate the saw. It further alleges that the defendant was a second time informed of the condition of the machine, and again promised the plaintiff to fix the same, and directed him to continue to use the saw, assuring him that the same would be fixed in a reasonable and proper time, upon which promise the plaintiff relied, and continued to operate the saw. Yet, it is said, the defendant, unmindful and disregarding of its duties and promises, negligently, recklessly, and carelessly failed and refused to fix the saw, as promised, in a reasonable and proper time, by reason whereof, while the plaintiff was operating the saw, and without any fault on his part, but because of the defective, insecure, and unsafe condition of the saw, he received the injuries complained of.

Summarized, the causes of demurrer assigned by the defendant in the trial court (and to which he must be confined in this court—Va. Code 1904, p. 1721, § 3271) are: First, that the declaration is vague and indefinite, and does not set out the alleged cause of action with sufficient particularity; and, second, that it seeks to hold the defendant responsible for obvious and known risks incident to the employment and assumed by the plaintiff, and to impose upon the defendant a higher degree of care than is required by law.

The count is plainly not amenable to the first objection. To the contrary, the facts which constitute the alleged cause of action are stated with sufficient certainty to be understood by the defendant, who has to answer them; by the jury, who are to inquire into their truth; and by the court, which is to render judgment. Wood v. Am. Nat. Bk., 100 Va. 306, 40 S. E. 931.

The rule laid down in yet more recent cases is that the declaration is sufficient if it informs the defendant of the nature of the demand made upon it, and states such facts as will enable the court to say that, if the facts are proved as alleged, they establish a good cause of action. Hortensteln v. Va. Carolina Ry. Co., 102 Va. 914, 47 S. E. 996; Va. Portland Cement Co. v. Luck's Adm'r (Va.) 49 S. E. 577.

The second ground of demurrer involves the right of a servant to recover damages against the master for injuries occasioned by defective machinery, of which he has notice. The general rule is that a servant who continues the service with such knowledge, without complaint and without the promise of the master to repair the defect, cannot recover damages of the master for an injury received under such circumstances. But the rule is subject to the qualification that where the servant is induced to continue to operate the defective machinery by the order of the master, coupled with a promise to repair the defect, the master is liable, unless the danger is so manifest that no prudent person would incur the risk. And, ordinarily, the question whether a continuance in the service and use of the defective machinery amounts to such negligence as to bar a recovery ought to be submitted to the jury upon proper instructions. Hough v. Ry. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L.

Ed. 612; Kane v. Ry. Co., 128 U. S. 91, 9 Sup. Ct. 16, 32 L. Ed. 339; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Ampey, 98 Va. 108, 25 S. E. 226; Virginia & Carolina Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. 976; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Wade, 102 Va. 140, 45 S. E. 915.

An allegation of duty is only a conclusion of law, and where the facts alleged show the duty, and are stated with sufficient clearness to prevent surprise and enable the court to proceed upon the merits of the cause, the declaration ought to be sustained. Va. Code 1904, pp. 1708, 1722, §§ 3246, 3272.

Tested by these familiar principles applicable to the relation of master and servant, the declaration states a good cause of action.

But it is said the averment that the master promised the servant to repair the saw, but failed and refused to do so, is inconsistent with the theory that the promise to remedy the dangerous condition of the saw was the motive that induced the servant to incur a known danger. It is manifest, however, that the word "refused" is not used in the narrow sense attributed to it, in the connection in which it occurs. Employed as an intransitive verb, the definition in Webster's International Dictionary of "refuse" is, "Not to comply with;" and in Taylor v. Mason, 9 Wheat. 327, 6 L. Ed. 101, it is said: "The words 'refusing to comply' may in general have the same operation in law as the words 'failing to comply' would have."

"It is a rule of pleading that, when an expression is capable of different meanings that one will be adopted which will support the pleading, and not one which will defeat it." Pender v. Dicken, 27 Miss. 252; Loehr v. Murphy, 45 Mo. App. 523.

Ascribing to the word "refused" its broadest signification, there is no merit in the last suggestion.

The second assignment of error is that the court permitted the plaintiff to introduce evidence showing the condition of the saw about one week after the accident happened, and also subsequent repairs.

The foreman, and principal witness for the defendant, had testified in chief that there was nothing the matter with the slide; that it was the track which caused the trouble; that he had fixed the track about 15 or 20 days, or possibly a month, before the accident, after which time there was no complaint on the part of the plaintiff. To strengthen his statement, he declared that another employé went to work on the saw the day after the accident, and worked it for six weeks. The questions and answers objected to were directly in rebuttal of the foreman's testimony, and were therefore clearly admissible.

In Virginia & North Carolina Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. 976, it is said: "The defendant company, for the purpose of showing that the machine was in a reasonably safe condition when the accident occurred, introduced evidence tending to show that some time afterwards it was in good condition, and that no repairs had been made upon it during that period. The plaintiff clearly had the right, in rebuttal, to show that it had been repaired during that time, otherwise the defendant would be permitted to prove facts to establish its defense which the plaintiff was denied the right of disproving. The evidence was brought out upon the cross-examination of a witness who had testified in chief that the machinery was in the same condition when exhibited to the jury that it was when the plaintiff was injured. The latter had the right not only to show that this was not true, but upon cross-examination had the right to ask any question which tended to test the witness' accuracy, veracity, or credibility, as the question complained of clearly did."

The third assignment of error is to the ruling of the court with respect to instructions.

It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to give defendant's instruction No. 2, and in giving the court's instruction No. 2 in place of it.

The rejected instruction told the jury that even though they should believe from the evidence that the defendant promised to repair the saw, and failed to do so within a reasonable time, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for that cause alone; but if afterwards the plaintiff "failed to exercise the increased degree of care, in using the saw, demanded by the increased peril, they must find for the defendant."

The competing instruction substituted, for the language quoted, "failed to exercise such reasonable care and caution as a prudent man would exercise under the same circumstances, they must find for the defendant."

The instruction given by the court correctly propounds the law. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Ampey, supra; Ry. Co. v. Puckett, 62 Kan. 770, 64 Pac. 631; T. & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Bingle, 91 Tex. 287, 42 S. W. 971; Hough v. Ry. Co., supra. But the court would have been warranted in refusing the instruction tendered by the defendant on the ground that there was no evidence to justify it. The uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff is that he was careful about running the saw, and, after the master's promise to fix it, was even "more careful than ever before."

The objection to instruction No. 6, given by the court, is that it does not make the presence of danger a necessary element to a recovery, and does not state that the servant relied upon the master's promise to repair.

The instruction is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff complained of the defective condition of the machinery which he was operating, and that the defendant promised to have the defects in said machinery remedied, but failed so to do within a reasonable time, and in consequence thereof the injuries complained of were inflicted upon the plaintiff, then the defendant is liable, and the jury should find for the plaintiff, unless the jury believe that the plaintiff failed to exercise reasonable care and caution in doing the work in which he was engaged, taking into consideration the plaintiff's experience, or unless the danger was so palpable, immediate, and constant that no one but a reckless person would expose himself to it, even after receiving such promise or assurance."

The circumstance that the plaintiff was injured while operating the saw in the exercise of reasonable care and caution, aided by common knowledge, sufficiently indicates the presence of danger. Upon the second point, the fact that the plaintiff relied upon the master's promise to repair is plainly to be implied from a fair and reasonable interpretation of the instruction. But if it were otherwise, the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the omission, since the allegation of the declaration and the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff is that he did rely upon the master's promise to repair. Richmond Ry. Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 627, 24 S. E. 267, 32 L. R. A. 220, 53 Am. St. Rep. 839.

Instruction No. 7, which is objected to, was copied literally from an instruction approved in N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Ampey, supra.

Defendant's instruction No. 5 is covered by instruction No. 1, given by the court.

Instruction No. 6 tells the jury that "if the defendant refused to repair the saw, or by its conduct gave the plaintiff to understand that it did not intend to repair the saw, the plaintiff assumed the risk." This instruction was properly refused because there is no evidence to support it, and for the additional reason that it does not accurately propound the principle of law intended to be inculcated. The presumption is that the master's knowledge of machinery is superior to that of the servant, and that when a servant complains of defective machinery, which the master refuses to repair, and directs the servant to continue its use, unless the defect is so palpable, immediate, and constant that only a reckless man would use it, the servant has a right to presume that the master considers the machinery in a reasonably safe condition, and may continue to use it without necessarily assuming the risk. Va. Portland Cement Co. v. Luck's Adm'r, supra; Shearman & Redfield on Neg. § 168.

It is further contended that defendant's instruction No. 7 was improperly refused. This instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Harris, knew the saw was out of order, and reported the same to the foreman, and that the saw was repaired in the presence of Harris, and that he made no further complaint before the accident, they must find for the defendant."

The instruction ignores the essential principle that the duty of a master to use ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe machinery for the use of the servant is a personal, nonassignable, continuing duty. In the form in which the instruction was offered, it is not a correct exposition of the law, and was properly refused. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Ampey, supra; Ry. Co. v. Daniels, 152 U. S. 688, 14 Sup. Ct. 756, 38 L. Ed. 597; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Wade, supra; Settle v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co., 127 Mo. 342, 30 S. W. 125, 48 Am. St. Rep. 633.

An inspection of the instructions given by the court shows that the law of the case was fully and fairly submitted to the jury. This assignment of error is, therefore, also without merit.

The remaining assignment of error is to the action of the court in overruling the motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the evidence.

Viewing the case from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, the evidence is ample to sustain the verdict, and it cannot be disturbed.

Upon the whole case, the judgment complained of is without error, and must be affirmed.

CARDWELL, J., absent.

(103 Va. 644)

VIRGINIA PASSENGER & POWER CO. et al. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

STREET RAILROADS—FRANCHISE—TRANSFERS—INTERSECTING LINES—LINE PARTIALLY OWNED BY DIFFERENT COMPANY.

1. Where the ordinance granting a franchise to a street railroad company imposed certain conditions as to rates of fare and giving of transfers, and the company operated its lines in accordance with these regulations, it thereby assumed contractual obligations with respect to such regulations.

2. The ordinance granting a franchise to a street railroad company provided that it should sell half-fare tickets between certain hours, and give transfers at points where one line intersected with another. The company owned a line which extended from its point of intersection with another line to the city limits, beyond which it was owned by a different corporation, which, however, ran its cars with the same operatives into the city and to the point of intersection. Held, that this line was an intersecting line, to which the provisions as to half-fare tickets and transfers applied.

Appeal from State Corporation Commission.

Petition by the Virginia Passenger & Power Company and the Richmond Passenger & Power Company against the commonwealth of Virginia to the State Corporation Commission. From an order denying the petition, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

M. M. Martin and A. B. Guigon, for appellants. The Attorney General, F. M. Conner, and H. R. Pollard, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. This case is before us upon an appeal from an order of the State Corporation Commission requiring the appellants to sell certain tickets, known as "labor tickets," at the rate of two for five cents, and to issue transfers between the Seven Pines line of the Virginia Passenger & Power Company and the intersecting line in the city of Richmond of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company.

With its order refusing the petition of the Virginia Passenger & Power Company and the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, the State Corporation Commission filed a paper setting forth its reasons, which are as follows:

"On the petition of the two defendant railroad companies for permission to alter and advance their rates and charges.

"The defendant railroad companies, the Virginia Passenger & Power Company and the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, having filed in this proceeding their joint petition praying that an order may be entered permitting the discontinuance of the sale of labor tickets on the Seven Pines line, operated by the Virginia Passenger & Power Company, and permitting the discontinuance of the issue and receipt of transfers between the said Seven Pines line and the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, and separate answers to said petition having been filed by William E. Oakley and the city of Richmond, and a full hearing having been had before the commission on the 24th day and 25th day of May, 1904, the commission has carefully considered all of the pleadings, the various exhibits filed with the pleadings and at the hearing, the testimony of witnesses, and the arguments of counsel, and, proceeding now to dispose of the questions at issue, the commission finds:

"(1) That the defendant the Richmond Passenger & Power Company acquired the right to operate as a street railway company in the city of Richmond under the grant and franchises contained in an ordinance passed by the council of the city of Richmond on the 23d day of December, 1899, and the amendments thereof, and subject to the terms, provisions, and restrictions contained in the said ordinance and amendments; that the said ordinance was accepted by the said Richmond Passenger & Power Company, and became operative in the month of August, 1900, and since that date the line of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company connecting with what is and was known as the 'Seven Pines Line,' at Twenty-Ninth and P streets, was operated under the terms and provisions of said ordinance.

"(2) That at the time the said Richmond Passenger & Power Company obtained from the city of Richmond the said ordinance aforesaid, and acquired its rights thereunder, the said Seven Pines line was operated by the Seven Pines Railway Company, having its apparent terminus at the said Twenty-Ninth and P streets, in the city of Richmond. The defendant the Virginia Passenger & Power Company became by subsequent deeds the owner of the said Seven Pines line at the point from the limits of the city of Richmond to Seven Pines, in the county of Henrico, and is now operating the same, running its cars with the same conductors and motormen continuously through to said corner of said Twenty-Ninth and P streets; the portion of said line from the city limits to Twenty-Ninth and P streets having been conveyed to the Richmond Passenger & Power Company.

"(3) That by the provisions of the said ordinance of the city of Richmond of December 23, 1899, it was provided in subsection 5 of section 2, among other things, that the Richmond Passenger & Power Company should sell to all passengers, between the hours of 6 a. m. and 7 a. m., tickets at the rate of two for five cents, to be used only between the hours of 6 and 7 a. m. from Monday to Saturday, inclusive, said tickets being commonly known as 'labor tickets'; and it is further provided in said subsection of said section that each passenger, having paid his fare, may demand and receive from the conductor of the car upon which he first took passage a transfer ticket, without additional charge, which fare and transfer ticket should entitle such passenger to ride upon such car upon which he has taken passage to the point where the said line intersects with the line to which said passenger desires to be transferred, and after arriving at said point of intersection such passenger may take passage on the line indicated on said transfer ticket, and, on the surrender thereof to the conductor of such car, shall be permitted to ride to the end of the last-mentioned line. And it seems to the commission that these provisions of the said ordinance constitute a contract binding upon the said company, and with which it is obliged to comply.

"(4) That soon after said ordinance of December 23, 1899, became operative, the Richmond Passenger & Power Company and the then owners and operators of the said Seven Pines line put into effect and continued a system of transfers whereby passengers on either line, going in the direction of and wishing to be transferred to the other line, were given transfers for that purpose, which were received by the conductors of the respective lines, and passengers were so carried on a single fare to the end of each of these lines, and that on or about the same time the said labor tickets were put into effect on each of the said lines, and mutual transfers on said labor tickets allowed by and between the said lines, the point of transfer between the said two lines being at Twenty-Ninth and P streets, and that this arrangement for mutual transfers at the said point, and the sale of labor tickets, with the right of transfer on them, continued without interruption until the controversy now before the commission was brought about.

"Under the foregoing facts now found by the commission, and with all the testimony before it bearing upon these facts, the commission is of opinion that the council of the city of Richmond, in using the word 'line' in the section of the ordinance above mentioned, employed that word in its popular signification, and with reference to the circumstances out of which the granting of the said ordinance grew, and with reference to the urban and suburban street railroad conditions in and around the city of Richmond at that time, and that the line then known and since known as the 'Seven Pines Line' was an intersecting line. And considering the question before the commission in all its aspects, the commission is of opinion that it should not permit the two defendant companies to change the system of transfers and labor tickets which have been in effect for several years, and with reference to which the patronage of the defendant lines in the city of Richmond and in the growing section of Henrico county, adjacent to the city, along which the Seven Pines line runs, has been acquired.

"It is therefore ordered by the commission that in the matter of the said labor tickets, and the said transfers between the Seven Pines line of the Virginia Passenger & Power Company and the intersecting line in the city of Richmond of the Richmond Passenger & Power Company, the present system of the sale of said labor tickets and the interchange of transfers be continued, and that the advance in rates of fares which would follow from granting the petition of the two said companies in this proceeding be refused.

"It is therefore ordered that the application made in this proceeding by the Virginia Passenger & Power Company and the Richmond Passenger & Power Company be denied."

It thus appears that, in the view of the Corporation Commission, the railroad companies had assumed contractual obligations with respect to the sale of labor tickets and the giving of transfers in controversy. We think that the construction placed by the Corporation Commission upon the ordinances of the city is a reasonable and proper one, and this conclusion is greatly strengthened by the fact that it is the construction acted upon by the appellants, commencing a short time after the passage of the ordinances by the city, and continuing for about four years, when the railroad companies discontinued the sale of labor tickets and the giving of transfers, which led to the institution of the proceedings before the Corporation Commission. We have given the views of the Corporation Commission in full, because they are so clear and convincing that we are content to adopt them as the opinion of this court.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the order complained of, which is affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO. v. HARRIS.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

CARRIERS — INJURIES TO PASSENGERS — APPROACHES TO STATIONS — NEGLIGENCE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for injuries to a passenger by his falling into a ditch in going from a train to the platform on a dark night after he had alighted on direction of the trainmen, the evidence held to show that the company had failed to exercise that degree of care which the law required.

2. Where passengers were alighting on a dark night from a train indiscriminately on both sides, with the knowledge and assistance of the trainmen, and plaintiff, without knowledge as to the existence of the platform, fell into a ditch after alighting, he was not guilty of contributory negligence because, the company having provided a suitable platform for the purpose, it was his duty to use it.

3. Where plaintiff, who was ignorant of the surroundings, was directed to get off a train and go to the depot, and people were getting off on both sides of the train, evidence that he stated he did not get off on the other side of the train because there was such a rush, and he never followed a crowd in a rush, does not show a want of due care.

4. Where plaintiff, after alighting from a train and making his way to the platform, did not know, when walking on the end of the ties and holding to a car, that he was on a trestle or that he was in a dangerous position, he was not negligent, as he had the right to assume that the company had discharged its duty in making the approaches from its passenger cars to the station reasonably safe.

5. Where, on the whole case, no verdict other than that rendered against defendant could have been rightfully found, it is unnecessary to consider objections to instructions.

Error to Circuit Court, Fluvanna County.

Action by Julian O. Harris against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Leake & Leake, for plaintiff in error. Daniel Harmon and T. S. Martin, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. About 8:30 o'clock on the evening of April 13, 1903, Julian O. Harris was injured by falling into a culvert or ditch while making his way from a passenger train of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to its station at Bremo, in the county of Fluvanna, and this action was brought to recover damages therefor on the ground that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant company.

It appears that the plaintiff had on the morning of that day gone from Hardware, a station on the defendant's road west of Bremo, to Richmond, on an excursion train. That evening he, with many other persons boarded, as they supposed, the excursion train upon which they had gone to Richmond, to return home. After leaving Richmond, and before getting to Bremo, they were informed by the conductor that his train, being the regular accommodation from Richmond to that point, did not go beyond Bremo, and that they would have to get off his train there and wait at the station for the excursion train, which was following.

When the train upon which they were traveling reached Bremo, the engine was stopped at the usual place, but the train being longer than usual—consisting of the engine, a baggage car, and four passenger cars—the rear car and part of the next car in front of it did not reach the passenger platform, which was on the north side of the track. The passengers were directed to get off the train, so that it could be moved from the main track to a siding to make way for the excursion train.

The plaintiff, who was in the rear car, states that when the train stopped for Bremo it was very dark and raining; that he knew nothing about the place; that he started to get off the car, and some one said, "Do not do that. The depot is on the other side;" that he alighted on the depot side, and walked a few steps on the end of the ties, holding to a car that was standing on the track; that walking on the ties was so rough that he thought he would get off the ties, and onto a path which he expected to find on the side of the track, and, as he did so, or after making a few steps, he fell into a ditch, which was about 13 feet deep, and received the injuries complained of; that he saw neither conductor nor brakeman after the train reached Bremo; that no one directed or showed him which way to go; and that there was no light by which to be guided.

It is not denied that the night was dark, and that there was a heavy rain falling when the train reached Bremo. The statement of the plaintiff that the approaches to the depot and platform where he got off were without lights, and that no one rendered aid or assistance to persons getting off the rear of the train, is not only sustained by witnesses of the plaintiff, but also by the defendant's witness Thomas, who was with the plaintiff when he left the train, and near him when he was injured, and who states that when they got off the train there was no light to guide the passengers to the depot, nor was there any care taken by the trainmen to secure their safety, and that it was so dark they could not tell which way to go. The ditch into which the plaintiff fell was south of the depot siding, and not more than 15 or 18 feet from the passenger train.

The conductor of the passenger train states that he and his brakeman—he had only one—were on the passenger platform with their lanterns, assisting passengers to alight, and directing them to the depot, on the opposite side of the train from the platform, and that his baggage master, with his lantern, was on the depot side of the train, aiding passengers in getting off on that side, and directing them to the depot; that the destination of many of the passengers was Bremo, and that they did not want to go to the depot; that there were lights in the depot and in the train, and the signal lights were burning; and these statements of the conductor are sustained by the brakeman and the baggage master. No witness of the defendant testifies that there was sufficient light where the plaintiff left the train to guide him in his efforts to reach the depot, nor do they testify to such a state of facts as show that this was true. Conceding that the trainmen were where they state—aiding the passengers in getting off the train, and directing them where to go—their lanterns would furnish little, if any, light, except to those in their immediate vicinity.

The crowd was very large, the night dark, and it was raining hard. Two lanterns on one side of the train, and one on the other, and that not there until after the baggage master had put off the baggage for the station. The lights in the depot, from their character and location, could furnish little, if any, assistance to passengers on the rear part of the train, except to show the direction in which the depot was, and would not do that if the map put in evidence by the defendant is correct, as it shows that the two freight cars on the siding, and hereafter to be mentioned, were directly in the line of vision between the rear car and the depot.

The duties which a railway carrier of passengers owe to passengers going to and from its trains to the passenger station were considered by this court in the case of C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 49 S. E. 487, handed down at the last term of the court. It was said in the opinion of the court in that case that: "It is the duty of a railway company, for the protection of passengers carried or to be carried on its trains, to provide and maintain at its stations reasonably safe and adequate ways for approaching and leaving its trains, and at night to have such ways reasonably lighted a sufficient time before and after the arrival and departure of each train to enable passengers to avoid danger. * * * And where passengers are invited expressly or impliedly to get off a train at a place other than that at which they usually alight, and there is any special danger attending their approach to the station, it is the duty of the railway company to warn them of such danger, and to aid them in reaching the station in safety; and especially is this true in the nighttime."

Applying this rule to the facts and circumstances of this case, it is clear that the defendant did not exercise that degree of care for the protection of the plaintiff in going from its train to the station as the law imposed.

But it is insisted that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. One of the grounds relied on to show this is that, the defendant having provided a suitable and convenient platform for the purpose, it was the duty of the passenger to use it, in order to escape the imputation of negligence.

That proposition of law is, no doubt, correct, within certain limits. But the authorities relied on to sustain it show that it is based upon the fact that the passenger has knowledge of the existence of the platform, or its existence is so obvious that he must be held to have notice of it. Shear. & Red. on Neg. 521, in the same sentence quoted from by the defendant, say, that: "Passengers by rail should enter and leave cars by such methods as are, to their knowledge, provided for that purpose. * * * It is therefore generally, though not invariably, negligence for a passenger by rail to enter or leave on the opposite side from a landing platform. * * * But if the proper side or method of entry is not obvious, and the passenger is not proved to have had sufficient notice otherwise, he cannot be held in fault for selecting any method which is consistent with ordinary care."

The rule, as limited by the learned authors, can have no application to a case like this, where the passenger was not only without any knowledge whatever of the existence of the platform, but where the passengers on the train were getting off indiscriminately on both sides of the train, with the knowledge and assistance of the trainmen. The statement of the defendant's witness Thomas, if true—that he and the plaintiff first left the car on the platform side, and, after wandering around in the darkness and rain, got back on the car, and alighted from it on the other side—does not affect the question, for neither of them knew at that time or before the accident that there was a platform.

Upon his cross-examination the plaintiff stated that one reason why he did not get off on the other side of the train was "because there was such a rush, and that he never follows a crowd in such a rush as that." This, it is insisted, was evidence of contributory negligence.

Taken in the connection in which it was spoken, it does not show any want of due care on his part. He had just been told by some one that the depot was on the other side of the train. He had been directed to get off the train and go to the depot. People were getting off on both sides, and he had no reason to believe that the way to the depot from that side was any less safe than from the other. Ignorant as he was of his surroundings, he had the right to presume that the defendant company had discharged its duty in rendering both approaches safe as far as practicable. Bishop's Noncontract Law, § 1086; Brassell, etc., v. N. Y., etc., R. Co., 84 N. Y. 241.

It is further contended that, "although the plaintiff says that when he got off the train he started towards the depot, his own evidence shows that he must have started in an opposite direction, because he says that after he 'let loose the passenger train' he touched the freight cars; showing that the freight cars were confronting him as he alighted. Had he turned up towards the depot, he could never have reached the trestle and ditch, which could only have been reached by him by turning down the track away from the depot, and then going around the cars and starting towards the depot, as detailed by witness Thomas. This action was nothing short of negligence."

This contention is based upon a mistake of fact. The front end of the rear car, where the plaintiff alighted, as appears not only from the map filed by the defendant, but from the measurements made and the defendant's evidence as to the point where the train stopped, was several feet east of the east end of the freight cars standing on the depot siding over the culvert, and opposite the ditch into which the plaintiff fell. All four of the passenger cars and a small part of the baggage car were east of the depot. The aggregate length of the passenger cars was 229½ feet. The distance from the depot to the ditch was 104 feet. Thus showing clearly that the front end of the rear car, which was 52½ feet long, was more than 70 feet east of the ditch, and several feet east of the end of the freight car, whose west end was opposite the ditch, as shown by the map. The plaintiff, having gotten off the train east of the freight car, could never have reached it, except by going toward the depot. He states that when he got off his car somebody told him the depot was up the track; that he started in that direction; that after he let loose the passenger train he touched the freight car, and, holding onto it, walked upon the ties until, finding that they were so rough, he thought he would get off and walk upon a path which he expected to find on the side of the track; and that when he stepped off, or after making a few steps, he went down into the ditch.

It is evident from the physical facts in the case, as well as from the plaintiff's evidence, that when he got off the train he did not go from the depot, but towards it.

The contention is made that "the plaintiff was also negligent in attempting to cross the trestle—a feat so difficult that it had to be accomplished by his holding onto a freight car in order to get along. He says, 'I held onto the train [i. e., the freight cars] as long as I could, and when I had to step off the side of the track I went down into the ditch;' and again he stated that he walked on those ties and held onto the freight cars, and that he stepped off, thinking he would get in a path, and that when he released his hold on the freight cars he fell into the ditch. He knew, therefore, that he was in a dangerous and precarious situation, and the authorities cited above are sufficient to show that he should not have undertaken to cross the trestle, when there was a safe way which he could have discovered by the exercise of due care on his part. * * *

When the plaintiff's evidence is read as a whole, it does not show that the plaintiff, when walking on the end of the ties and holding onto the freight car, knew or had the least reason to believe that he was on a trestle, or that he was in a dangerous and precarious situation; and his conduct in letting go the car and stepping off the ties to get into a path, as he supposed, when or just before he fell into the ditch, shows how entirely ignorant he was of his danger. There is not only nothing in the case to show that he knew or had any reason to believe that in walking on the end of the ties by the freight car he was in peril, but he had the right to presume, as before stated, that the defendant had discharged its duty in making the approaches from its passenger cars to its station reasonably safe. Bishop's Noncontract Law, § —; Brassell v. N. Y., etc., R. Co., supra.

We are of opinion that the record does not show that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and that, upon the whole case, no verdict other than one against the defendant company could have been rightly found. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the objections made to the instructions given and refused in the case, since a decision of those questions could not affect the result. Southern Ry. Co. v. Oliver, 102 Va. 710, 47 S. E. 862; Richmond P. & P. Co. v. Allen, 103 Va. —, 49 S. E. 656, and cases cited.

The remaining assignment of error is that the damages allowed by the jury are excessive.

They do seem pretty heavy, but are not so great, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, as to furnish ground for believing that the jury were actuated by partiality or prejudice; and, unless this is so, under the well-settled rule in this state in this class of cases, the court should not disturb the verdict. Farish v. Reigle, 11 Grat. 697, 62 Am. Dec. 666; Richmond Ry., etc., Co. v. Garthright, 92 Va. 627, 24 S. E. 267, 32 L. R. A. 220, 53 Am. St. Rep. 839; Southern Ry. Co. v. Oliver, supra.

We are of opinion, therefore, to affirm the judgment.

DRIVER'S ADM'R v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 9, 1905.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—RAILROADS—COLLISION—WARNING SIGNALS—NEGLECT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—VIOLATION OF RULES—EVIDENCE—PLEADING—BILL OF PARTICULARS.

1. Though a bill of exceptions is the usual mode of making the court's action on a motion and exceptions thereto a part of the record, an order of court showing that plaintiff moved the court to require defendant to file a statement of its grounds of defense, that the motion was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted, is sufficient.

2. Under Code 1887, § 3249 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1709], providing that the court in any action may require a statement of the particulars of the claim or ground of defense, whether or not such statement shall be required is within the trial court's discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 951.]

3. Where, in an action against a railroad company for death of an employee, the grounds of defense actually relied on were defendant's want of negligence and negligence of decedent and his fellow servants, the court's refusal to require a statement of the ground of defense was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

4. Where a train properly made up at its starting point was changed by the conductor, evidence relating thereto, not tending to show authority to make the change, was properly rejected.

5. In an action against a railroad company for death resulting from collision, evidence showing a habitual disregard by employees of a rule requiring the placing of warning signals on the stoppage of trains on the track is properly excluded where it is not shown that the company had notice of the violations.

6. A railroad company is not chargeable with negligence in failing to maintain telegraph offices along its line not more than 10 miles apart, as required by Acts 1891-92, p. 969, c. 614, § 9 [Va. Code 1904, p. 672, § 1294d], where the accident occurred within less than 10 miles of a telegraph station, and before the train had reached another station where such an office was kept or required to be kept, and a strict compliance with the act would not have avoided the accident.

7. Where a train properly made up at the starting point was afterwards changed by the conductor, a fellow servant, without authority, and in violation of the company's rules, the company was not negligent because the train was improperly and dangerously made up.

8. Negligence in failing to give a train in advance special warning orders of a train following, which was dangerously made up, is not shown where it is not proven to have been the company's duty to notify such trains, and the dangerous make up was not known.

9. Where the proximate cause of a decedent's death by collision was his own failure to comply with the company's rules regarding the placing of danger signals, the company's negligence, if any, in using an engine in an imperfect condition, did not make it liable, as it was not a case of concurring negligence.

Error to Circuit Court, Prince William County.

Action by the administrator of Walter E. Driver against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Roller & Martz, R. A. Hutchinson, Marshall McCormick, and Sipe & Harris, for plaintiff in error. R. Walton Moore, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This action was brought by the personal representative of Walter E. Driver to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, caused by the alleged negligence of the Southern Railway Company prior to the constitutional and statutory changes made in the law of master and servant.

The deceased was the flagman (rear brakeman) on an extra freight train, No. 546, composed of 11 loaded and 4 empty cars, which left Manassas for Strasburg at 3:50 a. m., November 15, 1901, on a single-track, unblocked branch line of the defendant company, which is used day and night for the movement of scheduled and unscheduled trains. From some cause the engine did not steam well that morning, and made very poor speed. When the train reached Wellington, five miles from, and the first station west of, Manassas, it remained there some 25 minutes for the purpose of shifting cars and getting up steam. When the train got under way, it ran about half a mile, when it was stopped again for want of steam for about 10 minutes. After getting up steam, it started again, and, having gone a mile or a little more, and while running at the rate of 12 or 15 miles an hour, was run into by another extra train, No. 832, going in the same direction; and the plaintiff's intestate, who was in the caboose at the rear end of train No. 546, was killed. No. 832 was under orders to go to a station west of the point where the accident occurred, and left Manassas from three-quarters to one hour after No. 546 left there. No. 832 was properly made up at Alexandria, its starting point, but when it reached Manassas the conductor in charge of it turned the engine around, placed the caboose in front of the tender, and started the train towards its destination; and while running at the rate of 25 miles an hour ran into No. 546.

The grounds of negligence charged and relied on in the declaration, as stated in the petition for the writ of error, are that the defendant company disregarded the requirements of the statute (Acts 1891-92, p. 969, c. 614, § 9 [Va. Code 1904, p. 672, § 1294d]) as to maintaining and operating telegraph offices for the protection of its train service; in dispatching No. 832 improperly and dangerously made up; in failing to give special warning to No. 832 to proceed under control, and to look out for No. 546; and in failing to give No. 546 special orders that No. 832 was following in its dangerous make-up; and in failing to furnish an engine with sufficient power to move No. 546 in the usual way.

The first assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to require the defendant company to file a statement of its ground of defense.

It is insisted by the defendant that this assignment of error cannot be considered, because the ruling of the court complained of was not made a part of the record by a bill of exceptions.

While a bill of exceptions is the usual and regular mode of making the court's action upon such a motion and exception thereto a part of the record, it is not the only mode. The order or judgment of the court may itself show all that would be necessary for a bill of exceptions to show in order to make the matter a part of the record, and if it does it is sufficient. White v. Toucray, 9 Leigh, 847; Mitchell, etc., v. Baratta, 17 Grat. 445; Central Land Co. v. Obenchain, 92 Va. 130, 22 S. E. 876.

The order of the court shows that the plaintiff moved the court to require the defendant to file a statement of its grounds of defense, that the court overruled his motion, and that the plaintiff excepted to the court's action. This is all that a bill of exceptions would have shown, and is sufficient.

Section 3249 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1709] provides that "in any action or motion the court may order a statement to be filed of the particulars of the claim or of the ground of defense, and if a party fail to comply with such order, may, when the case is tried or heard, exclude evidence of any matter not described in the notice, declaration, or other pleading of such party so plainly as to give the adverse party notice of its character."

There is no inflexible rule as to the classes of cases in which a statement of the particulars of the plaintiff's claim or of the defendant's ground of defense will be required, but it rests in the sound judicial discretion of the court. This is the construction which has been placed upon the statute by the Massachusetts courts, from whose Code it was taken. Richmond v. Leaker, 99 Va. 1, 87 S. E. 348; Blake v. Everett, 1 Allen, 248; Commonwealth v. Giles, 1 Gray, 466.

While the question of whether or not such statement shall be required to be filed is within the discretion of the trial court, to be soundly exercised under all the circumstances of the particular case, its action in granting or refusing such request will be supervised by the appellate court; but such action will not be reversed unless it is plainly erroneous. Hites' Case, 96 Va. 489, 31 S. E. 895; Payne v. Zell, 98 Va. 294, 36 S. E. 379.

The grounds of defense actually relied on by the defendant were those generally, if not invariably, relied on in such cases out of abundant caution on the part of counsel, viz., that the defendant was not negligent, or, if it was, the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the injured employé and his fellow servants. How the refusal of the court to require such a statement as that could have prejudiced the plaintiff we are unable to see.

The second, third, and fourth assignments of error may be considered together. They are all based upon rulings of the court in reference to the improper make-up of No. 832 at Manassas.

There is no question that the conductor, McDonald, directed it to be made up in the condition it was when it left that point. The plaintiff sought to show that the defendant intrusted him with the duty of making up the train, which it is agreed was one of the nonassignable duties of the master. The defendant, on the other hand, claimed that the train was properly made up by the defendant company in Alexandria, the point from which the train started, and, having been made up properly there, the act of the conductor at Manassas in turning the engine around and running it backward with caboose ahead of the tender was without authority of the defendant, and in violation of its rules. The court held that, if the plaintiff could show "authority from the master to change the order of that train at Manassas, why then the master is liable. It was the duty of the master to have sent that train out in proper form at the point of origin. If it was changed without orders, or contrary to the rule of the company, afterwards, they are not liable."

This, we think, was a correct statement of the law. But the plaintiff did not avow that it could show that McDonald was authorized by the company to make the change, nor does the evidence which was rejected, as set out in bills of exceptions numbered 1 and 2, when considered in connection with what preceded and followed it, tend to show such authority. It was therefore properly rejected.

The evidence which was permitted to go to the jury over the objection of the plaintiff, as shown by bill of exceptions No. 3, if error at all, was harmless error. It seems to have been a concession all through the case that the change in the make-up of the train at Manassas was done by McDonald's orders. The point in controversy was not as to the fact that he ordered the change, but as to his authority to make it.

The next assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to permit the plaintiff to show that the employé of the defendant habitually disregarded rule No. 99, which provided that: "When a train is stopped at an unusual point or is delayed at a regular stopover three minutes, or when it fails to make its schedule time, the flagman must immediately go back with danger signals to stop any train moving in the same direction. At a point one-half of a mile (or 18 telegraph poles) from the rear of his train he must put torpedo on the rail on engineman's side; he must then continue to go back at least three-fourths of a mile (or 27 telegraph poles) from the rear of his train and place two torpedoes on the rail ten yards apart from rail length, when he may return to a point one-half of a mile (or 18 telegraph poles) from the rear of train, and he must remain there until recalled, but if a passenger train is due within ten minutes he must remain until it arrives. When he comes in he will remove the torpedoes nearest the train, but the two torpedoes must be left on the rail as a caution to any following train. If the delay occurs upon single track, and it becomes necessary to protect the front of the train, or if any other track is obstructed, the front brakeman must go forward and use the same precautions. If the front brakeman is unable to leave the train, the fireman must be sent in his place. In descending grades or during blinding storms or fog, the flagman must go as much farther than the distance named above as will insure absolute safety, placing the torpedoes at relatively greater distances from the obstruction."

The importance of this rule not only appears from the rule itself, but is referred to and emphasized by other rules of the company. The bill of exceptions sets out what the plaintiff expected to prove, but it does not state that he expected to prove that the defendant knew of such violation, or neglected to enforce the rule. On the contrary, the court certifies that certain rules of the defendant (of which No. 99 was one) were admitted and agreed by the parties to be the identical rules in force and effect prior to and at the time of the accident. One of the grounds upon which the court bases its refusal to admit the evidence rejected was that it was not shown that the defendant company had notice of the violation of rule 99.

This was a sufficient ground upon which to justify its action, under the facts disclosed, even if the other grounds were insufficient, as to which we express no opinion; for it is settled law that an employé will not be absolved from the imputation of contributory negligence for violating a rule of the master, made for his own as well as for the protection of others, because that rule is habitually disregarded, unless it appears (and the burden is upon the plaintiff to show this) that it was done with the knowledge of the master, or he had so neglected to enforce it as that his conduct amounted to a suspension of the rule. Wright v. Southern Ry. Co., 101 Va. 36, 42 S. E. 913.

The remaining assignment of error is to the action of the court in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the evidence.

The plaintiff insists that the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to maintain and operate telegraph offices as required by statute.

By section 9, c. 614, p. 969, Acts 1891-92 [Va. Code 1904, p. 672, § 1294d], it is provided that: "Every railroad company doing business in this state shall establish and maintain along its line, at depots or stations, not more than ten miles apart, telegraphic offices, to be operated for the protection of its train service by competent persons in the employ of such company: provided, however, that the railroad commissioner may grant such company, in special cases, permission to have its telegraphic offices at the distance from each other greater than ten but not more than fifteen miles. It shall be the duty of every such operator to telegraph the arrival and departure of every train, as soon as it shall leave the depot or station, to the train dispatcher or other person regulating the running of trains, and if there be no such persons, then to the nearest telegraph office in the direction in which such train is going. The person receiving the telegram shall forthwith give such order or notification by telegraph as may be necessary to prevent any collision of trains."

The accident occurred within less than 10 miles of Manassas, where there was a station with a telegraph office, and before the train had reached another station where there was such an office kept or required to be kept. If there had been a telegraph office in operation at the next station beyond where the accident occurred and within 10 miles of Manassas, a strict compliance with the provisions of the statute would not have avoided the accident, since the statute imposed no duty upon the defendant as to the train in question until it had reached such station.

Neither was there any negligence shown in dispatching No. 832 improperly and dangerously made up, since the train was properly made up at Alexandria, and was afterwards changed by the conductor, a fellow servant (N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Houchins, 95 Va. 398, 28 S. E. 578, 46 L. R. A. 359, 64 Am. St. Rep. 791), without authority, and in violation of the rules of the defendant.

Another ground relied on to show negligence on the part of the defendant, was its failure "to give special warning orders to No. 832 to proceed under control, and to keep a lookout for No. 546, and in failing to give No. 546 special warning orders that No. 832 was following in its dangerous make-up." The evidence was that No. 832 was notified that No. 546 was ahead, and to keep a lookout for it. It was not shown to be the duty of the defendant to notify No. 546 that No. 832 was following, and it could not have given any warning of the latter's dangerous make-up because it did not know it.

The remaining charge of negligence on the part of the defendant is "in failing to furnish an engine with sufficient power to move No. 546 in the usual way."

"It would," as was said by the Court of Appeals of New York in Bajus v. Syracuse Co., 103 N. Y. 312, 8 N. E. 529, 57 Am. Rep. 723, "impose upon every railroad company very embarrassing, onerous, and unjust responsibilities, if in the case of accidents with moving trains it was to be the subject of inquiry before a jury whether the particular accident might not have been avoided with an engine of greater or less power. If this engine, drawing a train upon a railroad, had, in consequence of its imperfect condition, become stalled, so that passengers and freight failed to reach their destination in time, or if, when placed at rest, it had run away in consequence of the leakage through its throttle valve, different questions would have been presented for our consideration. But, without violating any rules that have been laid down for the protection of the employes, we are constrained to hold in this case that this was not, as to the plaintiff, a dangerous engine; that it was reasonably safe and proper; and that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in putting it to the service in which it was employed; and that, therefore, upon the facts as they now appear, the plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendant."

That seems to us to be a correct statement of the rule of law applicable to cases like this. But if the defendant had been guilty of negligence, as to the plaintiff's intestate, in using the engine as it did in its then condition, that negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury, and therefore it was not a case of concurring negligence. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 792, 40 S. E. 54, and authorities cited. The proximate cause of the death of the plaintiff's unfortunate intestate, as clearly appears from the evidence, was his own failure to comply with rule 99 of the defendant, which made it his duty, when his train was delayed at Wellington more than three minutes, and when it was stopped west of that station at an unusual place, to go back with danger signals to warn any train moving in the same direction. If he had done this, the accident would have been avoided. It is insisted, however, that it is not clearly proved that he did not comply with that rule. We think it is; but, if he did comply with it, then the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of his fellow servant, the conductor on No. 836, in turning his engine around at Manassas and running it backward, with the caboose ahead of it, so that the engineer did not and could not see No. 546 as he approached it. The evidence is uncontradicted that, but for this change in the make-up of the train by the conductor, No. 546 could have been seen, and the collision avoided.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and that it must be affirmed.

BANK OF UNION v. NICKELL et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 31, 1905.)

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—DEATH OF DEBTOR—LIMITATIONS—NEW PROMISE—COMMISSIONER IN CHANCERY—REPORT—EXCEPTIONS.

1. If a creditors' suit is brought to settle up a decedent's estate, and a creditor of the decedent files a claim against the estate, before the commissioner to whom the case is referred, to convene the creditors and state an account therein, involving purely personal transactions between the creditor and deceased, the creditor, under section 23, c. 130, Code 1899, is incompetent to give evidence as to such claim.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 566-569.]

2. Where a debt is barred by the statute of limitations, and a new promise or acknowledgment is relied upon to remove the bar, there must be an express promise to pay, or an acknowledgment of the debt, unaccompanied by reservations or conditions, from which an implied promise will arise, and the writing ought to be such a one as, if declared upon, would support the action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, §§ 585, 591-613.]

3. To take advantage of a report of a commissioner in chancery on the ground that the evidence taken before him is insufficient to support his findings, it is necessary that the report be excepted to; but where the report is erroneous upon its face, the error can be taken advantage of without such exception.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monroe County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Bill by the Bank of Union against R. B. Nickell, administrator of C. P. Nickell and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified.

Rowan & Boggess, for appellants. J. D. Logan and John Osborne, for appellee.

SANDERS, J. The Bank of Union brought a chancery suit in the circuit court of Monroe county against R. B. Nickell, administrator of C. Patton Nickell, deceased, for the purpose of settling up his estate. Upon the maturity of the bill the case was referred to M. J. Keister, commissioner in chancery, and thereafter the commissioner made and filed his report, as directed by the decree, and, among other things, reported a debt in favor of James B. Fisher for the sum of $109.78; with interest from January 12, 1899, and another for the sum of $251.62, in favor of J. D. Logan, special receiver in the case of W. W. Brown v. Geo. Lemon's Heirs et al. The report was excepted to by R. B. Nickell, administrator, in so far as it allowed any part of the debt claimed by Fisher, first, because there was no proof of the debt, and, second, because, if proven, it was barred by the statute of limitations. On the 23d day of October, 1903, a decree was entered sustaining said exception indorsed as to the Fisher debt, as to the sum of $18, and overruling the exception as to the residue, and giving a recovery in favor of Fisher for $91.78, with interest from January 12, 1899, and a recovery in favor of J. D. Logan, special receiver, for the sum of $251.62. Thereafter R. B. Nickell, administrator, and others, filed a bill of review against the Bank of Union and others, asking that the final decree of October 23, 1903, adjudicating the said claims of Fisher and Logan, receiver, be reviewed and reversed, and on the 18th day of March, 1904, the defendants demurred to the bill of review, which demurrer was sustained and said bill was dismissed, and the defendants filed their petition for an appeal from the final decrees entered at the October term, 1903, taking recoveries in favor of Fisher and Logan, receiver, and the March term, 1904, dismissing the bill of review.

The first question is, should the court have sustained the exception to the commissioner's report as to the Fisher debt? The commissioner certified with his report all the evidence that was taken before him, and among the witnesses who testified relative to this claim was Fisher, the creditor. Objection was made to his evidence upon the ground that his claim was based upon a personal transaction had with C. Patton Nickell, who was deceased at the time of the giving of his evidence, and under section 23, c. 130, of the Code of 1899, this objection is based, and is clearly sound. But it is claimed by Fisher that without his testimony there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the commissioner as to his claim. But we find that there is no evidence that could, from any standpoint of view, be considered as sufficient to establish his debt, the only other witnesses being Miller and Cummings, neither of whom seem, from their evidence, to know anything about this transaction; and the letter of C. Patton Nickell, which was introduced before the commissioner and filed along with his report, and relied upon by Fisher to prove his claim, certainly does not do so. All that he says in the letter is: "I herewith enclose you check for $15.00, it is the best I can do for you at present." Now, there is no statement here, except by implication, that he at that time owed him anything else, and, if so, there is nothing to show what the amount of it is. Therefore the commissioner could not have based any allowance to Fisher upon this letter. There should be evidence, before a recovery can be taken, to show that the decedent, Nickell, was indebted to Fisher, and, if so, in what sum, and there is no evidence from which this can be fairly inferred, to say nothing about that full proof which should be required to establish claims of this character.

Then, again, the exception on the ground that Fisher's claim is barred by the statute of limitations is well taken, the entire account being made in the year 1895 and the years preceding, and this suit being brought on the 28th of April, 1902, more than five years since the last item in the account appears to have been charged. Not one of these items appears to have been charged later than March 7, 1895. But it is contended for, on behalf of Fisher, that the letter of C. Patton Nickell, filed before the commissioner, constitutes a new promise or acknowledgment of the debt, such as to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, and that in computing the time it should date from the 12th day of January, 1899, the date of the letter. This letter is as follows:

"Sinks Grove, W. Va., Jan. 12th, 1899.

"Mr. J. B. Fisher—Dear Sir: I enclose check for $15.00, it is the best I can do for you at present. I just happened to get it yesterday. Hope this will be satisfactory. Love to all. With kind wishes to all the family I am your obedient servant,

"C. Patton Nickell.

"Please send me a receipt for the $15.00 fifteen dollars."

There is nothing contained in this letter that even shows an acknowledgment upon the part of Nickell that he is indebted to Fisher, and, if it could be so construed, it certainly does not fix any specific sum, which would have to be done in order to remove the statute. In order to create such a promise under the law as to take the claim without the statute of limitations, there must be an express promise to pay, or an acknowledgment, unaccompanied by reservations or conditions, from which an implied promise will arise, and the promise ought to be such a one as, if declared upon, would support itself. All that Nickell did was to send Fisher the check for $15, and say to him, "This is the best I can do for you at present." How could this be construed as a promise to pay or an acknowledgment of the debt? There is no sum named, and no reference to anything by which it could be ascertained, and nothing in the letter to show that he did not intend to rely upon the statute of limitations. "An acknowledgment in writing, to operate as a new promise to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, must be a clear and definite acknowledgment of a precise sum, plainly importing a willingness and liability to pay, not in any wise conditional, nor by way of compromise or attempt at settlement." Stiles v. Laurel Fork Oil & Coal Co., 47 W. Va. 838, 35 S. E. 986. Where a party relies upon a new promise to remove the statute of limitations, the burden is upon him to show such promise. "The burden of removing the bar of the statute of limitations by a new promise rests upon the defendants, and an acknowledgment or admission, to have that effect, must not only be unqualified in itself, but there must be nothing in the attendant acts or declarations to modify or rebut the inference of willingness to pay, which naturally and prima facie arises from an unqualified admission." Stansbury v. Stansbury's Adm'rs, 20 W. Va. 23. "A new promise must not be uncertain. It must acknowledge a fixed sum, or a balance which admits of ready ascertainment." Quarrier's Adm'r v. Quarrier's Heirs, 36 W. Va. 310, 15 S. E. 154. Numerous authorities could be cited to support this view, but it is entirely unnecessary to do so, in view of the fact that it is such a well-established legal proposition.

The appellants did not except to the report of the commissioner as to the debt for which a recovery was taken in the decree of Octo ber 23, 1903, of $251.62, in favor of Logan, receiver, but claim that they have a right to take advantage of it in this court for the first time. A party has the right to take advantage of any error appearing upon the face of a commissioner's report without excepting thereto. This is the well-settled law of this state, having been decided time and again. Windom v. Stewart, 48 W. Va. 488, 37 S. E. 808; Kester v. Lyon, 40 W. Va. 161, 20 S. E. 933; Bank v. Shirley, 28 W. Va. 563. But unless the error appears upon the face of the report, it will be presumed by the court as admitted to be correct by the parties, not only so far as it settles the principles of the account, but also in regard to the sufficiency of the evidence upon which it is founded. Poling v. Huffman, 48 W. Va. 639, 37 S. E. 526. "Where a commissioner's report is confirmed without exception, this court will not look into the evidence on which it is founded or by which it might be affected, but will accept the findings of such commissioner, as to all facts depending on extrinsic evidence, as final and conclusive." Long v. Willis, 50 W. Va. 341, 40 S. E. 340. And, also, see case of McCarty v. Chalfant, 14 W. Va. 531; Ward v. Ward, 21 W. Va. 262; Thompson's Adm'r v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 525. We cannot look to the evidence, because that cannot be treated as the face of the report; but, in order to take advantage of the insufficiency of the testimony to establish a claim, exception should be indorsed to the report, pointing out specifically the reasons why the claim should not have been allowed. There is abundant authority to show that the evidence should not be considered in determining the question as to whether or not there is error upon the face of the report. Among them are the cases of Bank v. Shirley, supra; Kester v. Lyon, supra. The court holds in these cases that the only thing that can be treated as the face of the report is the face of the report proper and the pleadings in the cause. It does not include depositions and documentary evidence. Therefore the position taken, that the evidence does not sustain the Logan claim, cannot be considered, for the reason that no exception was taken to the report on that ground. Not being able to look to the evidence on the question of the Logan claim, it is proper to inquire, is there any error upon the face of the report? The appellants point out none, and we see from the report that the commissioner, upon the question of reporting the indebtedness against Nickell's estate, says: "Statement No. 3. Showing all the debts against the estate of C. Patton Nickell, dec'd, with their amounts, dignities and priorities;" and in this statement, under "Class 3," he refers to a decree of March 2, 1900, showing the appointment of J. D. Logan, special receiver, to collect from C. Patton Nickell and others the sum of $185.11, with interest, making, as of October 20, 1903, the sum of $251.62, the amount of the recovery in favor of Logan, receiver. This reports the claim of Logan, receiver, against the estate of C. Patton Nickell, deceased, and in favor of Logan, receiver, the person the report shows was appointed to collect it, and therefore we find no error upon the face of the commissioner's report as to this debt.

The decree of the circuit court, entered on the 23d day of October, 1903, confirming the commissioner's report, is modified and corrected in so far as a recovery is taken in favor of James B. Fisher for the sum of $91.73, with interest from January 12, 1899, and this recovery is stricken from said decree; and the decree in all other respects is affirmed.

COBB v. GLENN BOOM & LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 31, 1905.)

DIRECTING VERDICT—VENDOR AND PURCHASER — CONTRACT — STATUTE OF FRAUDS — TELE-GRAMS—CORPORATIONS—AUTHORITY OF SEC-RETARY—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

1. On a motion to exclude all the plaintiff's evidence and direct a verdict for the defendant, the court should be guided by what its action would be if the case were submitted to the jury, and they should find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff upon such evidence. If it would be the duty of the court to set aside the verdict of the jury because without sufficient evidence, then the court should sustain the motion to exclude, and instruct the jury to find for the defendant. But if, on the other hand, the evidence is such that, under the law, the court should refuse to set aside the verdict, the motion to exclude the evidence should be overruled.

2. A contract for the sale of real estate may be made by means of telegraphic communications, and if it can be collected from the telegrams referring to one another and directly related to one another, so that it may be fairly said to constitute one paper relating to the contract, and if the telegrams are signed by the parties or their agents, and it appears by them that the minds of the parties met, and that the terms of the contract, by referring to the telegrams, can be made to clearly appear, it is a sufficient compliance with the statute which requires contracts for the sale of real estate to be "in writing and signed by the party to be charged thereby, or his agent."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Frauds, Statute of, § 199.]

3. The secretary of a corporation has no power, merely as such secretary, to make contracts binding the corporation; and if the secretary, by virtue of his office, makes a contract selling the real estate belonging to the corporation, the contract is not enforceable against the corporation, unless it appears that the secretary had express authority to make such contract, or had been clothed with apparent authority by the corporation to do so, or that the corporation had acquiesced in or ratified the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1613.]

4. Where a person deals with an agent, it is his duty to ascertain the extent of his agency. He deals with him at his own risk. The law presumes him to know the extent of the agent's power, and, if the agent exceeds his authority, the contract will not bind the principal, but only the agent. Rosendorf v. Poling, 37 S. E. 555, 48 W. Va. 621.

5. The message sent to a telegraph office, to be transmitted in reply to one received, is the original, and not the message received at the place to which it is transmitted. The latter must be considered as a copy, and carries with it none of the qualities of primary evidence, and cannot be admitted until the foundation is laid for the admission of secondary evidence, and then can only be admitted upon proof that the copy offered is a correct transcript of a message actually authorized by the party sought to be affected by its contents. But even where the original is produced, its authenticity must be established, and this either by proof of the handwriting, or by other proof establishing its genuineness.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Tucker County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Action by W. H. Cobb against the Glenn Boom & Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. B. Maxwell and J. P. Scott, for plaintiff in error. A. Jay Valentine and L. Hansford, for defendant in error.

SANDERS, J. This is an action of assumpsit brought in the circuit court of Tucker county, wherein the plaintiff claims that he entered into an executory contract with the defendant, by which he purchased from it 800 acres of land lying in Randolph county, at $15 per acre, and that after the making of said contract the defendant sold the timber on said land to another person, thereby rendering it impossible for it to carry out its contract with him, and claiming damages in the sum of $5,000. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and filed an affidavit denying that it signed or authorized the signing of the telegrams in the declaration mentioned, and upon this issue the case was tried. After the plaintiff introduced all his evidence, the court, upon motion of the defendant, excluded it from the jury, and instructed them to find a verdict in favor of the defendant. The jury returned a verdict as instructed, and the court rendered judgment thereon, and it is this judgment that we are now asked to review.

The right of the courts in this state to exclude the evidence from the jury, and to peremptorily instruct a verdict in favor of the defendant, has been for many years well settled; but it was not until the decision in the case of Ketterman v. Dry Fork Railroad Co., 48 W. Va. 606, 37 S. E. 683, that a well-defined and proper test was made for the guidance of the courts, for the decisions previous thereto, while they all recognized the well-settled practice to be that the defendant had the right to make such motion, and the province and duty of the court to sustain it in any proper case, yet the difficulty has been when such a motion should prevail, and by what rule the court is to be guided. Judge Green holds, in the case of Franklin v. Geho, 30 W. Va. 34, 3 S. E. 168, that a motion to exclude all the plaintiff's evidence and direct a verdict for the defendant is equivalent to a demurrer to the evidence; and Judge Holt, in the case of Aqua Impt. Co. v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 34 W. Va. 764, 12 S. E. 771, holds that a motion to exclude or strike out evidence is not in all cases the equivalent of a demurrer to the evidence, and that it should not, without modification, be permitted to supersede and replace such demurrer; and then, again, in the same book (the case of Bridge Co. v. Bridge Co., 34 W. Va. 156, 11 S. E. 1009), Judge Lucas holds that a motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence ought to be overruled where the court cannot grant the same without usurping the functions of the jury. And then, in Carrico v. W. Va. Central & Pa. Ry. Co., 35 W. Va. 389, 14 S. E. 12, it is held that a motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence on the ground that it is insufficient to warrant a verdict should not be granted if there be any evidence which tends in any degree, however slight, to prove the plaintiff's case; and in the case of Henry v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 235, 21 S. E. 863, it is laid down, in the ninth point of the syllabus, "Whenever the evidence tends in a fairly appreciable degree to sustain the plaintiff's action, the court must not strike out the evidence or direct a verdict for the defendant." Also in Guinn v. Bowers, 44 W. Va. 507, 29 S. E. 1027, the rule is laid down to be that a motion to exclude plaintiff's evidence on the ground that it is insufficient to warrant a verdict will not be granted if there be any evidence which tends, in any degree, however slight, to prove his case. Therefore it will be seen, from these various decisions, that in some it is held that the motion to exclude should be treated as a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence; and in the case of Aqua Impt. Co. v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., supra, it is held that in all cases it is not the equivalent of a demurrer to the evidence, and then, in others, that if there be any evidence tending in any degree, however slight it may be, to make out the plaintiff's case, the motion should be overruled; and then, again, we find that in some it is said that, if there is any evidence tending in any appreciable degree to establish the plaintiff's contentions, the court should not exclude the evidence. The question as to when evidence tends in any appreciable degree to support the plaintiff's claim is very difficult to determine. What is meant by "appreciable degree," in passing upon questions of this kind, is hard to define; and then to say that a court should not exclude the evidence because there is some evidence, no matter how slight it may be, to make out the plaintiff's case, means that the court shall submit many cases to the jury for its decision, when, at the same time, it is perfectly apparent that if the jury should find a verdict for the plaintiff the court will be compelled to set it aside because contrary to the evidence. It seems contrary to good reason to say that when the plaintiff has introduced all of his evidence, and from that evidence the court could not sustain a verdict in his favor, the court should overrule a motion to exclude the evidence, and continue the trial of a case without merit. The proper test is that when a motion is made to exclude the plaintiff's evidence the court should be guided by what its ruling would be, should that evidence be submitted to the jury, and upon it the jury find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. If it would be the duty of the court to set aside the verdict because manifestly contrary to the evidence, then it is the duty of the court to exclude it from the consideration of the jury, and instruct them to find in favor of the defendant. This question was discussed by Judge Brannon in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Ketterman v. R. R. Co., and, while he did not expressly lay this rule down to be the true test, yet he substantially held it to be so.

We look to the evidence to see whether or not the court did right in excluding the plaintiff's evidence. To establish his case, plaintiff relies upon certain letters and telegraphic communications, which, in order to get a more complete understanding of the case, are here given in extenso:

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 25, 1901. W. H. Cobb, Esqr., Elkins, W. Va.—Dear Sir: Your valued communication of 22nd inst. just at hand. We realize that the point you make regarding the difficulty of working our whole tract from one side, is probably well taken, and for that reason we have no objection to making sale of the land lying on the Otter Creek side & Shafers Fork side separately. But we do not think the price you offer ($12.50) per acre for the land on Otter Creek side is sufficient for it. You know this tract is exceptionally well timbered and will not grow less with time. Besides the coal question should be taken into consideration to a certain extent. We feel positive there is coal in paying quantities on this tract, although we have not had it opened up. Yours truly, Glenn Boom & Lumber Co., per W. H. Sager, Secty."

"Elkins, W. Va., Nov. 27th, 1901. To W. H. Sager, c/o Glenn Boom & Lumber Co., Sunbury, Pa.: Wire best cash price on Otter Creek land. My offer about limit. W. H. Cobb."

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 27th, 1901. Fifteen dollars. W. H. Sager."

"Elkins, W. Va., Nov. 27th, 1901. To W. H. Sager, c/o Glenn Boom & Lumber Co., Sunbury, Pa.: Will take Otter Creek land at price named. W. H. Cobb."

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 28th, 1901. To W. H. Cobb, Elkins, W. Va.: Our Mr. Chester will reach Elkins Monday to consult with you. Letter to-day. W. H. Sager."

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 28th, 1901. W. H. Cobb, Elkins, W. Va.—Dear Sir: Your Teleg. of 27th rec'd. Our Mr. Chester will reach Elkins about Monday evening to arrange terms of sale with you and enter into agreement with you if satisfactory all around. Yours truly, W. H. Sager, Sect'y Glenn Boom & L. Co."

The court sustained the objection to the introduction of all the telegrams, except the first one mentioned, sent by the plaintiff to Sager, care of the defendant, inquiring the price of the land, and also sustained the objection to the introduction of the letter dated November 28, 1901. But we will first look to see if from these letters and telegrams the plaintiff has shown such an executory contract as he could specifically enforce, for this is the basis of his action, and without establishing such a contract as he could, in a court of equity, specifically enforce against the defendant for the sale of said land, he would not be entitled to recover in this action. Under chapter 98 of the Code of 1899, a contract relating to the sale of real estate, to be binding, must be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged thereby, or his agent. This brings us to the question, is the contract made by the letters and telegrams such a one as meets the requirements of the statute of frauds above referred to? It is not necessary that the whole agreement should be written upon one piece of paper, but if it can be fully collected from various papers referring to one another, or directly related to one another, such as letters and telegrams written and sent, and the replies thereto, so that they may be fairly said to constitute one paper relating to the contract, it is a sufficient agreement, if it appears that the minds of the parties met, and if the terms of the contract, by referring to the various writings, can be made to clearly appear. Gaines v. McAdam, 79 Ill. App. 201; Elbert v. Gas Co., 97 Cal. 244, 32 Pac. 9; Brewer v. Horst, 127 Cal. 643, 60 Pac. 418, 50 L. R. A. 240; 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1092; 5 L. R. C. C. P. 295; Smith et al. v. Easton, 54 Md. 138, 39 Am. Rep. 355; Story on Contracts, 1449.

While these letters and telegrams constitute a complete contract between the parties to them, yet, if they were written and sent by some person other than the one who is sought to be charged, it is necessary that the authority of the person writing and sending them should be shown. The defendant filed an affidavit with its plea, as provided by section 40, c. 125, of the Code of 1899, denying that it signed or authorized the signing of the telegrams which are claimed to have been received by the plaintiff. If not, under the general issue, without such affidavit, certainly under this plea, verified by affidavit, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that W. H. Sager, in signing these telegrams, was authorized by the defendant to do so on its behalf. There is no such authority shown or attempted to be shown, except that the evidence shows that Sager at the time was the secretary of the defendant company, but does not show that he had any other connection with the defendant, or that he had authority to make the sale of the land in question. A secretary of a corporation, as such, has no authority to make contracts for it. "The secretary of a corporation has no power, merely as secretary of the company, to make contracts for it. The secretary is one of the corporate officers, but he has practically no authority. The corporation may, of course, expressly authorize the secretary to contract for it, or may accept and ratify his contracts after they are made." Cook on Corp. § 717. And then Thompson on Corporations, § 4697, says: "The law does not ordinarily imply, in the secretary of a business corporation, the power, ex officio, to bind the company by means of letters or documents signed officially." And also in Clark & Marshall on Corporations, § 704, we find: "Unless authority is expressly conferred, however, or he is clothed with apparent authority by being entrusted with the management of the business, or part of it, the secretary of the corporation has no authority to make any contracts on its behalf and in its name, or bind it by such acts. He has no such authority merely by virtue of his office." The secretary not having authority by virtue of his office to make such a contract as is relied upon by the plaintiff for the basis of this suit, the defendant cannot be held liable by reason of the letters and telegrams sent by Sager unless he had at the time express authority from the corporation to make sale of this land, or unless he was held out by the defendant in such a way as to make it apparent that he had such authority, or unless the contract was ratified by the defendant. Every one who deals with an agent is presumed to know the extent of his authority, and, if he exceeds his express or apparent authority, his acts do not bind the principal, but only bind the agent, unless they have been ratified by the principal. Curry v. Hale, 15 W. Va. 867; Dyer v. Duff, 39 W. Va. 148, 19 S. E. 540, 24 L. R. A. 339; Wells v. Michigan Life Ins. Co., 41 W. Va. 131, 23 S. E. 527; Rosendorf v. Poling, 48 W. Va. 621, 37 S. E. 555.

It is claimed that the letter of the 25th day of November, 1901, addressed to the plaintiff, and signed by "Glenn Boom & Lumber Co., per W. H. Sager, Secty.," shows that negotiations were pending for the sale of this land, and that the telegrams sent by Sager to the plaintiff in reply to the plaintiff's telegrams, having come from the proper place and the proper officer of the defendant, raises the presumption that they were directed to be sent by the defendant. There is no such presumption arising from the facts in this case. While the letter shows that it was signed by the defendant, "per Sager, Secty.," yet that does not show that Sager had authority to sign it; taking it that the letter is material to this controversy, which we think it is not, because, if a contract for the sale of this land was made, it was consummated by the three telegrams—the one asking the price of the land, the one in reply, quoting the price, and the one of the plaintiff accepting the proposition and agreeing to take the land—and, none of these papers being shown to have been signed by the defendant or its authorized agent, the circuit court committed no error when it sustained the motion of the defendant to exclude the evidence and direct a verdict for it.

But even if Sager had been shown to have authority to make this sale for the defendant, the telegrams sent by Sager were not proper to be admitted as evidence, because their genuineness had not been shown. There is nothing to show that they had in reality been written and signed by Sager. From the authorities, there is some difficulty in determining what are original telegrams, within the meaning of the rule that the best evidence must be produced. "By the decided weight of authority, the question whether the communication sent, or the one received, is to be deemed the original, depends upon which party is responsible for its transmission—in other words, for whom the telegraph company is agent. If there is but a single communication, the dispatch as delivered at the place of destination is the best evidence. * * * Of course, there must be competent proof that the alleged sender did actually send or authorize the sending of the message in question. * * * In proving a contract by telegrams, the best evidence is the telegram containing the offer as received at the point of destination, and the dispatch containing the acceptance as delivered for transmission." Jones on Evidence, § 209. Now, in this case the plaintiff adopted the telegraphic system as a means for making the contract here relied upon, and made inquiry of Sager as to what he would take for the land in question, to which Sager replied, giving him the price, which plaintiff accepted. Now, in accordance with the above authority, the best evidence is the telegrams of the plaintiff as received at their destination, and the telegram of Sager at the place at which it was delivered for its transmission. But then, again, there is no evidence, as we have noticed above, that Sager, in sending the telegrams, was acting as the agent of the defendant, and, of course, for that reason they were inadmissible. It is argued that the telegrams are without the jurisdiction of the court, and, even if this is true, it does not authorize the introduction of copies of them until their genuineness has been shown, and the authority of the person sending them to do so. If such a message as the plaintiff claims was sent to him, he could have shown the authenticity of it when delivered to be telegraphed to him, and then show that, as it was delivered to the telegraph company, it was transmitted and delivered at the place of destination. But whether a copy is introduced, or the original, it is necessary that the genuineness of it should be shown, before it becomes competent evidence. "A dispatch or a copy of a dispatch purporting to have been sent by A. B., as cashier, to C. D., cannot be read in evidence without first proving that it was a genuine paper; that is, that it was written and sent by the party whose name it bears." National Bank v. National Bank, 7 W. Va. 544. And also see Smith & Whiting v. Easton, 54 Md. 138, 39 Am. Rep. 355; Jones on Ev. § 209. There being no evidence to show or tending to show that these telegrams which were claimed to have been sent by Sager were signed by him, and delivered to the telegraph company for transmission, the court committed no error in rejecting them.

For the foregoing reasons we find no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and it must therefore be affirmed.

HARMAN & CROCKETT v. MADDY BROS.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 31, 1905.)

ASSUMPSIT—WHEN LIES SETTLEMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

1. An item omitted, by mistake, accident, or fraud, from a settled account between individuals, growing out of an ordinary business transaction, such as a sale of cattle, may be recovered in an action of assumpsit.

2. If, upon the trial of the issue in such case, the court instruct the jury that they shall regard the settlement as prima facie correct, and that the plaintiff can recover only upon clear and satisfactory proof of the mistake, it is not prejudicial error to refuse to further instruct that the proof, in order to warrant a recovery, must be full.

3. The giving of an instruction which, by reason of its susceptibility of such interpretation as will make it express a proposition at variance with the law applicable to the evidence which forms its subject-matter, is erroneous and prejudicial, although another interpretation of it in harmony with the law is not precluded by its terms.

4. The weight to be accorded to evidence is matter for determination by the jury, and an instruction which wholly or partially withdraws it from their control by limiting or defining it is generally cause for reversal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Monroe County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Action by Harman & Crockett against Maddy Bros. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

John Osborne and Rowan & Boggess, for plaintiffs in error. J. D. Logan and J. A. Meadows, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. Reversal of a judgment for $463.95 in an action of assumpsit is sought here upon the theory that the trial court erred in giving certain instructions, in refusing others, and in overruling a motion to set aside the verdict, first, because of the misconduct of a juror; and, second, because it is against the weight and preponderance of the evidence.

The declaration contains only the common counts, but the object and purpose of the suit, as shown by the evidence, was to open a settled account and recover said sum, as the amount of an item inadvertently omitted in making the settlement. C. C. Harman and E. King Crockett, partners doing business as Harman & Crockett, and residing in Tazewell county, Va., sold to Maddy Bros., of Monroe county, W. Va., in the fall of 1902, 66 head of cattle, 25 of which were known as the J. D. Honaker cattle, weighing 27,060 pounds; 9 as the J. D. Honaker Thorne Place cattle, weighing 10,825 pounds; 9 as the J. B. Shannon cattle, weighing 8,970 pounds; 16 as the W. E. Harry cattle, weighing 16,794 pounds; 6 as the C. C. Harman cattle, weighing 6,505 pounds; and one as the heifer, weighing 820 pounds. On the day of the settlement Maddy Bros. gave to Harman & Crockett, as payment in full for the cattle, one check for $2,400, and another for $452. These were dated October 4, 1902. The settlement was made October 7, 1902, and a receipt was given for the $2,852 "as payment in full for 66 cattle." On the 9th day of October, 1902, Harman wrote that he had discovered that the checks did not cover the price of the heifer. On the next day he wrote Maddy Bros. that he had discovered that the $452 check had not been signed, and saying he had inclosed it for signature. On the 20th day of October, 1902, not having received the check, he made another inquiry about it, and again referred to the omission of the price of the heifer. On the 27th day of October he wrote another letter, containing a statement showing what the cattle amounted to according to the weights and prices, and that, after deducting the one $2,400 check, there remained due $856.10, and asking for a check in payment thereof. Later a sight draft was made on Maddy Bros., and then, on December 2, 1902, they wrote for an explanation, acknowledging the receipt of the letter, calling attention to the want of signature to the $452 check, and requesting its return to them for signature. On December 8th Harman & Crockett replied to this letter, repeating their statement and showing the balance for which the draft had been made. The plaintiffs claim the contract prices of the cattle to have been $4.75 per 100 for the Honaker cattle, $4.50 for all the others, except the heifer, and $3.50 for the heifer. And they claim that the error is the omission of the J. B. Shannon cattle. In support of this, they produce the papers on which they say the calculation of the amount due was made by them. There seems to be no disagreement about the weight of the cattle, but the defendants claim the price of the Honaker cattle to be $4.10 per 100; part of the Harman cattle, $3.95; and part of them, $4.50; the Shannon cattle, $3.95; the W. E. Harry cattle, $3.87; and the helper, $3.50. When the contract was made, on or about September 4, 1902, Harman & Crockett gave to Maddy Bros. a memorandum thereof, and Maddy Bros. gave to Harman & Crockett written evidence of the purchase on their part. These two papers were produced on the day of settlement. Maddy Bros. claim the one they had given was returned to them at the time of the settlement, and then and there destroyed. Harman & Crockett produced as evidence in this case what they assert to have been the memorandum given by them on September 4, 1902, to Maddy Bros.; it being claimed that it was returned to them at the time of the settlement. It specifies the prices contended for by the plaintiffs. The defendants say this paper is a fabrication. On the other hand, Maddy Bros. produce a checkbook which they say contains, on the backs of certain checks and the cover of the book, the calculations made by them at the time of the settlement. This the plaintiffs denounce as a fabrication of evidence on the part of defendants. They say the stub in that checkbook was not written with the same pen and ink that the check was written with, and the check was produced for the purpose of comparison.

After this and other evidence had been introduced, the defendants requested the court to instruct the jury that, if they should find a settlement had been made, checks given in full for the amount found due, and a receipt taken from the plaintiffs for the same, they should regard such settlement as prima facie correct, and hold it to be conclusive, unless the plaintiffs should show by full and clear proof that a mistake had in fact been made. The court struck out the words "full and," and made the concluding phrase say "unless the plaintiffs show by clear proof that a mistake was in fact made." This modification made no substantial alteration in the instruction. Mahnke v. Neale, 23 W. Va. 57, 80, is cited to sustain the assignment of error. That case does not use the word "full." It only says the mistake or fraud shall be clearly shown. Neff v. Wooding, 83 Va. 432, 2 S. E. 731, is also cited. The language of the court there is that the settlement will not be disturbed unless the party furnish clear proof of a mutual mistake or a fraud. Neither word has any technical meaning or force, and if the instruction, by the use of the words "clear proof," sufficiently directed the minds of the jury to the requirement that there must be substantial and preponderating evidence of the mistake, such as to satisfy them of its existence, nothing more was required. In an instruction given at the instance of the plaintiffs, the court said the testimony must be clear and satisfactory proof, to warrant a recovery. The common-sense import of this is that the evidence must satisfy the minds of the jurors—convince them—of the existence of the mistake. If the addition of anything to the word "clear" was necessary, it has been supplied in this last instruction. The legal effect of a mere statement of an account is to dispense with proof of the items of which it is composed, make the result prima facie correct, and cast upon the party denying its correctness the burden of proving a mistake or fraud, as ground for reopening it. Lockwood v. Thorne, 18 N. Y. 285; Wharton v. Anderson, 28 Minn. 301, 9 N. W. 860. To open a settled account, a higher degree of proof is necessary than in the case of a stated account, but the rule requires only clear and convincing evidence. In Chubbuck v. Vernam, 42 N. Y. 432, it is stated as follows: "A party who seeks to open a settlement of accounts on the ground of mistake assumes the burden of proving distinctly wherein the mistake consisted, and of furnishing the data by which it may be corrected." The common law does not recognize the Roman civil law division of proof into two classes, plena probatio and semiplena probatio. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 119, vol. 3, § 409. If it did, the proof in this case is not within the rule.

Instruction No. 1 given at the instance of the plaintiffs reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that when an accusation is made by one party against another of the existence of a certain fact, and the party called upon for a reply, and, he failing to reply, when men similarly situated under like circumstances should do so, the fact of not so doing is considered by the law as an admission of the correctness of the accusation or existence of the fact." Of this the plaintiffs in error complain bitterly. They say it virtually tells the jury that the silence of Maddy Bros., after their attention had been called to the error, and pay for the alleged omitted item had been demanded, for a period of more than two months, amounts to a conclusive admission of their liability. In other words, they say the court, by giving said instruction, rather pressed upon the jury, as a presumption of law, the view that this conduct on the part of defendants is sufficient proof, without regard to any other circumstance, to warrant a verdict against them. On the other hand, for the defendants in error the instruction is regarded as only intended to fix in the minds of the jury that the circumstance of silence is an evidential fact for their consideration. Such is undoubtedly the character of that fact. It does not rise to the dignity of an estoppel, and cannot be regarded as conclusive evidence of liability on the theory of a mistake. In support of the instruction, section 197, Greenl. Ev., is cited. This only says that admissions may be implied by acquiescence, and instances a number of examples of it by way of probative force of such admissions. Consideration of that is postponed to section 212 of the same volume, where they are classed as nonjudicial admissions, and shown not to be conclusive. Among these are classed accounts rendered, and of them it is said they are not conclusive, but are left at large, "to be weighed with other evidence by the jury." This instruction tells the jury that silence under circumstances calling for a response is considered by the law as an admission of the existence of a fact. Admissions other than judicial admissions and admissions by deed are seldom, if ever, conclusive, unless they have been acted upon by the opposite party to his prejudice, so that they must be made conclusive upon the party making them, to the end that injustice and injury may not result to the party who has acted upon them. "Verbal admissions which have not been acted upon, and which a party may controvert without any breach of good faith or evasion of public justice, though admissible in evidence, are not held conclusive against him." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 209. After giving some illustrations, the author further says in this section: "In these and the like cases no wrong is done to the other party by receiving any legal evidence showing that the admission was erroneous, and leaving the whole evidence, including the admission, to be weighed by the jury." Such being the character of the admission, the inquiry is as to what the instruction means, what effect it may have had upon the jury, and whether it was improper. As the court had admitted the evidence, there was no reason for suggesting to the jury its admissibility. Nor is it easy to conceive any reason for explaining that it was in the nature of an admission. Its nature as such is readily perceived without the aid of legal knowledge. Hence the jury probably assumed that there was some purpose in giving it. It was well calculated to impress upon their minds that, under some legal principle known to the court and unknown to them, it was evidence of a higher nature than other evidence in the case. The language is susceptible of a double meaning. It tells the jury that, tested by the law, the act is an admission. What sort of an admission—a conclusive admission or only a persuasive admission? How is the court to determine what construction the jury gave it? Strictly speaking, the law does not class it as an admission. The law says it is evidence, because reason and common sense teach that it is an admission. Therefore it is admissible as evidence for the consideration of the jury. As the instruction is susceptible of two meanings, and the jury might, and probably did, give it a wrong interpretation, it is such an instruction as was calculated to mislead and confuse them. The giving of such an instruction is erroneous. Railroad Co. v. Lafferty, 2 W. Va. 104; Bantz v. Basnett, 12 W. Va. 772. "Where an instruction asked for is so imperfectly expressed that its true import is not readily discernible, and would tend to mislead the jury, it should be refused." Patton v. Navigation Co., 13 W. Va. 259. "It is error to give an instruction which is confused in its language and calculated to mislead the jury." State v. Sutfin, 22 W. Va. 771; State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679; Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 251. Aside from the view that the jury may have regarded the instruction as virtually binding upon them to find for the plaintiffs, the instruction may be regarded as one upon the weight of the evidence. That is clearly a matter within the exclusive province of the jury, and with which the court cannot deal without doing violence to the principles of law governing jury trials. It is almost universally held that an instruction upon the weight of the evidence is erroneous. Earp v. Edgington (Tenn. Sup.) 64 S. W. 40; Baker v. Kelly, 41 Miss. 696, 93 Am. Dec. 274; Westbrook v. Howell, 34 Ill. App. 571; Ephland v. Railroad Co., 57 Mo. App. 147; Blashf. Instr. § 236.

A portion of the brief for plaintiffs in error is devoted to the contention that a settled account cannot be reopened for fraud or mistake in a court of law. The objection seems not to have been brought to the attention of the trial court, but it is said that, as it relates to the jurisdiction of the court, it may be made in the appellate court for the first time. Whether it is made in time need not be considered, for the reason that it is not tenable, even if properly made. Jurisdiction of such a case by an action of assumpsit was entertained in Bank v. Als, 5 W. Va. 50. To the same effect, see Goodwin v. Life Ins. Co., 24 Conn. 591; Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 157 Mass. 258, 31 N. E. 1067. Settled accounts are most usually impeached in equity, not because there is no jurisdiction at law, but because the equity forum is generally preferred on account of its better facilities for careful investigation of complicated accounts. The jurisdiction is concurrent, but it is only in cases of complicated accounts that equity will take jurisdiction for the purpose of settling an account. When an account has been settled, and there is an effort to reopen it, equity has concurrent jurisdiction with the law courts on the ground of mistake or fraud, because mistake and fraud are recognized heads of equity jurisdiction, but the jurisdiction in equity is not exclusive in such cases. It is concurrent. Newberger v. Wells, 51 W. Va. 624, 42 S. E. 625; Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. 1028.

The printed record fails to disclose the entry of any plea of any kind in the case, but it does say that a jury was impaneled to try the issues joined. Omitted portions of the record may show pleadings subsequent to the declaration, but, as there may be none, it is deemed proper to mention the matter, since failure to make up an issue has been held error in numerous cases in which parties went to trial without an issue having been made. Stevens v. Friedman, 53 W. Va. 79, 44 S. E. 163; Ruffner v. Hill, 21 W. Va. 152; State v. Douglass, 20 W. Va. 770; State v. Conkle, 16 W. Va. 736.

In view of the error in giving instruction No. 1 for the plaintiffs, for which the judgment must be reversed and a new trial granted, it is unnecessary to pass upon the ruling of the court on the motion to set aside the verdict for either of the causes assigned. Comment on the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain it would be manifestly improper. The rules and principles under which relief may be given on account of misconduct on the part of jurors are well settled. Hence the only inquiry here would be whether the facts in this case would, under those rules, necessitate the setting aside of the verdict. A decision of this question would be of no value as a precedent, and all the relief a decision favorable to the plaintiffs in error would result in is awarded them upon another ground.

The judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

FULTON v. CROSBY & BECKLEY CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 7, 1905.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—DUTY OF MASTER—NEW TRIAL.

1. A lumber railroad, crudely and unscientifically constructed, the character of which is fully known to a servant who is engaged in operating a locomotive engine upon it, has, in the contemplation of the parties, and therefore of the law, certain elements and qualities upon which the servant may rely for his personal safety, and which the master, by the exercise of reasonable care, must maintain.

2. The measure of the duty of a master to his servant is reasonable care, in view of the situation of the parties, the relations they have established, the nature of the business in which the servant is employed, the character of the machinery and appliances used, the surrounding circumstances and conditions, and the exigencies which require vigilance and attention.

3. A new trial will not be allowed in a case in which only simple issues of fact were raised, dependent upon conflicting oral evidence, thus making the credibility of witnesses an important factor in the case, merely because the verdict is contrary to an excess in the quantum of such evidence, there being direct and positive evidence tending to sustain it, and no controlling physical, admitted, or established facts with which it is inconsistent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County; Joseph M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by Fred H. Fulton, by his next friend, against the Crosby & Beckley Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Rucker, Anderson & Hughes and Wyndham Stokes, for plaintiff in error. T. L. Henritze and E. O. Marshall, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. Relying upon the action of the court in overruling a motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, and in refusing to set aside the verdict on the ground that it is contrary to the law and the evidence, as grounds of error, the Crosby & Beckley Company complain of a judgment of the circuit court of McDowell county, in favor of Fred H. Fulton against it for the sum of $1,500.

The action was for the recovery of damages for personal injuries sustained in consequence of the wreck of a wooden bridge or trestle in a logging railroad, on which, as an employé of the defendant, the plaintiff was running on a locomotive engine as fireman. The bridge was something over 20 feet long, and consisted of pens built of logs, with log stringers, supporting the ties and rails, resting on the pens. It had been in use for more than three years, in which time no previous accident had occurred.

Evidence was introduced to show defects in the bridge in two respects: First, that the stringers, reaching from pen to pen, and supporting the ties and rails, and to which the ties had been spiked, were defective in this: that the sap of the logs through which the spikes had been driven had become so rotten as to release the spikes; and, second, that the ties had not been sufficiently nailed to the stringers. That the ties had become detached from the stringers at the time of the wreck of the engine seems to be undisputed. They slipped off of the stringers, threw the engine off the bridge, and then remained fastened together by the rails, and swung loose on the stringers.

The witnesses substantially agree in saying that the stringers were sap-rotten, and that the rotten wood was from one-half inch to an inch and a half in thickness. They differ, however, on the question whether, when the bridge was originally constructed, the sap on the top of the stringers, at the points at which the ties rested on them, had been hewn off. The plaintiff himself, as a witness, says nothing on the subject. A. L. Denham, the second witness, is silent as to whether the stringers were surfaced for the ties. W. L. Akers, the third witness, says the spikes had pulled out on account of the stringers being rotten. Whether any part of the sap had been taken off, he does not say. The next witness for the plaintiff, Andrew Javens, said the sap was taken off. Plaintiff's next witness, Melvin Camper, thought the stringers had not been surfaced, but was not positive as to that. All of these witnesses, except the plaintiff, had inspected the ties and stringers.

The defendant introduced, first, Lee McChesney, its general manager, who said the stringers had been surfaced off, and, in so doing, "the bigger part of the sap had been taken off," but that the amount of sap left on the stringers was not enough to render them defective. R. K. Lowery, who was next introduced, testified that the stringers had been cut down to the depth of an inch or an inch and a half to the solid wood. The evidence for the defendant further shows that the same stringers were put back into the bridge when it was repaired, with the exception of one, which had either been broken or was too short, and that no additional surfacing had been done on them. And as to this there is no contradiction in the evidence, except that some of the witnesses for the plaintiff say they think two new stringers were put in instead of one.

As to the nailing of the ties, Denham said they had not been properly nailed, as he had seen some which bore no evidence of having been nailed, but could not say whether they had been in the bridge or had been brought to the scene of the wreck for the construction of a temporary track for use in putting the engine back on the track. Witness Akers said he had gone on the grounds before any repair work had been done, and had seen but few spikes, and that not more than one-fourth of the ties had been nailed. Mr. Javens, witness for plaintiff, said all the ties had been well nailed down at each end, with one spike through the center, and one on each side "toe-nailed." Camper was positive that only part of the ties had been spiked down, and that it was customary to put only one spike in each end.

The three witnesses for the defendant, McChesney, Lowery, and Fitzgerald, all testified that all the ties had been well nailed down, and constantly inspected, and renailed from time to time. Fitzgerald said that, on either Saturday or Monday preceding the Tuesday on which the bridge broke, he had gone over it and nailed all the ties down, because he thought some of the spikes might have broken in two.

Any error there may have been in overruling the motion to exclude the evidence for the plaintiff was waived by the introduction of evidence for the defense. Core v. Railroad Co., 38 W. Va. 456, 18 S. E. 596; Trump v. Coal Co., 46 W. Va. 238, 32 S. E. 1035.

The case is clearly ruled by the principles governing the relation of master and servant, not by those applicable to common carriers. The plaintiff was an employé, and in the line of duty at the time of the injury. As such, he must be held to have assumed all the ordinary risks which were incident to the dangerous employment in which he was engaged. Reese v. Ry. Co., 42 W. Va. 333, 26 S. E. 204; Oliver v. R. R. Co., 42 W. Va. 703, 26 S. E. 444; Seldomridge v. Railway Co., 46 W. Va. 569, 33 S. E. 293; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285, 55 Am. Rep. 304; Humphreys v. Newport, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135, 10 S. E. 39. If the negligence of the master was known to him, he is deemed to have assumed the risk of injury resulting from it also. Sanderson v. Panther Lumber Co., 50 W. Va. 42, 40 S. E. 368, 55 L. R. A. 908, 88 Am. St. Rep. 841; Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 285, 55 Am. Rep. 304. An employer does not guaranty the safety of his employé. Stewart v. Ry. Co., 40 W. Va. 188, 20 S. E. 922; Reese v. Ry. Co., 42 W. Va. 333, 26 S.

Nevertheless, the master owes certain duties to his servant. He must provide safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business in which his servant is employed, keep the same in repair, and make proper inspections and tests as to their safety and suitability. He must exercise reasonable care in providing and retaining sufficient and suitable servants for the business. He must establish proper rules and regulations for the service, and conform to them. He must also provide for the safety of the place in which the servant is to work. Jackson v. R. R. Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337; Madden v. R. R. Co., 28 W. Va. 617, 57 Am. Rep. 695. These duties are absolute and nonassignable, and for injury resulting from a breach thereof the employer must answer, though the fault be that of his vice principal to whom the performance thereof had been delegated, unless the servant himself, before the injury, had knowledge of the breach of duty on the part of the master, or has by his own negligence contributed to the injury. Jackson v. R. R. Co., cited.

As the employé assumes the risk of all known dangers, though attributable to failure of legal duty in the abstract on the part of the employer, the question of negligence in any given case depends upon the relation which the master and servant, by their conduct and agreement, have established between themselves with reference to the business in which the servant is employed. This waiver on the part of the servant releases the master from much of the burden which the law, but for it, would impose. Of this the case in hand affords a good illustration. The railroad, though running over a mountain, crossing ravines, winding around the sides of declivities, and, in general, located on ground such as, in the case of an ordinary railroad, would require the use of the best materials, most modern and improved appliances, and best construction, conforming in all respects to those rules and principles which experience has shown to be essential to safety in operation, is a crude affair, lacking in such materials, appliances, and construction. All this was necessarily known to the plaintiff, and he assumed the risk of all danger of injury incident to his employment on that road. But the engine and cars were no doubt light, run at a low rate of speed, and not heavily burdened, in view of which the track and roadbed were deemed sufficient and reasonably safe by both employer and employé, notwithstanding the use of inferior materials and crude construction. However, the employer is by no means relieved of all duty to the servant under such conditions. He is still bound to the exercise of care for the safety of the servant, and the measure of his duty is reasonable care, in view of the situation of the parties, the nature of the business, character of the machinery and appliances used, all the surrounding circumstances and conditions, and the exigencies which require vigilance and attention. Oliver v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 703, 26 S. E. 444; Hough v. Railway Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612; Labatt, Mas. & Serv. § 16. Though a lumber railroad, with its wooden rails and other elements of primitive and obsolete construction, is crude and dangerous, as compared with roads scientifically constructed, it has, in the contemplation of the parties concerned, and therefore of the law, certain characteristics and qualities upon which the servant may rely, and which he is not deemed to have waived, and which the master must have given the structure in its erection and is under a duty to maintain. This duty of maintenance necessarily implies that of supervision, inspection, and repairing.

These principles, so far as the record discloses, were applied. As the evidence introduced by the plaintiff was adduced for the purpose of showing a dangerous condition of the stringers, due to age and decay, and defective nailing of the cross-ties, it clearly falls within the limits of the rules stated. As to these matters, the employer was undoubtedly bound to the exercise of reasonable care for the safety of the employes operating the train, and as to both issues of fact there is conflict in the evidence. Some witnesses say the ties were all sufficiently nailed to the stringers, and others that they were not. All agree that the stringers were sap-rotten to such an extent as to weaken the connection between the ties and stringers, provided the sap had not been hewn off under the ties. As to whether it had been hewn off, however, they are not agreed. On each of the two issues of fact, a determination of which, adverse to the defendant, would sustain the verdict, there is evidence tending to support the contentions of both parties. In dealing with this evidence, the jury, judged by the verdict, have not ignored any legal principles governing the evidence, unless it be the rule of preponderance, which will be noticed later on, nor any admitted or clearly established material facts inconsistent with the verdict, or the finding as to facts, directly dependent upon the conflicting evidence. The rule on this subject is most clearly and accurately stated in 3 Cyc. 352, as follows: "A verdict will not be set aside unless overwhelmingly against the weight of the evidence, or so palpably unsupported by sufficient evidence as to clearly indicate that it is wrong, though, in such contingency—as where all the reasonable probabilities and overwhelming weight of the evidence are against a verdict, or the testimony on one side is consistent and in harmony with known facts, and that on the other is inconsistent with itself and with such known facts, or where the verdict is against admissions, or where the preponderance is such as to indicate a mistake, or that the verdict was rendered under a misapprehension of the legal effect of the evidence, or material facts are mistakenly disregarded—the verdict will be set aside. And, where the verdict is manifestly against the evidence, the judgment will be reversed, notwithstanding the trial court had refused to set aside the verdict. But, on the other hand, the verdict must be so clearly wrong, and so manifestly against the weight of the evidence, as to amount to a verdict upon failure of proof, or to raise a necessary inference that it was the result of passion or prejudice, and not of an intelligent or honest exercise by the jury of its proper and lawful functions. In such emergency, however, the verdict will be set aside." Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 638, 20 S. E. 686, and Davidson v. P., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 41 W. Va. 407, 23 S. E. 593. do not go beyond the limits of this rule. In the former, the evidence showed certain physical facts and well-known customs and usages which the parties clearly understood, in view of which the contract was made, and which were actually and necessarily comprehended in the manifest objects and purposes of the parties to the contract, so that failure of the jury to recognize them and harmonize the other evidence with them had resulted in a verdict palpably wrong and against the overwhelming weight of the evidence viewed as a whole. The other case is of much the same character, admitted circumstances and incontrovertible physical facts governing and controlling the weight and force of all the other evidence and facts, and irresistibly leading to a conclusion different from that embodied in the verdict, having been ignored by the jury. Hence those cases are clearly within the general proposition above quoted. They do not apply here, because the conditions calling for their application are not found in this case.

The evidence for the defendant may, and probably does, preponderate, in the sense that the evidence for the plaintiff is not entirely consistent, one witness having testified that all the cross-ties had been properly nailed down and all the sap removed from such parts of all the stringers as were directly under the cross-ties, so that the sap-rottenness could not have caused the injury; while the testimony of all the witnesses for the defendant agrees that the ties had been nailed and the sap so removed from the stringers. But the credibility of the witnesses is a large factor to be dealt with in determining these questions, and, as practically all of them were employes of the defendant at the time of the trial, this circumstance was an element bearing on the question of credibility. "Where some evidence has been given which tends to prove the fact in issue, or the evidence consists of circumstances and presumptions, a new trial will not be granted merely because the court is of opinion that the preponderance of evidence required a different verdict." Black v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 709, 713; Sheff v. City of Huntington, 16 W. Va. 807; Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. 712. This is the rule for the guidance of the trial court. In the appellate court the verdict must be viewed as having been strengthened by the approval of the judge who tried the case, heard the evidence detailed, and observed the personal appearances and demeanor of the witnesses. Black v. Thomas, cited; Brugh v. Shanks, 5 Leigh, 598. In view of these rules, the extent to which the credibility of the witnesses enters into the verdict, and the simplicity of the issues presented, it is clear that mere excess in the quantum of the evidence adduced by the defendant does not justify the granting of a new trial by this court.

No error in the judgment being perceived, it will be affirmed.

STATE v. MOORE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 14, 1905.)

CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—PRESENCE OF ACCUSED—SWEARING JURY.

1. Where a person is convicted of a felony, it must affirmatively appear from the record that the prisoner was present in court, and entered his plea in person to the indictment against him; and it is reversible error if the record fails to show this.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1466; vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 2766.]

2. There can be no legal conviction of a person for a felony unless the record shows that the jury which tried the case were duly sworn according to law.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Lewis County; W. G. Bennett, Judge.

Oley Moore and others were convicted of murder, and bring error. Reversed.

E. A. Brannon, E. H. Morton, W. T. Talbott, and W. B. McGary, for plaintiffs in error. Romeo H. Freer, Atty. Gen., E. K. Reedy, and J. M. Hoover, for defendant in error.

SANDERS, J. This is a writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court of Lewis county, sentencing the defendants to the penitentiary of this state. The prisoners were indicted for the murder of Benjamin H. Edgar, and on the 29th day of May, 1904, were jointly tried, and Oley Moore and Hanson Moore were found guilty of murder in the first degree, with recommendation that they be punished by confinement in the penitentiary. Robert Moore was found guilty of murder in the second degree. The defendants moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury and to grant them a new trial, which motion was overruled, and the defendants were sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary of this state.

The defendants make several assignments of error, one of which is that the plea of not guilty was entered by their attorneys, and not by them in person. The order making up the issue in the case shows: "This day came the state by the prosecuting attorney, and the defendants in their proper persons and by attorneys, and the defendants, by attorneys, demurred to said indictment, and the said demurrer, being considered by the court, is overruled, and the defendants, by their attorneys, for plea, says that they are not guilty in manner," etc. Before a person can be legally convicted of a felony, it is necessary that he be present in court, and plead to the indictment against him in person, and the record must affirmatively show this; and where the record shows that the plea was entered by attorney, and not by the prisoner in person, it is error, for which this court will reverse the judgment. The record in this case clearly shows that the plea was entered by the attorneys for the defendants. But it is argued by the attorneys for the state that inasmuch as the prisoners were present in court at the time their pleas were entered, and all that was done was done by their attorneys in their presence, this satisfies the law which requires that their pleas shall be entered by them in person, and that while it is, literally speaking, a plea by their attorneys, yet, within the spirit and true meaning of the law, it should be regarded as being done by them in person, because what was done by their attorneys in their presence and at their direction is, in law, the doing of that particular act in person. This argument is not without reason, and comes with considerable force, but is made in the face of numerous decisions of this state and Virginia holding that the record must show the presence of the prisoner, and that he pleaded in person. This question has been before the court so often, and has been so clearly decided, and the rule so firmly settled, that it is a waste of time to discuss it further. Sperry v. Commonwealth, 9 Leigh, 623, 33 Am. Dec. 261; Younger's Case, 2 W. Va. 579, 98 Am. Dec. 791; State v. Conkle, 16 W. Va. 736; State v. Sutphin, 22 W. Va. 771; State v. Allen, 45 W. Va. 65, 30 S. E. 209; 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 792; 12 Cyc. 373.

It is also assigned as error that the record fails to show that the jury which tried the defendants were sworn. Upon an examination, we find in the order impaneling the jury, and after giving their names, this language: "Who were elected according to law to well and truly try and true deliverance make between the state of West Virginia," etc. The order shows an attempt to swear the jury, and in all probability they were properly sworn, but, through the inadvertence of the clerk, the record fails to so show. The absolutely essential word, "sworn," was omitted, and the omission of which is, of course, fatal to the verdict. We must take the proceedings of the trial as they appear on the face of the record, and be guided absolutely thereby; and, if it discloses error, we must reverse the judgment. It is hardly necessary to cite authorities to show that a person cannot be legally convicted unless the record shows that the jury which tried the case were sworn according to law. It is not necessary that the oath should be copied into the order, but the record must affirmatively show somewhere and in some way that the jury were sworn in the manner prescribed by law, before there can be a legal conviction. It will not suffice to say that the jury were "elected" according to law. It must show that the jury were sworn according to law. Code 1899, c. 159, § 6; 12 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 515, 521; Younger's Case, 2 W. Va. 579, 98 Am. Dec. 791; Lawrence v. Commonwealth, 30 Grat. 845; State v. Ice, 34 W. Va. 244, 12 S. E. 695; State v. Kellison, 55 W. Va. —, 47 S. E. 166; 12 Cyc. 712.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the circuit court sentencing the prisoners to the penitentiary is reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and a new trial awarded to each of the defendants.

BRANNON, P. I concur, but I am not clear that the plea is to be regarded as made by the attorney. When arraignment was a necessary part of trial, the prisoner was asked for his answer to the indictment after its reading, and he must make plea with his own lips; but, the arraignment having been abolished by the Code, I do not see why a plea in his presence, though by the mouth of his attorney, is not his plea. The Code puts the plea in for him, though he utter not a word. But the want of the oath to the jury inevitably calls for a new trial.

RISHER v. WHEELING ROOFING & CORNICE CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 14, 1905.)

ACTION—DISCONTINUANCE—DOCKETING—CONTINUANCE—ABATEMENT—ANOTHER ACTION PENDING—PLEA.

1. In an action of assumpsit plaintiff filed his declaration at October rules, 1903, and the common order was entered thereon by the clerk. At November rules following, the defendant filed a plea of payment, answering part of the plaintiff's claim, and by an addition to the plea acknowledged itself indebted for the residue of the plaintiff's claim, and offered to confess judgment therefor; and the clerk made an entry of a plea of the general issue by the defendant, and of the common order confirmed, which entry at the ensuing term was stricken out by the court, and the plaintiff did not appear at rules after the filing of the plea of payment, and either demur or reply thereto, or "sign judgment" by entering a nolle prosequi for the part of the plaintiff's claim not answered by the plea of payment. Held, these proceedings at rules did not operate as a discontinuance of the action, and the clerk properly placed the case on the docket for the ensuing term of court.

2. Under the circumstances of this case the defendant was not entitled to a continuance as a matter of right at the ensuing term of court.

3. The pendency of a suit in equity is not ground of defense to an action at law for the same cause of action, pending at the same time, either under the general issue or plea in abatement.

4. In an action at law a plea in abatement of a former suit pending, which does not aver whether such former suit is pending at law or in equity, is bad for uncertainty.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County; Thayer Melvin, Judge.

Action by H. A. Risher against the Wheeling Roofing & Cornice Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Handlan & Reyman and Hubbard & Hubbard, for plaintiff in error. Caldwell & Caldwell, for defendant in error.

COX, J. On the 16th day of September, 1903, H. A. Risher instituted an action of assumpsit against the Wheeling Roofing & Cornice Company in the circuit court of Ohio county, and filed his declaration and bill of particulars therein at October rules, 1903, and the clerk entered the common order. At November rules the defendant appeared, and filed a plea of payment, concluding to the country, as to the sum of $776.93 part of the sums in the declaration mentioned, and by an addition to the plea acknowledged itself indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $10, the residue of plaintiff's claim as shown by his bill of particulars, and confessed or offered to confess judgment therefor, and the clerk made the following entries on the rule docket: "Common order confirmed, and writ of inquiry, plea of payment, and general issue filed by the defendant. Plea of payment and confession of judgment." Without any other proceedings at rules, the action was placed on the docket for the November term of the circuit court, which began on the 16th of November, 1903. On the first day of the term the defendant moved the court to remand the action to rules, and the arguments on the motion were set down for November 19, 1903. On the 19th of December, 1903, an order was entered whereby it appears substantially as follows: The defendant having at a former day of the term moved the court to strike this action from the docket and remand it to rules on the ground that it was improperly on the docket, the plaintiff, having at the same time moved the court to strike from the file the plea in writing filed by the defendant at November rules on the ground that it was a sham plea, tendered with the motion two affidavits. The evidence of the deputy clerk was heard. The defendant tendered an affidavit in opposition to the plaintiff's motion. The questions arising upon such motions were heard together. Objections were made to the filing of the affidavits. The court rejected the affidavits, and overruled the motion of the plaintiff and the motion of the defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff moved that the case be set for trial upon a given day of that term. The defendant moved for a continuance to the next term. Both motions were continued until the 26th of December. By an order entered on the 2d day of January, 1904, it appears substantially as follows: The defendant assigned as grounds for its motion to continue that the plea of the general issue as well as the confirmation of the common order had been inadvertently and improperly entered at rules by the clerk, and filed an affidavit in support of the motion. Upon consideration of such motion the plea of the general issue and the confirmation of the common order were stricken out by the court. After such correction the court held that the action was properly on the docket, and overruled the motion to continue. Thereupon the defendant offered to file its second special plea in writing, averring the pendency of a former suit, to which the plaintiff objected, and the defendant asked time to file affidavits in support of the plea, and time was granted until January 4th to file such affidavits. By an order entered on the 23d day of January it appears substantially as follows: The defendant having at a former day of the term offered to file an affidavit in writing with exhibits in support of its second plea in writing then tendered, the plaintiff objected to the filing of the plea and affidavit, and moved to reject the same, which motion the court sustained, and rejected the plea and affidavit. Thereupon the defendant moved the court for leave to file its third plea in writing, tendering with the motion the third plea, averring the pendency of a former suit, and moved the court to consider in support of the third plea the same affidavit and exhibits tendered in support of its second plea. The plaintiff objected to the filing of the third plea, and moved to reject it. Upon consideration by the court the third plea and affidavit with exhibits were rejected. The plaintiff joined issue on the plea of payment and on his motion the action was set for trial for February 1st. By an order entered on the 3d day of February it appears substantially as follows: The defendant waived a jury, and, the plaintiff desiring none, the action was put upon trial to the court, and the court, having heard the plaintiff's evidence and the defendant having offered no evidence, entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $786.93, the full amount of plaintiff's claim as shown by the bill of particulars. The defendant moved the court to set aside the judgment and award it a new trial, which was overruled, and defendant excepted, and was granted leave to file its bill of exceptions in vacation. The bill of exceptions, which included the evidence, was afterwards signed, and made part of the record. The several rulings of the court were excepted to by the opposite party. The case comes here by writ of error and supersedeas allowed the defendant.

The defenses in this action are said to be technical. They may be technical, but are important, and, if legal, are binding on the court. In order that the proceedings may appear in their proper sequence, the detailed statement above is given. The principal questions arising upon the record are: First. Did the proceedings at rules or in court operate as a discontinuance of the action? Second. Should the defendant have been granted a continuance as a matter of right? Third. Should the court have admitted the second and third pleas of a former suit pending? These are not the only questions arising, but, in our judgment, are the most material. In determining the question as to a discontinuance, we must consider what was the legal effect of the addition to the plea of payment, acknowledging indebtedness and confessing or offering to confess judgment for that part of the plaintiff's claim not answered by the plea. We think this addition to the plea cannot be treated as more than an offer to confess judgment for that part not answered by the plea, and an acknowledgment of the plaintiff's claim to that extent. We do not consider it a confession of judgment under the statute (Code 1899, c. 125, § 43), because such confession must be assented to by the plaintiff. The sum must be such as the plaintiff is willing to accept. We think the addition to the plea must, for the purpose of a discontinuance, be treated in the same manner as a failure to plead to the part of plaintiff's claim not answered by the plea of payment. In support of the view that there was a technical discontinuance, the defendant invokes a rule of pleading to the effect that, where a defendant files a proper plea, which is an answer to a part of the plaintiff's declaration, and does not in that or any other plea notice the remainder of the declaration, the plaintiff must take judgment for the part unanswered as by nisi dict. If he demurs or plead over without taking such judgment, the whole action is discontinued; for in such case the plaintiff, by omitting to enforce such claim in respect of the unanswered portion of his claim by taking judgment, or to re-sign it by entering a nolle prosequi thereto, causes a chasm or hiatus in the proceedings. 1 Chitty on Pldg. p. 549 (16th Am. Ed.). This rule is stated in the same or different language by different courts and text-writers; but the substance of it is that, if a plaintiff demurs or replies over to a proper plea answering a part only of the plaintiff's cause of action, without "signing judgment," an hiatus and consequent discontinuance takes place. The reason given is that the plaintiff thus fails to prosecute or follow up his action. This rule has not been looked upon with much favor by some authorities, especially in modern practice (Enc. Pldg. & Prac. vol. 6, p. 924-926); but we are inclined to consider the rule as still existing (4 Minor, Inst. 784; St. Pldg. 216 [Tyler's Ed.]; Hunt v. Martin, 8 Grat. 578; Southall v. Exchange Bank, 12 Grat. 812). Under the rule, was there a discontinuance of this action at rules? There was an entry by the clerk at rules of the general issue by defendant, which was at the ensuing term stricken out by the court as unauthorized. The general issue goes to the whole of plaintiff's claim, and, although entered without authority, could only be stricken out by the court in term. The plaintiff did not appear at rules after the plea of payment was filed and demur or reply to the plea, or "sign judgment" for the part of his claim not answered by the plea. He did nothing until the ensuing term. These facts, we think, prevented a discontinuance. Under the circumstances here presented the plaintiff cannot be said to have failed to prosecute or follow up his action, and thus to have caused a chasm or hiatus in the proceedings until he demurred or replied over without signing or taking judgment for the part of his claim unanswered by the plea. We are clearly of the opinion that there was not a discontinuance of this action at rules, and that the clerk properly placed it on the docket for the ensuing term. When the case came before the court, the court, having complete control over the proceedings in the office of the clerk during the previous vacation, made an order striking out the entry of the common order confirmed, and of the plea of the general issue by the defendant. At that term the general issue was joined by the plaintiff, and the case was tried by the court in lieu of a jury, and judgment rendered for the whole amount of plaintiff's claim, including the part unanswered by the plea of payment. In determining whether or not a discontinuance of the action occurred in court, we must consider the term as an entirety. All the proceedings therein were subject to the control of the court until the term adjourned. The action being properly in court, all the proceedings at that term must be considered together upon the question as to a discontinuance. The term "session," when applied to courts, means the whole term; and in legal construction the whole term is construed as but one day. Dunn's Ex'rs v. Renick, 40 W. Va. 349, 22 S. E. 66; Dew v. Judges (Va.) 3 Hen. & M. 27, 3 Am. Dec. 639. If the plaintiff at that term "signed judgment," or, which is to the same effect, took judgment for that part of his claim not answered by the plea of payment, it was sufficient to prevent a discontinuance. The plaintiff did take judgment at that term for the part of his claim not answered by the plea of payment; not separately, it is true, but it was included in the judgment upon the trial of the action, and prevented a discontinuance.

There being no discontinuance either at rules or in court, was the defendant, as a matter of right, entitled to a continuance under the circumstances of this case? We are cited to the case of Southall v. Exchange Bank, supra, as sustaining the right of the defendant to a continuance. Defendant claims that because of the entry by the clerk of the plea of the general issue and of the common order confirmed as to the whole of the plaintiff's claim, which entry was afterwards stricken out by the court, he was entitled as a matter of right to a continuance on the ground that the plaintiff only placed himself rectus in curia at that term. The practice formerly was different from what it is in this state as to the plea of payment. The plea of payment was not formerly an issuable plea. It concluded with a verification, and not to the country. It is now an issuable plea, and concludes to the country. Douglass v. Central Land Co., 12 W. Va. 502; Kinsley v. County Court, 31 W. Va. 464, 7 S. E. 445. A proper plea of payment in this state presents an issue which the plaintiff must accept. Upon it a similiter may be added by the plaintiff, or, if he does not do so, he may proceed to trial as if there were a similiter. Code 1899, § 25, c. 125. The rule as to a continuance as a matter of right upon a plea of payment is thus changed in our practice. We do not understand it to be the law that a party filing an issuable plea at rules may have a continuance as a matter of right solely on the ground that the plaintiff or the law has added a similiter, in term. When the plea of payment concluded with a verification, it was different in this: that the replication did not make the issue; and, if the replication be filed properly for the first time in term it might reasonably be said to operate to give the defendant a continuance as a matter of right, if demanded. In the Southall Case the plaintiff had filed a replication to the plea at rules, which was afterwards in term withdrawn, and refiled in term. In the case at bar it was the entry of the defendant's plea of the general issue, and not the plaintiff's replication, which was stricken out by the court. The entry of the common order confirmed at rules by the clerk as to the whole of the plaintiff's claim, which entry was afterwards stricken out by the court, was erroneous only as to the part of the plaintiff's claim answered by the plea of payment. After filing the issuable plea of payment at rules, with the addition before mentioned, no further attendance at rules was necessary on the part of the defendant. The striking out of the entry of the common order confirmed by the court could not operate as a surprise to the defendant, and, as was said in the opinion in the Southall Case, no injustice could be done by this to the defendant, as it only placed the case where it would have been but for the irregularity which occurred at rules. We think that under the circumstances of the case at bar the defendant was not entitled, as a matter of light, to a continuance at that term of court.

We will now consider the question as to the admission of the two pleas in abatement. These pleas tendered by the defendant are designated in the record as the second and third pleas of the defendant. Each averred a former suit pending by the defendant and others against the plaintiff and others upon and directly involving the very same promises in the declaration in this case mentioned. The third plea differs from the second only in this: that it also averred a reason for not filing the plea before pleading in bar. In support of these pleas the defendant tendered an affidavit. Neither of the pleas averred whether the former suit was pending at law or in equity. Without considering the question as to the time of the filing of the pleas, or as to the filing of an affidavit in support of them, were they sufficient if they had been filed in time? If the former suit was in equity, its pendency could not be pleaded in abatement of the action at law. Since the jurisdiction of equity is limited to cases in which the law does not afford a complete and adequate remedy, it has been held by cases both at law and in equity that two causes, one at law and one in equity, are ex necessitate so dissimilar that the pendency of one cannot be pleaded in abatement of the other. Cyc. of Law & Proc. vol. 1, p. 40; and cases cited in note. In Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Grat. 475, it was held that, where a suit in equity and an action at law, for the same cause of action, are pending at the same time, it is not ground of defense at law either under the general issue or plea in abatement. We hold this to be the law in this state. Applying the law to the two pleas in abatement mentioned, they are fatally defective in not averring whether the former suit was at law or in equity. A plea which avers facts which, if true, may or may not constitute a legal defense, depending entirely upon an ulterior fact not averred, is bad for uncertainty. A plea in abatement must be certain to every intent. 1 Chitty, Pldg. 473. All the particularity of the common law is required in a plea in abatement. Quarrier v. Ins. Co., 10 W. Va. 507. These pleas were insufficient in law, and, upon objection, were properly rejected.

It is assigned as error that the court entered judgment on the 3d day of February, 1904, for $788.93, with interest from the 26th day of July, 1903. If allowing interest from a previous day, instead of computing it up to the day of judgment and including it therein, is error, it is not to the prejudice of the defendant, and it cannot complain.

It is also assigned as error that the judgment is not sustained by the proper evidence heard at the trial. We must presume that the court excluded from its mind all improper testimony, if the proper testimony is sufficient to sustain the judgment. Mer. Co. v. Truax, 44 W. Va. 531, 29 S. E. 1006; State v. Denoon, 34 W. Va. 139, 11 S. E. 1003. The defendant offered no testimony, and we think the proper evidence offered at the trial by the plaintiff fully sustains the judgment of the lower court.

For the reasons stated above, the judgment entered by the circuit court of Ohio county on the 3d day of February, 1904, in favor of the plaintiff, H. A. Risher, against the defendant, the Wheeling Roofing & Cor-nice Company, is affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by Florence Yock against John C. Mann and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. Hop Woods and W. T. George, for appellant. Ice & Ice and F. O. Blue, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. By deed dated the 16th day of December, 1893, James A. Williamson and wife, and John C. Mann and wife, in consideration of $350, of which $125 was paid in cash, and the residue, $225, to be paid in three equal annual payments of $75 each, conveyed to Florence Yock a lot, containing 28 rods of land, in the town of Belington, in Barbour county, with general warranty, reserving their vendor's lien to secure the payment of the deferred installments of purchase money. The same lot had been previously conveyed to said Mann and Williamson by W. P. Scott and Henry C. Jones, in which a vendor's lien was likewise retained to secure the payment of unpaid purchase money. Still prior to that, the same lot was conveyed to Scott and Jones by James R. Payne and Julia C. Payne, his wife, who had also reserved a vendor's lien for a part of the purchase money. In January, 1898, H. A. Monahan brought his suit, as assignee of some of the notes secured by the former vendor's liens, and on the 4th day of June, 1898, a decree was rendered to sell the said lot to satisfy said prior vendors' liens, which was duly sold by a special commissioner and purchased by the defendant John C. Mann, and the sale duly confirmed, and Special Commissioner W. T. George, appointed for that purpose, was directed to collect the deferred installments and disburse the purchase money, and when all the purchase money should be paid that he should execute a deed to the purchaser for said lot, and after the purchase money was collected, at the request of John C. Mann, who had made sale of the lot to F. P. Rease, Special Commissioner W. T. George joined in a deed with John C. Mann and his wife, dated the 9th day of May, 1899, and conveyed the same to Frank P. Rease, in consideration of $350 paid by said Rease to Mann. At the April rules, 1902, Florence Yock filed her bill in the circuit court of Barbour county against John C. Mann, J. O. Williamson, administrator of James A. Williamson deceased, F. P. Rease, and W. T. George, special commissioner, defendants, alleging the payment of the sum of $84.30 as of the 30th day of April, 1894, and $69 paid about the 30th of June or July, 1894, on account of said deferred payments of purchase money due from her to Mann and Williamson, and claimed that there was only then due from her on account of the purchase money not exceeding the sum of $114.53, and alleging that she was entitled, upon payment of the residue of the purchase money due from her, to have the conveyance by the special commissioner and said Mann and wife to F. P. Rease set aside as in fraud of her rights and as a cloud upon her title, and to be placed in possession of said lot as her own, and brings into court and tenders to said defendants, Mann and the administrator of J. A. Williamson, said sum of $114.53 as all that was due upon the purchase money from her under her conveyance, and prays that said deed to Rease from Mann and wife and the special commissioner be set aside as a cloud upon her title, and an order be made releasing the vendor's lien retained in the deed from Mann and wife and Williamson and wife to her, and that she be given the possession of the said lot, and for general relief. Plaintiff exhibited with her bill copies of the deeds to herself from Mann and Williamson, and from J. R. Payne and wife to Scott and Jones, and from Scott and Jones to Mann, all of which deeds appear to have been duly recorded; and plaintiff also exhibited a copy of Monahan's bill, and decree of sale, and decree confirming the sale of the lot in said cause to Mann. The defendants John C. Mann and F. P. Rease severally answered the bill, to which general replications were entered.

Defendant John C. Mann denied the subsequent payments of $84 and $69, alleged by plaintiff, on account of the purchase money, after the cash payment of $125; admitted the former vendors' liens, and the proceeding by H. A. Monahan against him and others to enforce the collection thereof, and the purchase by himself of the lot under the decree of sale made in the Monahan case, and the confirmation of the sale to himself at the price of $215.43, and the sale of the same by himself and wife, and deed to Rease, joined in by the special commissioner, George, who was appointed to make a deed to said Mann when he should pay the residue of the purchase money; denied that he had ever called upon plaintiff to have her pay the purchase money due him from her before the said prior liens on said lot were fully discharged; that he frequently urged plaintiff and requested her to take up the liens of the said Monahan and Crim, and he would allow her full credit for the same upon the purchase money due to him, and thus perfect her title to said lot and remove all incumbrances thereon, which she expressly refused to do; denied that he had anything to do with the institution of the suit of Monahan against plaintiff and others, and that respondent repeatedly, at and after the sale, urged and requested plaintiff, through her agent and attorney, to take said lot and pay him and Williamson what was due to them after they had paid off the liens thereon, and have the sale made by Commissioner George confirmed to the plaintiff instead of respondent, and for several days the confirmation of said sale was held back for the express purpose of giving plaintiff an opportunity to take the house and lot, and she informed him by her agent and attorney that she could not do so. Respondent denied that he, in fraud of the rights of plaintiff, joined in said conveyance with Commissioner George in the deed to defendant Rease; that, while he did join in the conveyance, he did not do so with any fraudulent intent or purpose, but because he had in good faith sold said lot to the defendant Rease, and that the sale was not made to Rease until long after the respondent had been informed by plaintiff's attorney that she could not and would not take the property and pay respondent and Williamson what she owed them upon it; alleging that the sale to Rease by respondent was made with the full knowledge of plaintiff, and that no kind of opposition or protest was ever interposed by her to the execution of the deed to defendant Rease or to the making of said sale to him, and that plaintiff, prior to the sale or conveyance of said lot to Rease, delivered possession thereof to respondent; that respondent was unable to say whether defendant Rease had notice of the rights now claimed by plaintiff in said property or not, but was certain that he never informed said defendant Rease of it, because he knew of no just right or claim that plaintiff had to or in said property; and denied that plaintiff was entitled to have the deed to Rease set aside, or that she had any right or interest whatever in said property, and alleged that the conveyance from himself and Commissioner George to Rease conferred complete legal and equitable title upon the defendant Rease, and that the same was not in fraud of the rights of plaintiff, or otherwise invalid; and denied that the purchase of said lot by him from said Commissioner George at the sale thereof inured to the benefit of the plaintiff.

The defendant Rease filed his demurrer and answer to the plaintiff's bill, admitting that it was true that he purchased the property from defendant Mann for $350, which he paid to Mann, and received a deed therefor from Mann and his wife and Commissioner George, dated the 19th day of May, 1899; denied that he had any knowledge of plaintiff's rights in the matter, but that he bought the same in good faith; that plaintiff was a party defendant to the chancery suit of Monahan against her and others; that she permitted the sale of said lot to be made to Mann, and by decree duly entered confirmed to him, in which decree said special commissioner was authorized and directed to execute a deed conveying the lot to said Mann; that plaintiff had full knowledge of the purchase by Mann, and that Mann was willing to have said sale reported and confirmed to plaintiff, but she declined to have the same done, and entered into an agreement with Mann that the same was to be confirmed to him, and that he was to release her from any further payment by reason of her purchase from him and Williamson, and that under this agreement said Mann had said sale confirmed to him, and released said plaintiff of payment of the unpaid purchase money to him and Williamson; that respondent after his purchase took possession of the lot, plaintiff giving him possession and making no claim thereto, and thereupon respondent rebuilt the dwelling house on said lot, fenced it, built new pavements around it, and made other improvements, at an expense to him of $362, all of which was known to plaintiff, who stood by and permitted same to be done without making any claim to said lot whatsoever, and in his answer sets up her said acts as an estoppel against her making claim to said lot, and praying that, if the court should hold that she was entitled to the same, respondent be allowed the value of his improvements, and that the amount paid by him to John C. Mann be refunded to him, and denied every charge of fraud or intimation of fraud alleged against him in plaintiff's bill.

Depositions were taken and filed in the cause, and the cause was heard on the 31st day of May, 1904, upon the bill and exhibits, the answers of Mann and Rease, and general replications thereto, and upon exceptions to depositions, which exceptions were overruled, and the court held that upon the pleadings and proofs the cause was for the defendants, and decreed the dismissal of the bill, and costs to the defendants Mann and Rease; from which decree the plaintiff appealed.

The decree in favor of appellee Mann in this case seems to be defended by counsel upon the theory that there existed between Mann and Williamson on the one side, and plaintiff, Yock, on the other, an executory contract for the sale to Yock of the land, and that upon the failure of the purchaser, Yock, to pay the purchase money, they could rescind the contract, and cite many authorities to that effect, as in Ketchum v. Everton, 13 John. (N. Y.) 359, 7 Am. Dec. 384: "Where a purchaser who advances money as part performance of a contract for the purchase of land refused to pay the remainder, the vendor may rescind the contract and convey the land to another." And to the same effect is the case of Chabot v. Winter Park Company, 34 Fla. 258, 15 South. 756, 43 Am. St. Rep. 192; besides several Virginia cases and some West Virginia cases. They seem to forget that the legal title had passed from Mann and Williamson to the plaintiff, Yock; that, while she owed purchase money which she failed or refused to pay, she still had the legal title, and they could make no conveyance thereof to any other purchaser. In section 216, Maupin on Mark. Tit. to Real Estate, it is said: "A covenant of warranty will, in every case in which the grantor undertakes to convey an indefeasible estate, and not merely such interest as he may have, estop him from afterwards holding an after-acquired estate in the premises as against the grantee." And cases there cited. So, in section 24, 1 Greenl. on Evidence: "A covenant of warranty also estops the grantor from setting up an after-acquired title against the grantee, for it is a perpetually operating covenant." In Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 92, it is held: "If one conveys land with general warranty, which at the time he does not own, but afterwards acquires the same, such acquisition inures to the benefit of the grantee." Clark v. Lambert, 55 W. Va. —, 47 S. E. 312 (Syl., pt. 2): "If one conveys land with general warranty, which at the time he does not own, or his title to which is defective, but he afterwards acquires good title to the same, such acquisition inures to the benefit of his grantee." Flanary v. Kane (Va.) 46 S. E. 681. Defendant Rease in his answer states that plaintiff, Yock, gave him possession, and thereupon he rebuilt the dwelling house on the lot, and made the other improvements set up in his answer. To this answer there is a general replication by plaintiff, and plaintiff denies the fact in her testimony, and states that Mann got possession by getting one of her keys from her renter, Mr. Gainer, claiming he had bought it; that the possession of both Mann and Rease was without her consent or authority. Rease fails to prove, even by his own testimony, that the possession was delivered to him by the plaintiff. There is nothing in his testimony showing any act on the part of plaintiff that could in any way estop her in the assertion of her rights. He claims in his testimony that he thought he had good title. That he did not know that he had examined the records. That Mr. Ware was looking after that line of business for him, and he didn't remember that Ware reported to him as to the title of this property. He stated that he did not know that Mann owed the purchase money for it to commissioner George, and was asked, "Did you buy it of Mann without knowing anything about the title, and whether he had paid for it or not?" A. "I did. I considered him perfectly good for any purchase." That Mann did not tell him he owed the commissioner for the property, and stated that the first he learned that Mrs. Yock claimed any interest in the property was about the time she brought suit.

An attempt is made to prove by Melville Peck, who was attorney for Mrs. Yock, that she had failed in her efforts to raise the money to pay the purchase money, and that she had given up hope of saving it, and was therefore estopped from insisting that her claim should be enforced. Exceptions were taken to the deposition of Mr. Peck, for the reason that it detailed and disclosed communications of plaintiff to him when and while he was counsel for plaintiff in respect to the subject-matter of this controversy, and was therefore privileged. The exception was overruled. The action of the court in overruling the exception is immaterial, as the evidence of Peck failed to prove an estoppel. There is nothing to show he was authorized to make the statements he did, and, admitting the fact, they are not sufficient to estop her from asserting her claim. He simply stated that "she seemed to fail in her efforts to get the money; said that Mr. Surpell at last refused to furnish the money, and, as I understood her, she gave the matter up. I then told Mr. Mann that Mrs. Yock had failed to get the money to pay for the property, and I thought the matter was ended." The deed from Special Commissioner George and John C. Mann and Sallie Mann, his wife, of the 19th of May, 1899, recites the chancery cause of Monahan against Mann and others, to which the plaintiff, Florence Yock, was a party, and wherein it appears that said Mann and Williamson had conveyed the said property to the said Yock, and that she then had the legal title to said land. Of this fact the said Rease was bound to take notice, as it was a recital in the deed then executed to him. In Clark v. Lambert, supra (Syl., pt. 3), it is held: "Where a subsequent purchaser had actual notice that the property in question was incumbered or affected, he is charged constructively with notice of all of the facts and instruments to the knowledge of which he would have been led by an inquiry into the incumbrance, or other circumstances affecting the property, of which he had notice." Rease claims that, in case the plaintiff is entitled to have his deed set aside, he would be entitled to be paid the amount he had expended on said lot in the way of improvements. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562 (Syl., pt. 16) 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891: "One making permanent improvements on land as if his own, at a time when there was reason to believe his title good, is to be allowed their value, so far as they enhance the value of the land; but if, when making them, he has notice, actual or constructive, of the superior right of another, he cannot be allowed them." And point 17: "One having notice of facts rendering his title inferior to another's, who, by mistake of law, regards his title good, cannot claim for permanent improvements." This question is discussed at page 588 of 43 W. Va., page 421 of 27 S. E. (38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891), in said case. In Waldron v. Harvey, 54 W. Va. 608, 46 S. E. 603 (Syl., pt. 10): "A married woman cannot lose her land, separate or not separate estate, by estoppel by conduct (in pais) without actual fraud, if even by it." And point 11: "One cannot lose vested title to land by oral admission that it is the property of another." When the purchase was made by Mann under the decree in the Monahan case, the purchase inured to the benefit of his grantee, Florence Yock, and his sale of the property to Rease, and the purchase by Rease of the same, were in fraud of the rights of plaintiff Yock.

For the reasons herein stated, there is error in the decree of the circuit court of Barbour county, and the same is reversed, set aside, and annulled, and, this court proceeding to render such decree as the circuit court should have rendered, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the deed of May 19, 1899, from John C. Mann and Sallie Mann, his wife, and W. T. George, special commissioner, to Rease be, and the same is, set aside, annulled, and held for naught, and the plaintiff is awarded a writ of possession for the lot in controversy, with costs to the plaintiff, as well in the circuit court as her costs of this appeal. But this decree is without prejudice to the defendants Mann and Williamson to take such proceedings as they may be advised to enforce their vendor's lien against said property, if any, which may remain due and unpaid from the said Florence Yock.

(57 W. Va. 196)

STOVER v. DAVIS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

Feb. 14, 1905.)

UNLAWFUL DETAINER—PROOF OF TITLE—DISCLAIMER BY TENANT.

1. In an action of unlawful detainer brought by a landlord, no proof of title is required, since, if a tenant has once recognized the title of the plaintiff, and treated him as his landlord, by accepting a lease from him, he will not be permitted to dispute his landlord's title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 1243.]

2. Where the lease is by parol, it is not necessary for the landlord to give any evidence of his title anterior to the lease. An acknowledgment by the defendant that he went into possession under the plaintiff is sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover the possession.

3. A tenant in possession cannot disclaim his landlord's title without surrendering possession to him. He cannot collude with and attorn to another, claiming a hostile title, to the prejudice of his landlord.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, §§ 208, 210–214.]

4. The rule is well settled in this state that a tenant is not allowed to dispute his landlord's title after having accepted possession under him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, §§ 151–214.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County; J. M. Sanders, Judge.

Action by A. L. Stover against Lewis Davis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. L. Ashby and Price, Smith & Spillman, for plaintiff in error. Brown, Jackson & Knight, J. W. McCreary, and Angus W. McDonald, for defendant in error.

McWHORTER, J. This was an action of unlawful detainer brought by A. L. Stover against Lewis Davis to recover the possession of a tract of 50 acres of land in Raleigh county. About the last of May or the first of June, 1902, defendant, Davis, was placed in possession of the house and premises to hold possession for and under Stover until about the 1st of March, 1903. When possession was demanded of him by Stover, Davis replied, "Whenever you can show a better title than Mr. Crawford, that I have leased it from, I will give you possession, but not before." Stover then brought his action of unlawful detainer before a justice of the peace. Defendant, Davis, filed his verified answer to the complaint of plaintiff, stating that the title would come in question. The plaintiff filed an affidavit denying the fact stated in the answer of defendant—that the title of said real estate would come in question. The justice heard the evidence, and rendered judgment for plaintiff for the possession of the premises and for plaintiff's costs. The defendant appealed to the circuit court. At the June term, 1903, the parties, waiving a jury, submitted all matters of law and fact to the judgment and determination of the court. The court, having heard the evidence, took time to consider of its judgment, and on the 28th of July rendered judgment for plaintiff for the recovery of the possession of the premises, and awarded a writ of possession therefor, and rendered judgment for costs of the suit against the defendant and his sureties on his appeal bond; and the defendant moved the court to set aside the judgment and grant him a new trial because of errors committed in the trial of the action to his prejudice, as shown in the record, and, further, because said judgment was contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted. On the trial of the case the defendant took a bill of exceptions to the several rulings of the court excepted to, which was made a part of the record, which bill of exceptions included all the evidence introduced in the case at the trial. Plaintiff proved upon the trial that he had had actual possession of the premises in question, and had paid taxes thereon, ever since the 28th of August, 1890, at which time he received from Asel Ford and wife a general warranty deed for the premises, which was duly recorded October 9, 1890, and under which he had held possession ever since. Upon the trial it was admitted by the defendant that he was then in possession of the property described in the summons as amended, and was so in possession at the time of the institution of the suit.

There are exceptions taken to the ruling of the court in overruling objections to the introduction of the deeds on either side, and to the motion to quash the summons, which was permitted to be amended in the court; but none of these exceptions are relied upon, and, as stated by counsel for defendant in their brief, "the only question is, could Davis, under the circumstances above set out, defend this action?" And they say: "First, that in this case actual notice was given to the landlord of the adverse holding; second, while, as a general rule, when the relation of landlord and tenant is once established, the tenant cannot dispute his landlord's title, yet this rule is subject to many qualifications and exceptions as well and firmly fixed as the rule itself." And they cite Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 240, 10 S. E. 402; Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Grat. 220, 58 Am. Dec. 217; Campbell v. Fetterman's Heirs, 20 W. Va. 398; Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 43, 7 L. Ed. 596; Alderson v. Miller, 15 Grat. 279. In the case of Voss v. King the defendant was in possession at the time he accepted the lease from Voss, and therefore did not acquire his possession from the landlord. Judge Snyder, in rendering the opinion of the court, at page 245 of 33 W. Va., and page 405 of 10 S. E., says (this being the case): "Whether we apply the rule that a tenant who acquires his possession from the landlord must surrender his possession before he can assert an adverse claim, or the other rule, that without an actual surrender of the possession the tenant may, after a positive disclaimer and notice to the landlord, set up an adverse title either in himself or a third person, the defendant in this case was entitled to prove that he had given notice to Voss, and that he was holding adversely to his title"—and in the latter event he ought to be permitted to show to the satisfaction of the jury that more than three years before the action was commenced he had disclaimed to hold under Voss' title, and that Voss, or those claiming under him, had notice of such disclaimer; clearly holding, by implication, that the possessory action could be brought within the three-years limitation, even under the last rule mentioned, where the possession was not acquired directly from the landlord. In Emerick v. Tavener, 9 Grat. 220, 58 Am. Dec. 217, decided in 1852, Judge Lee thoroughly discusses the relation of landlord and tenant. In that case Emerick, in possession claiming under a patent of 1839, accepted for a year a lease from Tavener, an adverse claimant out of possession. In 1847, Tavener having to that date made no further claim, Emerick conveyed the land to Alton. Tavener then demanded rent of Emerick, who refused to pay, and possession, being demanded, was also refused, when Tavener brought his action of unlawful detainer. At page 223 of 9 Grat. (58 Am. Dec. 217) the opinion says: "The doctrine is well settled that, if a privity of estate have existed between parties to an action, proof of title is ordinarily unnecessary for a party is not permitted to dispute the original title of him by whom he has been let into possession. A tenant cannot be permitted to question or impugn the title of his landlord during the continuance of the tenancy, nor until he has restored the possession, or done what would be regarded as equivalent; nor can he be permitted to deny that the possession so received was the possession of his landlord. And the rule is extended to the case of a tenant acquiring the possession by wrong against the owner, and to one holding over after the expiration of his lease; and it applies whether the question arises directly in an action brought against the tenant to recover the possession, or in a collateral form in some other action. Wood v. Day, 7 Taunt. R. 646; Fleming v. Gooding, 10 Bing. R. 549; Taylor v. Needham, 2 Taunt. R. 278; Cooke v. Loxley, 5 T. R. 4; Codman v. Jenkins, 14 Mass. 95; Inhab. of Watertown v. White, 13 Mass. 477; Galloway's Lessee v. Ogle, 2 Bln. 468; Graham v. Moore, 4 Serg. & R. 467; Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 43, 7 L. Ed. 596; Marley v. Rodgers, 5 Yerg. 217; Wilson v. Smith, Id. 379; Jackson v. Dobbin, 3 Johns. 223; Crabbe on Real Property, 327; Archbold on Landlord & Tenant 219. Nor is the rule varied where the tenant is in actual possession of the premises at the time he accepts a lease. He thereby as effectually recognizes the title and possession of the lessor as if he had entered and taken possession under and by virtue of the lease itself. McConnell v. Bowdry's Heirs, 4 T. B. Mon. 392. The same rule is recognized in equity. Willson v. Lord Townsend, 2 Ves. Jr. R. 693; Attorney General v. Lord Hotham, 3 Russ. R. 415. When once this relation of landlord and tenant is established by the act of the parties, it attaches to all who may succeed to the possession through or under the tenant, whether immediately or remotely; the succeeding tenant being as much bound by the acts and admissions of his predecessor as if they were his own. Doe v. Mills, 2 Adolph. & Ell. 17; Doe v. Austin, 2 Moore & Scott, 107; Doe v. Burton, 9 Carr. & Payne, 254; Doe v. Lady Smythe, 4 Maule & Selw. 367; Jackson ex dem. Vandensen v. Scissam, 3 Johns. 499. It has been suggested, however, that although a party succeeding a tenant in the possession is to be presumed to have taken as tenant, also, yet that he may repel that presumption, and escape being concluded by the acts and admissions of his predecessor, by showing that he did not take in that character, as by producing a deed from the tenant purporting (as in this case) to convey the premises in fee. But the contrary has been expressly decided, and it has been held that, though the party purchase and enter upon the premises under an absolute conveyance, he still, in judgment of law, is deemed to have entered as the tenant of the landlord, and to hold the possession subject to all the duties and responsibilities appertaining to that character." Much more might be quoted from this very able opinion which would be applicable to case at bar.

In 2 Taylor's Landlord & Tenant, § 629: "The rule is well settled that a tenant is not allowed to dispute his landlord's title after having accepted possession under him." Section 705, Id.: "No proof of title is required in this action when it is brought by a landlord, since, if a tenant has once recognized the title of the plaintiff, and treated him as his landlord, by accepting a lease from him, or the like, he is precluded from showing that the plaintiff had no title at the time the lease was granted, and that whether the action be debt, assumpsit, covenant or ejectment, for it is a general rule that a tenant shall never be permitted to controvert his landlord's title, or set up against him a title acquired by himself during his tenancy which is hostile in its character to that which he acknowledged in accepting the demise. And this rule extends to tenant holding over, as well as to an undertenant, assignee, or other person claiming under the lessee, and is applicable to every species of tenancy—whether for years, or from year to year, at will, or by sufferance. As a tenant is not permitted to resist the recovery of his landlord by virtue of an adverse title acquired during the tenancy, if he takes a lease from a third person it is void, and cannot work an adverse possession against his landlord, for the possession of a tenant is the possession of his landlord." And cases there cited. Also section 706, Id.: "Where the lease is by parol it will not be necessary for the landlord to give any evidence of his title anterior to the lease, for a holding under a plaintiff and the expiration of the tenancy are the only things to be proved in ordinary cases. Even an acknowledgment by the defendant that he went into possession under the plaintiff is sufficient to entitle him to recover, it being a simple matter of fact for the jury to determine whether the defendant held under the plaintiff or not." In 1 McAdam on Landlord & Tenant, § 82, it is said: "When the tenant remains in possession after the expiration of the original term by permission of the landlord, the implication is that he continues in possession under the conditions of the former demise." See Hobbs v. Batory, 86 Md. 68, 37 Atl. 713; Kendall v. Moore, 30 Me. 327; Commissioners v. Clark, 38 N. Y. 251. In Schuyler v. Smith, 51 N. Y. 309, 10 Am. Rep. 606, it is held "that, a tenant for one or more years holding over after the expiration of his term, the landlord has the option to treat him as a trespasser, or as a tenant for another year upon the terms of the prior lease, so far as applicable; and the right of the landlord to elect to continue the tenancy is not affected by the fact that the tenant has refused to renew the lease, and has given notice that he has hired other premises. It is not in the power of the tenant alone to throw off the character thus imposed upon him." And it is held to the same effect in Bacon v. Brown, 9 Conn. 334. In McAdam on Landlord & Tenant, § 174: "Where a lease is made for a certain definite term, the tenancy will expire with the term. In such cases, notice to quit will not be necessary to dissolve the relation of landlord and tenant. * * * Where the term is definitely fixed, the tenancy expires ex vi termini, and notice to quit is unnecessary. * * * Unless he renews the tenancy, he knows it is his plain duty to give up possession by returning the keys to the landlord at the end of the agreed term. The law imposes this duty upon him, as the natural, contemplated result of the contract under which he originally obtained his possession." In Simmons v. Robertson, 27 Ark. 50, it is held: "A tenant in possession is not at liberty to question the title of the person under whom he holds, or attorn to a third person." And again: "A tenant, while the relation of landlord and tenant exists, cannot rent from one who has acquired title hostile to that of his landlord, though it be a better title." And in Bryan v. Winburn, 43 Ark. 23, it is held: "A tenant, in possession cannot disclaim his landlord's title without surrendering possession to him. He cannot collude with and attorn to another to the prejudice of his landlord." Wilson v. James, 79 N. C. 349; Hawes v. Shaw, 100 Mass. 187; Oakes v. Munroe, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 282. Judge Snyder, in treating of this doctrine in Voss v. King, supra, at page 240 of 33 W. Va., and page 403 of 10 S. E., says: "This doctrine was unknown at the common law, and is an estoppel in pais. The only tenant's estoppel known when Lord Coke wrote was that strictly by the indenture. But the tenant's estoppel is now no longer restricted, as it is founded on the possession, and not on the instrument of demise, and is as operative after the conclusion of the lease as before, and until that possession is ended. It is only when there is fraud or mistake, in consequence of which one takes a lease of land, that he will not be estopped by the lease. Taylor on Land. & Ten. §§ 89, 707; Big. on Estop. 350; Camarillo v. Fenlon, 49 Cal. 202; Alderson v. Miller, 15 Grat. 279; Locke v. Frasher's Adm'r, 79 Va. 409; Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Grat. 352." In Voss v. King, Judge Snyder, in considering the question as to whether a tenant in possession could, by mere disclaimer and notice to his landlord, without an actual surrender of the premises, terminate his tenancy, after referring to the case of Weathersby v. Wilson, 1 Nott & McC. 373, note, as to the holding in that case on the question, says: "The general rule seems to be that when the tenant disclaims to hold under his lease, and notice of this fact is brought home to the landlord, then the relation of landlord and tenant ceases, and the tenant becomes a trespasser, and his possession is adverse, and the landlord may by action dispossess him without notice to quit. If the tenant, with notice to the landlord, disclaims the tenure, and claims the fee adversely in right of himself or a third person, or attorns to another, his possession then becomes a tortious one, by the forfeiture of his right, and the landlord's right of entry is complete, and he may sue at any time within the period of limitation from that time. Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 43, 7 L. Ed. 596; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90, 11 Am. Dec. 417; Tyler, Ej. 311; Willd's Lessee v. Serpell, 10 Grat. 405; Miller v. Williams, 15 Grat. 213, 219; Cooley v. Potter, 22 W. Va. 120." In Bodkin v. Arnold, 45 W. Va. 90, 30 S. E. 154 (syl., point 3), it is held: "Where a person claiming title takes a lease of the same land under a different title, in the absence of fraud or mistake, he is estopped to deny his landlord's title or possession." And in Church v. Arkle, 49 W. Va. 92, 38 S. E. 486 (syl., point 2): "In an action of unlawful detainer by a landlord against a tenant, the tenant cannot deny the landlord's title."

Counsel for defendant rely particularly upon said case of Willison v. Watkins, and ask the especial attention of this court to that case, in support of their position. In this case, Justice Baldwin, after stating the rule of estoppel precluding the tenant from controverting the landlord's title, and creating, because of the hardship of that case, the exception relied upon by plaintiff in error, at page 53 of 3 Pet. (7 L. Ed. 596), says: "In the case in 1 Nott & McC. 374, the court decide that, where a defendant enters under a plaintiff, he shall not dispute his title while he remains in possession, and that he must first give up his possession, and bring his suit to try titles. To the correctness of this principle we yield our assent, not as one professing to be peculiar to South Carolina, but as a rule of the common law applicable to the cases of fiduciary possession before noticed. It is laid down as a general rule, embracing, in terms, tenants in common, trustees, mortgagees, and lessees, but disallowing none of the exceptions or limitations which qualify it, and exclude from its operation all cases where the possession has become adverse, where the party entitled to it does not enter or sue within the time of the statute of limitations, or give any good reason for his delay, leaving the rule in full force wherever the suit is brought within the time prescribed by law." In that case the statute of limitations was five years, and, as stated in the syllabus, the act of limitations had run out four times before the landlord had done any act to assert his right to the land, and as the court said at page 49 of 3 Pet. (7 L. Ed. 596): "No injury can be done the landlord, unless by his own laches. If he sues within the period of the act of limitations, he must recover. If he suffer the time to pass without suit, it is but the common case of any other party who loses his right by negligence and loss of time." There was no time lost in the case at bar. The suit was brought within the same month in which the lease of the defendant expired, and the acceptance of a lease by the defendant Davis under the adverse title of Ashby et al. At the next succeeding term of the United States Supreme Court, after the decision of the case of Willison v. Watkins, Justice Baldwin, delivering the opinion of the court in Peyton v. Stith, 5 Pet. 485, 8 L. Ed. 200, referring to his former opinion, says: "In the case of Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 44 [7 L. Ed. 596], decided at the last term, this court considered and declared the law to be settled that a purchase by a tenant of an adverse title, claiming under or attorning to it, or any other disclaimer of tenure with the knowledge of the landlord, was a forfeiture of his term; that his possession became so far adverse that the act of limitations could begin to run in his favor from the time of such forfeiture, and the landlord could sustain ejectment against him, without notice to quit, at any time before the period prescribed by the statute had expired, by the mere force of the tenure, without any other evidence than the proof of the tenancy; but that the tenant could in no case contest the right of his landlord to possession, or defend himself by any claim or title adverse to him, during the time which the statute has to run. If the landlord suffers it to run out without making an entry or bringing a suit, each party may stand upon their right, but until then the possession of the tenant is the possession of the landlord. Tested by these principles, the purchase from Phillips in 1814 can have no effect on the merits of this case. Though the possession of Stith became from that time adverse for these specified purposes, it remained fiduciary for all others. He could not assert an adversary title without surrendering possession. The law recognizes him as having no rights of property in the lands, unless such as grow out of his tenure. His title must remain dormant while he retains possession for a less term than prescribed by law. It may become active whenever he abandons the possession or it is protected by the limitation." Wild's Lessee v. Serpell, 10 Grat. 405.

The overwhelming weight of authorities sustains the proposition that a tenant taking possession of land under any person is not at liberty to question the title of the person under whom he holds, or to attorn to a third person. The action of unlawful detainer is a purely possessory action, and does not go to the title. It matters not to the tenant how the landlord came in possession. After accepting the possession under him he cannot question his title, and has no right to collude with persons out of possession in order to defeat the possession of his landlord. As is well said in Simmons v. Robertson, supra, at page 54, "If such sharp practice was tolerated by courts of justice, this important possessory action would be worthless." The facts in the case show—indeed, it appears in the petition for writ of error in this case—that "the plaintiff claimed title to a tract of land in said county, and in May, 1902, rented a portion of said land to the petitioner from that date until the 1st day of March, 1903. After this rental, W. L. Ashby, E. T. Crawford, and D. G. Courtney acquired title to a tract of land, the lines of which latter tract covered the lands rented by your petitioner from said Stover"; and it states that after the expiration of petitioner's lease with Stover he took a lease from said parties, and notified Stover of the fact that he was occupying said land as an agent of the other parties; claiming that at the termination of his lease with Stover he could thus turn over the possession to the claimants of the hostile title. As has been shown, the relation of landlord and tenant did not cease to exist at the end of the time for which he had leased. If he remained in possession after that time, it was the province of the plaintiff to treat him as a tenant or as a trespasser, at his option, in case he claimed to be holding adversely and under a hostile title. Section 211, c. 50, Code 1899, provides: "If any forcible or unlawful entry be made upon land, or if, when the entry was lawful, the tenant detain possession of land after his right has expired, without the consent of him who is entitled to the possession, the party so turned out of the possession, no matter what right or title he had thereto, or the party against whom such possession is unlawfully detained, may commence suit to obtain possession of the land and damages for its detention, within two years after the cause of action accrues, before any justice of the county in which such land or the greater part thereof is situated." This section is too plain to be misunderstood—that the action is simply for the possession to which the plaintiff is entitled, and is entirely independent of the title to the land. And section 217 specifically provides that the judgment in such suit "shall not bar any subsequent action of ejectment brought by either party." In a long line of decisions it has become a settled rule in this state that after the termination of a lease the landlord, at his election, may treat the tenancy as one at sufferance, or the holding over as a trespass, and in either case the tenant in an action for possession is estopped to dispute the title of his landlord within the period of the statute of limitations.

There is no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and the same is affirmed.

ROBINSON et al. v. EDGELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 14, 1905.)

INJUNCTIONS—RESTRICTIONS IN DEED—ENFORCEMENT.

1. Courts of equity will enforce by injunction negative covenants and clauses in deeds, restricting the use of real estate, though they do not, in law, constitute easements or covenants running with the land; but the jurisdiction is discretionary, and is governed by the principles applicable to the enforcement of specific performance of contracts.

2. Equity will not enforce such a covenant if it appears that, since the conveyance was made, the general conditions and surroundings of the property, continuation of which was contemplated by the parties, have been so changed, otherwise than by the act of the covenantor, as to render the enforcement of the covenant inequitable and burdensome to him, and defeat the purpose of the restriction. But conditions existing at the time of the conveyance will not, in the absence of fraud or other vitiating element, constitute ground of defense to such suit.

3. Permanent restrictions upon the use of real estate being contrary to the policy of the law, courts of equity, in enforcing compliance with restrictive covenants, limit the decree by the duration of the conditions and relations which form the basis of the equity calling for such enforcement.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wetzel County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Bill by L. G. Robinson and others against C. W. Edgell and others. From a judgment dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

E. L. Robinson, J. H. Strickling, Hunt & Staples, and Henry M. Russell, for appellants. Sperry & Sperry and John Bassell, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. The circuit court of Wetzel county having dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill, upon a full hearing, in a suit brought to enforce by injunction a negative covenant in a deed, restricting the use of the property thereby conveyed, the plaintiffs, grantors in the deed, have appealed.

The property involved is a lot about 30 by 80 feet, at a point in an oil region of Wetzel county, on the West Virginia Short Line Railroad, at a station called Robinson. It was conveyed on the 28th day of May, 1903, by L. G. Robinson and J. S. Robinson to C. W. Edgell for and in consideration of $300. The restrictive clause involved reads as follows: "This writing prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors in any manner whatever on the premises hereby conveyed, and this is a part of the consideration." The lot was a part of an estate, containing about 70 acres, which had been purchased by the Robinsons from the heirs of one Talkington. Talkington had left a widow and some children. Under a purchase, lease, or license from the widow, a man by the name of Ice, at the time of the purchase by the Robinsons, had a building on part of the land, in which he was conducting a retail liquor business. On the same day on which the conveyance was made to Edgell, the house in which Ice was doing business and the lot of ground on which it stood were conveyed to Emma M. Ice, A. B. Ice, and James Ice, by a deed which contains no clause restricting the use of the property, and the business then being conducted on the premises was continued. This lot and the lot conveyed to Edgell adjoined each other. The Robinsons still retained the larger portion of the land purchased from the Talkington heirs, and sold some additional lots out of it, both before and after the conveyance to Edgell; and in all the deeds, except the one executed to Ice, there are clauses prohibiting the sale of liquors on the lots. They justify the exception in that instance on the ground that the grantees in that deed had an interest in the land, as assignees of the dower interest, in consequence of which there was a compromise or adjustment under which the Ices obtained their lot without any restriction upon its use. Edgell erected a building on the lot, and in November, 1903, leased the third-story room of the building for the period of 12 months to P. P. Higgins, who, together with H. Behrman and P. Crim, contemplated using the same for saloon purposes, and prepared to open a retail liquor business therein. Thereupon the Robinsons brought this suit. Edgell filed an answer to the bill, setting up as matters of defense that the clause in question had been fraudulent.

lently inserted in his deed after the execution and delivery thereof, and that Robinson had waived the benefit of the clause by omitting such clause from the deed made to Ice and from other deeds. The allegation of fraudulent insertion of the clause in Edgell's deed is not sustained by the evidence. As to whether it had been omitted from certain deeds, other than the Ice deed, is not entirely certain. If it was, it was afterwards inserted—in one instance by consent of the grantee, and in the other without the grantee's knowledge. The theory of the defense is that, after the contract to sell to Edgell was made, the Robinsons and Ices conceived the idea of creating for themselves a monopoly of the liquor traffic in that village, and procured the alteration of the deeds so as to restrict from such use all of the lots sold by the Robinsons, except the one sold to the Ices. P. A. Ice, by his own admission and the testimony of other witnesses, appears to have been active in procuring the insertion of these restrictive clauses in the deeds made to one P. B. Robinson and a firm known as Smith & Parrish. He also admits having paid to one Morgan, the owner of a tract of land near the village, the sum of $500, in consideration of his agreement not to allow any of his property to be used for saloon purposes. Having the unrestricted use of his own property, the insertion of the covenant against sales of liquor in the deed made to P. B. Robinson was beneficial to him, and, in making inquiry about it, he was, no doubt, actuated by his own interest; but the acceptance, on the part of J. S. Robinson and L. G. Robinson, of any proper service rendered by him, is not inconsistent with the object which they say induced them to place restrictions upon the use of the other property. As to the Smith & Parrish deed, it can only be said the clause is in it, and no steps have been taken to eliminate it, and it has not been clearly shown to have been fraudulently inserted.

The jurisdiction in equity to enforce negative covenants restricting the use of real property is not denied. On the contrary, it is frankly admitted. Such jurisdiction is upheld by the courts everywhere. "Covenants restraining the use of real property afford an instance of that class of cases in which equity will charge the conscience of a grantee of land with an agreement relating to the land, although the agreement neither creates an easement, nor runs with the land. The jurisdiction is not confined to cases in which an action at law can be maintained, and such covenants, although not binding at law, will be enforced in equity, provided the person into whose hands the land passes has taken it with notice of the covenants." 11 Cyc. 1078. Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 1342, says such covenants will be specifically enforced in equity, by means of an injunction, not only between the immediate parties, but also against subsequent purchasers with notice, even when the covenants are not of the kind which technically run with the land. The injunction in this class of cases is granted almost as a matter of course upon a breach of the covenant. The amount of damages, and even the fact that the plaintiff has sustained any pecuniary damages, are wholly immaterial. To the same effect, see Beach on Inj. § 474. This proposition is sustained by numerous decisions cited in support of the text above quoted and referred to.

The most frequent illustrations of the application of the principle are found in cases involving the rights of parties holding by conveyance town lots, as subdivisions of a tract of land, the use of which had been limited by like or similar clauses inserted in all the deeds for the purpose of impressing upon all the property a certain character or quality, such as residence property. To the end that such property may be the more readily and advantageously sold, the use of each lot for trade, manufacturing, commercial, or business purposes is prohibited. Although the clause is not a covenant to do a beneficial act upon the property of the grantor, so as to directly annex to that property a benefit, but, on the contrary, binds the grantee to abstain from the doing upon his own lot of a certain act, a court of equity looks to the whole scheme as one intended to confer a benefit upon the property remaining in the hands of the grantor after the sale of each lot, and passing by subsequent conveyances to the grantees of other lots, as beneficial interests or rights attached to their lots, and therefore enforces observance of the provisions and restrictions as readily as a court of law would award damages for the breach of a covenant annexed to real property in such a manner as to make it a covenant running with the land. Beach on Inj. § 474; Whitney v. Union Ry. Co., 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715; Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 841, 83 Am. Dec. 632; Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 546; Smith v. Barrie, 56 Mich. 314, 22 N. W. 816, 56 Am. Rep. 391; Watrous v. Allen, 57 Mich. 362, 24 N. W. 104, 58 Am. Rep. 363; Hodge v. Sloan, 107 N. Y. 244, 17 N. E. 335, 1 Am. St. Rep. 816.

The right to invoke relief by injunction in such cases is not absolute, however. To a certain extent, the jurisdiction is discretionary. It is governed by the same general principles which control the jurisdiction to compel specific performance of contracts. Where a proper case for its exercise is shown, relief is granted as a matter of course, but if, under the conditions and circumstances obtaining, the granting of the relief sought would work injustice or be ineffectual of any meritorious result, it will be refused. If, therefore, the restrictive covenants in deeds conveying lots were made with reference to the continuance of existing general conditions of the property and surroundings, but in the lapse of time there has been a change in the character and surroundings, so as to defeat the purposes of the covenants, and to render their enforcement an inequitable, unjust, and useless burden upon the owner of the lot, equity will refuse its aid and leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law. Trustees v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 811, 41 Am. Rep. 365; Page v. Murray, 46 N. J. Eq. 331, 19 Atl. 11. When such change in conditions is due to the act of the grantor or is assented to by him, equity will not interfere at his instance. Page v. Murray, cited.

Defense to this suit is made under this exception to the rule, founded upon the discretionary character of the jurisdiction. The argument is that as by the conveyance to Ice without any restriction upon the use of the lot the grantors by their own act subjected their adjacent land, as well as the lot conveyed to the defendant Edgell, to the very influence which they ostensibly sought to avert by the insertion of the restrictive clause in the Edgell deed, the enforcement of the clause in the Edgell deed would be inequitable and unproductive of any beneficial result. Moreover, at the time of the purchase of the lands from the Talkington heirs they were already subjected to the objectionable influence, and had in no sense any special character or quality impressed upon them. Though all the precedents on this subject, cited or found, have presented cases in which the circumstance or the act of the grantor which made it inequitable to enforce the restriction was subsequent to the date of the conveyance in which the restrictive covenant had been inserted, it is insisted that the relation in time between the conveyance and the matter relied upon to defeat enforcement of the covenant is immaterial. The defect in this contention is the failure to allow the conditions existing at the time of the conveyance and the intent and purpose of the grantor, all of which were known to the grantee and assented to by him, any weight or effect. It asserts as ground for relief from the restrictive clause not conditions which have arisen since the contract was made, but those which were in full view of the parties at the time it was made, and are deemed to have been included in it. Nothing has occurred since the conveyance which has wrought a change in conditions. The lot was taken subject to known existing conditions, and a stipulation in the deed prohibiting a particular use of it. To permit the grantee to prevent the operation of the restrictive clause by setting up prior or contemporaneous conditions would enable him to take advantage of his own acts, rather than those of the grantor. Unlike most instances of the subsection of property to limitation upon its use for a certain trade or business, the lot involved here has not the benefit of a like restriction upon all adjacent property. It is not protected from the business or influence, the prevention of which is the ostensible purpose of the burden which has been placed upon it. The equitable easement or servitude, if any, which the grantor has annexed to his remaining property by imposing the burden of restriction of use upon the lot conveyed to Edgell, is partially defeated by the liberty of full and unrestricted use of the lot he conveyed to Ice, and the failure to limit the use of that lot almost wholly deprives Edgell of any reciprocal benefit from the limitation to which he has consented. This results, however, from the close proximity of his lot to the one on which the saloon is. He has the benefit of the implied limitation upon the use of the grantor's remaining lands, and there may have been a reduction in the price of the lot, as a further consideration. The deed recites that the restriction is a part of the consideration, and there is testimony tending to show such reduction. This view of the contract, conditions, and relations of the parties, therefore, could only raise a question of adequacy of consideration, and courts will not refuse specific performance on the ground of inadequacy unless it is so great as to shock the conscience and raise a presumption of fraud. This the evidence does not disclose. Had the conveyance to Ice followed that made to Edgell, instead of accompanying or preceding it, the latter might well set up against the plaintiffs their own breach of the mutual arrangement made for the benefit of the grantee, as well as that of the grantors. This subsequent act would be in the nature of a failure of consideration, a waiver of the easement, or a wrongful act, precluding relief, under the rule that he who invokes the aid of a court of equity must come with clean hands, and under the operation of the maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity. These principles cannot be applied to prior or contemporaneous acts and conditions unless it be shown that the grantor, by suppressing knowledge and information or some other fraudulent conduct, has overreached the grantee, and taken an unconscionable advantage, from which equity would grant relief, or because of which it would withhold its aid. Nothing of that kind appears here. The saloon on the adjoining lot was open and in full blast when the purchase was made. This was sufficient to put the grantee on inquiry. It was a patent condition, to which he made no objection. He took the deed subject to it, and is alone responsible for the situation of which he complains.

That the lot conveyed to Edgell is subject to the effect of the liquor traffic conducted on the adjoining lot, and its value is thereby made less than it would be if its use were not restricted, does not preclude an honest and proper motive for the insertion of the restrictive clause. Why may a landowner not exclude a certain class of business from one portion of his land, without forbidding it on another? If he does so, does it not necessarily result that portions lying next to the division line may be in the exact situation in which Edgell's lot is? Might not the same result occur, in excluding such business or trade from the whole of a tract of land, as to so much of it as adjoins the lands of others over which the owner of the tract has no control? These are inevitable and unavoidable incidents to the exercise of this power of exclusion. Hence they afford no ground for the claim that the effort to exclude is futile, and the enforcement of the covenant in this instance would not effectuate its ostensible purpose. By limiting the use of the Ice lot, that purpose would have had broader scope, and the exclusion would have been practically complete, but by their contract the parties have defined and fixed the scope and determined the extent of exclusion, and no change has occurred by which it has been wholly or partially defeated, and the grantor has done nothing which justifies refusal of the aid of the court.

As to the other ground of defense, namely, that the suit is only a step in the execution of an arrangement to restrain the trade in liquors and create a monopoly in the hands of Ice, it is not necessary to say more than that the evidence does not sustain it. A. P. Ice was active in procuring the insertion of the restrictive clauses in the deeds. He paid Morgan $500 as consideration for his agreement not to allow the business conducted on his premises. Clendemming, his lessee, and Morgan, his confederate, executed the $3,000 injunction bond in this suit, as principal and surety, respectively; and J. S. Robinson almost admits that some of these people have indemnified the plaintiffs against costs and damages in the suit, but he does not say so, and there is no other evidence of it. The burden of proof as to this defense is on the defendants. They must prove their affirmative matter of defense, and we deem the evidence adduced insufficient.

Our conclusion is that the circuit court erred in dissolving the injunction. Hence the decree complained of must be reversed, and the injunction will be perpetuated, subject to the right, in the defendants and their assigns, to have the same hereafter dissolved for any sufficient cause that may be shown. As has been stated, the jurisdiction invoked is purely equitable and discretionary, and its exercise will extend no further than equity, conscience, and justice demand. Therefore the condition is put in the decree so that in the event of such changes in the future, or such conduct on the part of the grantor, and those claiming under him, as would make the burden of the restriction inequitable and oppressive, the coercive power of the court may be withdrawn, and the parties left to the pursuit of such legal remedies as they may have. Winnepesaukee Association v. Gordon, 83 N. H. 505, 3 Atl. 426.

NORMILE et al. v. WHEELING TRACTION CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 14, 1905.)

ACTION BY WIFE—PERSONAL INJURIES—DAMAGES — EVIDENCE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — STREET RAILROAD—INJURY TO PASSENGER—VERDICT—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

1. In an action by the wife for the recovery of damages for personal injuries sustained by her, she may or may not, at her election, join her husband as coplaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Husband and Wife, §§ 767, 768, 770.]

2. When the wife sustains personal injuries, and brings an action to recover damages therefor, she may recover for being prevented from performing and transacting her necessary affairs and business by her to be performed and transacted, if such prevention is the result of the injuries for which she sues.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Husband and Wife, § 768.]

3. In an action for personal injuries, where, as a result of such injuries, a surgical operation is necessary to be performed, evidence which shows or tends to show that such operation was attended with great difficulty and dangers, and that comparatively few physicians perform such operation, is admissible.

4. A plaintiff, in an action for damages for an alleged negligence of another, is not required to exercise more care than is usual, under similar circumstances, among careful persons of the class to which said plaintiff belongs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, § 92.]

5. When an action is brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff on account of the defendant's negligence, it is not error to omit to instruct the jury as to the law of contributory negligence in an instruction given for the plaintiff, when the court, in giving the defendant's instructions, instructs the jury fully and fairly on that point.

6. It is not error to instruct the jury that the loss of childbearing power is an element of damage to be considered by them in an action for personal injuries sustained through the negligence of the defendant, when such loss is the reasonable and probable result of such negligent act.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, § 235.]

7. Where a street car company stops its cars for the purpose of receiving passengers, it is charged with the highest degree of care to see that all passengers lawfully entering its cars get to a place of safety thereon before starting its cars.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1159.]

8. A case which was proper to be submitted to the jury on the question as to whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

9. In an action to recover damages for personal injuries, the court will not interfere with the verdict of a jury, on the ground that the damages found are excessive, unless the finding is so manifestly unjust as to show partiality, prejudice, or misapprehension on the part of the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Ohio County; Thayer Melvin, Judge.

Action by Annie Normile and husband against the Wheeling Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. M. Russell and Erskine & Allison, for plaintiff in error. Caldwell & Caldwell, for defendants in error.

SANDERS, J. This is an action brought by Annie Normile and Thomas Normile, her husband, against the Wheeling Traction Company, in the circuit court of Ohio county, for personal injuries sustained by the female plaintiff, which, it is alleged, were caused by the negligence of the defendant company. There was a verdict and judgment against the company of $9,150, to which a writ of error and supersedeas was awarded.

The first error complained of is that the court improperly overruled the demurrer to the amended declaration. Counsel for the defendant contend that the declaration is bad, because the female plaintiff and her husband are joined therein as coplaintiffs, and that it unites two causes of action, in this: that in each of the three counts of the declaration it is alleged that Annie Normile was hurt in her person, and that she has suffered pain and had become sick, "and by means of which she was prevented from performing and transacting her necessary affairs and business by her to be performed and transacted." There is an endeavor to assimilate the declaration in this case with the one which was before the court in the case of City of Wheeling v. Trowbridge, 5 W. Va. 353, but, upon a comparison of these declarations, it will be found that there is a vast difference between them. In the Trowbridge Case, one count in the declaration alleged a case in which the wife was the meritorious cause of action, and in the other count "the husband claimed special damages for the loss of the society, comfort, assistance, etc., of his wife, and for money laid out and expended by him in and about the endeavoring to heal and cure her." Where the action is brought by the husband and wife for a wrong to the wife, there can be no recovery for what is special damage to the husband. The court, in its opinion in the Trowbridge Case, says: "The wife may join with the husband when she is the meritorious cause of action, and when the right of action would survive to her if the husband died before the amount of damages was received. But where the husband alone is entitled to the damages, and in case of his death they would go to the personal representative, then the husband should sue alone." The loss of the society, comfort, and assistance of the wife, and money expended by the husband in endeavoring to heal her, could alone be sued for by the husband; but very different is the declaration in the case before us. There is no claim made by the husband for damages, and the allegation therein contained, "and by means of which she was prevented from performing and transacting her necessary affairs and business by her to be performed and transacted," is not an element of damage for which the husband alone could sue; but if so at the time of the decision of the Trowbridge Case, certainly not so now, because, at common law, and when that case was decided, and until the act of the Legislature of 1891, p. 328, c. 109, § 14, the earnings of the wife during coverture were the property of her husband, but by the said act of 1891 the common-law rule was abrogated, so that now the earnings of the wife, and any and all property purchased by her with the proceeds of said earnings, are her sole and separate property, so that her business affairs and transactions, and whatever might result from them, does not belong to her husband, and if she is interfered with in her business transactions, and for that reason unable to earn what she otherwise would have earned, the damage is personal to her, and such damages can be recovered by her in an action alone, or jointly with her husband.

The other reason assigned why the demurrer should have been sustained is that it was improper to join the husband and wife as coplaintiffs. At common law the action to recover damages for personal injuries to the wife must be brought in the names of the husband and wife jointly, the cause of action being in the wife, and surviving to her in case of the death of the husband; but this common-law rule has in a large measure been abrogated by the various married woman's acts. A married woman is allowed to sue in her own name to recover damages for personal injuries to herself, where the ground of the action is her injury and suffering; and also the same rule applies in actions concerning her separate property; but in a few of the states the common-law rule in this respect has not been altered, and the wife is still required to join her husband as coplaintiff. And, in most of the states where the common-law rule has been abrogated by permitting the wife to sue alone for personal injuries, it is held to be imperative, depriving the husband of any interest in the suit and forbidding his joining therein, but in many of the states the statute is deemed permissive, and merely allows the wife to either sue alone or join her husband, at her election. Palmer v. Davis, 28 N. Y. 242; Draper v. Stouvenel, 35 N. Y. 507; Whidden v. Coleman, 47 N. H. 297; Cooper v. Alger, 61 N. H. 172; Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 82; Reinheimer v. Carter, 31 Ohio St. 579; Kennedy v. Williams, 11 Minn. 314 (Gil. 219); Gee v. Lewis, 20 Ind. 149; Kramer v. Conger, 16 Iowa, 434; Norval v. Rice, 2 Wis. 22; Barr v. White, 22 Md. 259. But it is the well-settled practice in this state, and has been since the question was first presented to our courts, that the wife may or may not, at her election, join her husband with her in an action concerning her separate estate. City of Wheeling v. Trowbridge, supra; Wyatt v.

Simpson, 8 W. Va. 394; Dimmey v. R. R. Co., 27 W. Va. 32, 55 Am. Rep. 292; Fox v. Insurance Co., 31 W. Va. 374, 6 S. E. 929; Robinson v. Woodford, 37 W. Va. 377, 16 S. E. 602; Mathews v. Greer, 21 W. Va. 694; McKenzie v. R. R. Co., 27 W. Va. 306.

But it is contended that the rulings in this state permitting the joining of husband and wife were made prior to the revision of the married woman's act (chapter 66, Code; Acts 1893, p. 6, c. 3). This is true as to the cases above cited, but the case of Clay et ux. v. City of Albans, 43 W. Va. 539, 27 S. E. 368, 64 Am. St. Rep. 883, was decided since said act of 1893, but, as counsel says, no reference was made in that case to said act, and for the very reason, likely, that the court did not regard it as making any change in the rule. There is nothing in this statute that changes the rule that the wife may or may not, at her election, join with her husband in an action for personal injuries sustained by her, and, even if it should be doubtful as to what construction ought to be given to it now, the court would give it that construction which makes it permissive rather than imperative, and thereby leave unchanged the practice which is so well settled, especially when, by doing so, no injury therefrom can result to the defendant. The declaration being good, the court committed no error in overruling the demurrer.

In order to deal properly with the other assignments of error, it will be necessary to give a statement of the facts as they appear from the record. The female plaintiff, Annie Normile, who lived at 57 Thirty-Third street, in the city of Wheeling, on the 27th day of December, 1902, started from the home of her mother, at 2310 Market street, where she had been visiting that day, to return home. She had with her a bundle containing a loaf of bread, which she carried in her left arm, and a basket containing a few bottles, canned goods, etc., which she carried on the other arm. She stopped at the corner of Twenty-Third and Main streets to take passage on one of the cars of the defendant company. At that point she met Lloyd Kyle and his wife, with a baby which Kyle was carrying in his arms, who were waiting at the same place for the car. Shortly after she reached that point the car came, and stopped for the purpose of receiving passengers, the conductor not being on the platform, at the rear end of the car, where passengers are supposed to enter, but remained in the car, about the middle thereof. Kyle helped his wife on the car, and she opened the door and went in. Kyle, with his baby in his arms, got upon the platform himself; Mrs. Normile attempted to follow him; and when she stepped with one foot upon the step of the car, and after having raised the other from the ground in an attempt to step upon the car, the conductor rang the bell to give the signal for the car to start. At the sound of the bell, Annie Normile dropped her basket on the platform and caught the handle of the car with her right hand. When the car started it did so with a jerk, and threw her so that her right side struck the end of the car. Kyle caught hold of her, but, still having the baby in his arms, his hold gave way, and, after being dragged about 30 feet, with the speed of the car constantly increasing, Annie Normile fell to the ground. As Kyle caught hold of Mrs. Normile, he called twice to the conductor to stop the car, and after she fell he opened the door and told the conductor to pull the bell for the car to stop. When the car was stopped the conductor went back, met Mrs. Normile, and assisted her into the car. The accident occurred on Saturday night, and shortly after Mrs. Normile boarded the car she began to feel sick, and continued to grow worse until on the following Monday morning she went to Dr. Haskins, a physician, who prescribed for her, and the treatment of the physician not having relieved her suffering, and continuing to suffer, in about a week she went to see him the second time. He made some external examinations and made some applications of plasters, and she, not improving from this treatment, shortly afterwards returned, and on the third visit the physician decided that an internal examination was necessary, but, for some reason, at that time Mrs. Normile was not willing to be examined, and the physician says that he thought it was because she was menstruating, but in a few days she returned and the examination was made, which showed that an operation would be necessary, and Mrs. Normile afterwards went to the hospital of Dr. Haskins, where, on the 24th of February, there was performed upon her the operation called "laparotomy." She remained in the hospital for a period of five weeks after the operation was performed, at the end of which time she returned home; this operation being a very severe and dangerous one, and one which comparatively few physicians will perform. At the time of the accident, Mrs. Normile was 23 years old, and up to that time had always been a strong, healthy woman; had always helped to do the housework at home, and, at the time of the accident, was doing her own work, as well as washing for herself and husband. After the accident, and before the operation, she was not able to do any work, and since the operation she has not been able to do any work of any consequence, and, as a result of the operation, she has lost the power of bearing offspring. Dr. Haskins, in his evidence, states that he could not state positively that the operation was made necessary as a result of the accident, but he stated that such injuries as she received would in all probability result in such an operation being necessary.

The next assignment of error is that the court erred in overruling the objection of the defendant to certain testimony of the witness Dr. Haskins. Upon the subject of the operation of laparotomy which was performed upon the female plaintiff, her counsel, in endeavoring to show the dangers incident to such an operation, and the gravity of it, and the skill required to perform it, asked the witness certain questions, which, together with the answers, are as follows: "Q. Is laparotomy a specific branch of surgery? A. Well, yes; yes, it is. Of course, you do that and do general surgery too, but at the same time it is a special branch of surgery. A man might be able to amputate a leg very well, and do what we speak of as 'gross surgery,' such as amputations, and not be capable of performing laparotomy for lack of experience and attention to that particular branch of surgery. Q. State whether or not all physicians who have studied surgery perform that operation, or refuse to perform it. A. Oh, there are comparatively few men that perform these operations; comparatively few. Q. Why? A. Perhaps they don't have a taste for it; perhaps they haven't the backbone to tackle it in the first place—I don't know." In the first place, the record shows no objection to the questions, but, after all of the questions were propounded and the answers given, the defendant's counsel entered an objection, but it does not appear what questions were objected to. While we can infer that the objection was intended to refer to the evidence complained of, yet, in order to get the benefit of the ruling of the court, it must affirmatively appear what evidence was objected to. But if there had been an objection to the evidence, it should not have been sustained, because the evidence shows that the operation which was performed upon the female plaintiff was attended with great difficulty and dangers, and that comparatively few physicians perform such operation, which would thereby increase the expense of securing a physician to do the work, and, this being an element of damages which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, it alone makes the evidence admissible. Then, again, to show that it was such an operation that but very few physicians would perform goes to show the difficulties which attend its performance, and the gravity of it, which would also make the evidence admissible.

At the request of the plaintiff, and over the objection of the defendant, the court gave to the jury two instructions, which constitute the next assignment of error.

"Instruction No. 1. The court instructs the jury that to escape the responsibility of contributory negligence, a plaintiff, in an action for damages for an alleged negligence of another, is not required to exercise more care than is usual under similar circumstances among careful persons of the class to which such plaintiff belongs."

There is no objection pointed out to this instruction, and it seems to have been taken from the case of Dimmey v. Railway Co., 27 W. Va. 32, 55 Am. Rep. 292, in which the court gave to the jury an instruction in substantially the same language, and also the court laid down the law in that case to be: "To escape the responsibility of contributory negligence, the plaintiff is not required to exercise more care than is usual under similar circumstances among careful persons of the class to which he belongs." We think this instruction correctly propounds the law applicable to this case. All persons are not chargeable with the same degree of care, and the jury, in passing upon the care that the plaintiff should exercise at the time of the accident, had the right to consider the class to which she belonged, and had a right to take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the accident, as they would appear to a person of her class.

"Instruction No. 2. The court instructs the jury that if under the evidence they find the defendant guilty as in the amended declaration alleged, then, in estimating the damage of the plaintiffs, they have the right to take into consideration the personal injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff Annie Normile, in consequence of the defendant's wrongful acts, if any such injuries are proved, and the pain and suffering, both mental and physical, undergone by her in consequence of such injuries, if such pain and suffering have been proved; and if they further believe from the evidence that the said injuries are permanent, and that they include an inability to have any child or children, these facts may also be included in their estimate, if they further believe from the evidence that such permanent injury, including such inability, resulted from such wrongful acts."

The defendant urges two reasons why it was error to give this instruction. One is that it wholly eliminates the question of contributory negligence, and the other is that it instructed the jury that they might consider a feature of the injury which should not have been included in the jury's finding. Taking it that counsel for the defendant is right in saying that the question of contributory negligence is eliminated by giving this instruction, and that it should have presented that question to the jury, still, under the repeated decisions of this court, it is not error when the jury was fully and fairly instructed upon the question of contributory negligence in other instructions. In the instructions given for the defendant the question of contributory negligence was clearly presented to the jury, and it was the duty of the jury, in deciding the case, to take the instructions as given, both for the plaintiff and defendant, and if the instructions, taken and read together, instruct the jury correctly as to the law of the case, there is no error.

Did the court, in this instruction, tell the jury that they might consider a feature of the injury which should not have been included in their finding? This contention is based upon the part of the instruction which tells the jury, "if they further believe from the evidence that the said injuries are permanent, and that they include an inability to have any child or children, these facts may also be included in their estimate, if they further believe from the evidence that such permanent injury, including such inability, resulted from such wrongful acts," and in support of this position the case of Peters v. Johnson, 50 W. Va. 644, 41 S. E. 190, 57 L. R. A. 428, 88 Am. St. Rep. 909, is cited, and in which the rule was definitely stated that the damages which may be recovered are such, and only such, as are the reasonable and probable consequence of the defendant's act. The loss of the power of childbearing is certainly an element of damage to be taken into consideration by the jury, as much so as an injury to any other part of the human body, and the question as to whether or not the injury is the reasonable and probable consequence of the negligent act is a question of fact for the jury. It was for them to say whether or not the operation of laparotomy was made necessary by reason of the accident, and, if so, was the loss of childbearing the reasonable and probable consequence of such negligent act. In the case of Denver & Rio Grande R. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597, 7 Sup. Ct. 1286, 30 L. Ed. 1146, it is held: "Thus, when one of the direct consequences of a wound was the loss of the power to have offspring, evidence of that fact was admissible, though the declaration did not directly designate that consequence." Complaint is made that the jury should have been told in the instruction that such damages could not be properly included in their estimate unless the evidence showed that the injury in question was the reasonable and probable consequence of the defendant's negligence. While this instruction does not, in express terms, so instruct the jury, yet the language used in the instruction is sufficient to guide the jury to a proper conclusion in this respect. They are told that they can consider this feature of the injury if it resulted from the wrongful act of the defendant—not that if it is a reasonable and probable consequence of the negligent act, but, as a matter of fact, if the loss of childbearing was the result of the defendant's wrongful act, the jury were told that they could consider this in estimating the damages. For the reasons given, we find no fault with this instruction.

The remaining question to be determined is whether or not the verdict of the jury is supported by the evidence. The negligent act complained of is that the defendant company did not exercise due and proper care in the management of its car at the time the plaintiff Annie Normille attempted to take passage thereon. It will be observed from the facts that at the time the plaintiff, Annie Normille, attempted to board the car, and after she had stepped upon one of the steps with her right foot, and while in the act of stepping up with her left foot, and after she had raised it off of the ground, the conductor gave a signal for the car to start; that Mrs. Normille thereupon became excited, dropped her basket upon the platform, and the sudden movement of the car threw her against the rear rail of the landing. At that time Kyle, who had preceded her, and who had stepped up onto the platform, endeavored to assist her, but not being able to render her sufficient assistance, and the speed of the car constantly increasing, his hold upon her loosened, and, after being dragged a considerable distance, she was thrown from the car into the street. It is the duty of a street railway company, when stopping its cars for the purpose of the reception of passengers, to use the highest degree of care to see that those who are intending to take passage thereon have safely boarded the cars before giving the signal to start. If the conductor in this case had been at the proper place and exercised the proper care, this injury would have been avoided; but, on the other hand, instead of being at a place where his duty called him, and where he could see that all intending passengers were safely on board the car before giving the signal to start, he remained in the car, and, before the female plaintiff had an opportunity to embark, the car was, under his order, started. It is no excuse for the conductor that he did not see that Mrs. Normille had not safely boarded the car, because the law imposes upon him the duty to see, and his failure to see does not excuse the company. The authorities are abundant to sustain the view that it is the duty of a street railroad company, when it stops its cars at a regular stopping place to receive passengers, to see that they are safely aboard before starting the car. In the case of Terminal Co. v. Morris' Adm'r, 44 S. E. 719, decided by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, the court says: "It is the duty of a street car company, when its cars are standing at a stopping place for the reception of passengers, to use the highest degree of care to see that all passengers lawfully entering its cars get to a place of safety thereon before starting its cars." In Nellis on Street Surface Railroads, page 458, etc., it is said: "It cannot be said, however, that it is inconsistent with ordinary care and caution for a person to board a street car while it is in motion. Whether one has or has not exercised reasonable care or caution in so doing, is to be determined by the particular circumstances in each case, and is therefore a question of fact to be submitted to the jury. * * * If the passenger be in good physical condition and unincumbered, he may without negligence attempt to board a slowly moving car under all ordinary circumstances, and it will be even a question for the jury if in boarding he was negligent in not holding fast to the hand rail provided for the purpose of aiding him to board. * * * But one with packages in both hands, as an umbrella in one hand and a handkerchief in the other, may attempt to board a slowly-moving electric car without being negligent as matter of law." In the case we have here, the car had been stopped, as it was the duty of the company to do, and, while the female plaintiff was somewhat incumbered with the basket on one arm and the package on the other, yet the car was standing still at the time she attempted to take passage, and, if it had been permitted to remain so until she could have boarded the car, there would have been no injury sustained by her. She had the right to rely upon the company, that it would exercise due and proper care, and that it would not, while she was endeavoring to board the car, start, or give a signal to start, the car. Much stronger is her case than are the cases referred to in the authority just cited. There it will be observed that the passengers were attempting to board a moving car, and even there the court held that it was a question of fact for the jury. "It is the duty of a conductor, before giving the signal to the employé controlling the power to start, after the car has stopped to take on passengers, to look around and see that all passengers to take passage at that place are safely on board, and failure so to do is not excused by the fact that he does not see an intending passenger. The car must wait a reasonable time, and a passenger, diligent in attempting to get upon it while it is stopped to receive passengers, though lacking in dexterity, may recover for injuries sustained from the starting of the car while he is attempting to board it. If the car be started when the employé knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that the passenger was attempting to board, the company may be made liable for injuries sustained by the intending passenger. He has the right to rely on the due care of the company, and is not bound to anticipate that the car will start suddenly and throw him upon the ground, or against poles or other obstructions in close proximity to the track." Nellis, Street Surface Railroads, p. 161, etc. "And the fact that a person's movements are somewhat incumbered by packages in hands may reasonably require more delay and care in starting the train, in order to assure his safety, as in the case of aged or infirm persons." Clark's Accident Law, 27. And it is held, in the case of Cohen v. West Chicago Street Railway Co., 60 Fed. 698, 9 C. C. A. 223, that "a conductor of street cars, having the safety and even the lives of the passengers in his keeping, has not discharged his whole duty to the public when he has stopped his train and waited what may appear, according to his schedule, a reasonable time for passengers to embark. * * * He is bound to know, when he starts suddenly and with full force, that no person attempting to embark is at that moment with one foot on the platform and the other on the ground, and with his hand upon the rail, in the act of getting on board." There seems to be no question, from the facts in this case, applying the rules of law to them, but what the defendant company failed to exercise that due and proper care that it should have exercised at the time that Annie Normile attempted to take passage on its car.

But the defendant urges that, even if it was negligent, the plaintiff, Annie Normile, was likewise negligent, and, if the injury complained of was the result of the mutual fault of the defendant and Mrs. Normile, that then she is not entitled to recover, and that there was no material conflict of evidence in this case, and that the question as to whether she was guilty of contributory negligence was a question of law for the court, and that the court should not have submitted the question to the jury. We cannot say that Mrs. Normile was guilty of contributory negligence. At the time she attempted to board the car it was standing still, and she had the right to rely upon its so remaining until she had time to embark and reach a place of safety. She had a basket upon one arm and a bundle in the other, it is true, and was thereby unable to take hold of the railing; but this cannot be attributed to her as a negligent act. She had the right to attempt to enter the car without taking hold of the railing, and could have done so with all ease, and without a particle of danger, if the conductor had discharged his duty towards her by permitting the car to remain standing until he knew she was in a place of safety. But it is said she heard the signal for the car to start, and knew what it meant, and that she should then have stepped off. It may be that she could have stepped off without danger to herself, or it may be that she could not have done so; as to this, we cannot say from the evidence. She had to determine this question for herself, and she is not chargeable with doing wrong if she did not do the wisest and best thing under the circumstances. If she acted as a reasonable and prudent person would have acted under like circumstances, she cannot be held guilty of negligence. After the car started suddenly and struck her on the right side, she was probably in a very poor frame of mind to decide, upon a moment's reflection, what course she ought to take. Barker v. Ohio River R. R. Co., 51 W. Va. 423, 41 S. E. 148; Tuttle v. Atlantic City R. R. Co. (N. J.) 49 Atl. 450, 54 L. R. A. 582, 88 Am. St. Rep. 491. "A railroad company cannot be excused from gross negligence on its part, although the act of the injured contributed thereto, unless it be shown in evidence that such person was guilty of legal negligence; that is, some act of negligence that an ordinarily prudent person would not have been guilty of under the same circumstances." Meeks v. O. R. Ry. Co., 52 W. Va. 102, 43 S. E. 120.

"When one, by the negligence of another, is so placed that he must choose on the instant, in the face of grave and impending peril, between two hazards, and he makes such choice as a person of ordinary prudence might make, his choice cannot constitute contributory negligence." Twomley v. Central Park, etc., R. Co., 69 N. Y. 158, 25 Am. Rep. 162. Also, see, Dimmey v. R. R. Co., 27 W. Va. 82, 55 Am. Rep. 292; Hoffman v. Dickinson, 31 W. Va. 154, 6 S. E. 53. There are cases in which the question of contributory negligence is a question for the court, but, in order to make it such a case, the evidence to establish the contributory negligence must be so clear that the minds of reasonable men, free from bias and prejudice, could not come to but the one conclusion. In this case the evidence does not warrant such a position, but the case is one which was proper to be submitted to a jury, and, the jury having found upon this evidence in favor of the plaintiffs, its finding must be accepted as correct.

It is claimed that the damages are excessive. The question of the assessment of damages in cases of this kind is peculiarly within the province of the jury; and when the jury takes into consideration the injury that the plaintiff, Annie Normile, sustained, the continued pain and suffering which the evidence shows that she underwent, and the painful and dangerous operation that was necessary to be performed upon her, and the fact that it has left her in a delicate condition and unable to bear children, are all facts upon which the jury had the right to base its finding; and we cannot say that the amount found by its verdict is excessive. And, for the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

1. Failure to make out and swear to a list of lands delinquent for taxes by the first Monday in June, as required by Code 1887, c. 30, § 18, will not invalidate a deed under a tax sale.

2. Failure to post a list of lands delinquent for taxes as required by section 20, c. 30, Code 1887, will not invalidate a tax deed.

3. Failure to present a list of lands delinquent for taxes to the county court at the levy term as required by Code 1887, c. 30, § 21, and presenting it at a later term, will not invalidate a tax deed.

4. The fact that a list of lands delinquent for taxes was acted on at a special term of a county court, in the call for which no reference was made to action on such list, will not invalidate a tax deed.

5. A report of sales of delinquent lands was not required by Code 1887, c. 31, §§ 10, 12, to have a column for the day of sale, or to state the particular day of a sale.

6. The fact that an affidavit to a list of sales of delinquent land contains no venue, and does not show of what county the notary is a notary, will not invalidate a tax deed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County; J. M. McWhorter, Judge.

Bill by George Hornage and others against G. W. Imboden and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dillon & Nuckolls, for appellants. A. N. Campbell and E. M. McPeak, for appellees.

BRANNON, P. Six tracts of land, in all 636 acres, were sold in 1897 for taxes for 1895 and 1896 in Fayette county, in the name of Gersham Bulkley, and purchased by G. W. Imboden and J. R. Koontz; and George Hornage and H. V. J. Swain, claiming as owners of the land under Bulkley, brought a chancery suit to set aside the tax deed made under said tax sale, and, the court having dismissed the bill, Hornage and Swain appeal.

One ground for assault upon the tax deed is that the sheriff did not make out and swear to the delinquent lists before the first Monday in June, as required by section 18, c. 30, Code 1887, but delayed so doing until August. From this it is argued that there were legally no delinquent lists and no delinquency. State v. McEldowney, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 650, holds that this defect is cured by Code 1899, c. 31, § 25, and close of opinion in Starr v. Sampselle (W. Va.) 47 S. E. 258.

Another ground of assault on the tax deed is that the delinquent list was not posted as required by Code 1887, § 20, c. 30. The only evidence of such failure is that the affidavits to the lists are dated 6th and 23d of August, the same date of their presentation to the county court; and it is thence inferred that the lists had not been posted before those dates. It may be, and likely is, the case that they were posted before being sworn to. I hardly think this would matter, as they would be notice. By section 14, c. 55, p. 123, Acts 1875, it is provided that the list should be posted "after being verified as aforesaid," thus requiring a sworn list to be posted; but section 20, c. 30, Code 1887, providing for posting, has no such provision. Chapter 13, p. 144, Acts 1881, left that clause out, and it has ever since been out. The change means something. It does not seem probable that the Legislature would require the sheriff to swear to the list until he presented it to the court. He can collect up to that time. What if he should swear long before court and collect afterwards? He would not be guilty of perjury. The Codes of 1887 and 1899 say that "the sheriff or collector returning such list" shall make the affidavit. What is "returning"? I think it is the delivery of the delinquent list to the court. As to the list of lands improperly charged, it says the sheriff "on returning" it shall make its affidavit. Both provisions mean the same. Besides this, failure to post will not overthrow the deed. Section 25, c. 31, Code 1887, has the broad provision that no irregularity in the proceedings under which the sale is made shall affect it, unless it appear on the face of the proceedings in the clerk's office. The law does not require the posting to so appear. The omission does not so appear.

Another ground of assault on the deed is that the sheriff did not return the delinquent lists to the July term of the county court, that being the levy term, as required by Code 1887, c. 30, § 21. I think that as this relates to the time of return, it is an irregularity in the "return" of the delinquent list cured by the letter of section 25, as held in State v. McElldowney. It says that "no irregularity, error or mistake in the delinquent list, or the return thereof, or the affidavit," shall invalidate or affect the deed. We may surely say that the act of delivery of the list to the court is a part of the act of the "return" of the list, and the omission to make the delivery to a particular term of court is covered by the words "irregularity, error or mistake." Those words signify an assiduous intent to cure such a defect. It could not be plainer, unless the law should say in words that failure to return at a particular term should not harm the deed.

Another ground for assault upon the deed is that the delinquent lists were presented to the county court at a special term in August, and that the call for it did not embrace action upon such lists. It is contended that the delinquent lists were never approved by the county court, and therefore there were never any legal delinquent lists, because the court which acted upon them was without jurisdiction to act upon them. It is true that it has been held that a special session of a county court can act only on the subjects specified in the call for the session, and this is jurisdictional; that is, action upon other matters is action without jurisdiction. Hamilton v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 71, 18 S. E. 8. But we must not here forget the broad curative provisions of section 25, c. 31, Code 1887. It says that an irregularity shall not invalidate a sale, unless it be such "as materially to prejudice and mislead the owner of the real estate so sold as to what portion of his real estate was so sold, and when, and for what year or years, it was sold, or the name of the purchaser thereof; and not then, unless it be clearly proved to the court or jury trying the case that, but for such irregularity, the former owner would have redeemed the land." I have said that, so far as concerns the time or term of return a defect is cured, and therefore we have now the single question whether this special term feature will kill the sale. Does the fact that the return was to a special term, not called to act on such lists, materially prejudice and mislead the owner in the respects specified in the statute? And, further, does it appear that, but for the return of lists to such a term, the owner would have redeemed? It has not been shown by oral evidence that but for this defect he would have redeemed; but granting that under McCallister v. Cottrille, 24 W. Va. 173, such evidence cannot be demanded of the owner, we must see that the defect is such as misled the owner and prevented redemption. We cannot see that the defect is such. Can we realize that the mere fact that the lists went before a special term, rather than a regular term, misled the owner, and prevented redemption? And is not this irregularity cured also by the words of section 25, above given, that "no irregularity, error or mistake in the delinquent list or the return thereof" shall invalidate the tax deed? This defect relates to the return of the list. The court action is a part of it. The return is not complete without it.

Another ground of assault upon the deed is that the sale report does not show the date of sale. Code 1887, c. 31, § 49, does not require the list of sales to show the day of sale. The sheriff seems to have used a form formerly used, giving a column headed "Date of Each Sale," the law formerly requiring that column; but the form given in the statute as it was at the date of this sale did not contain that column. The caption says that the sale was in the month of December, 1897, complying with the then statute. The omission to put the day of sale in the useless column does not affect the sale. Besides, section 25 says no irregularity in the sale list shall impair the deed. And again, the omission to state the day in that column cannot be held to have misled the owner and prevented redemption.

Another ground of assault on the deed is that the sheriff failed to append an affidavit to the sale list. This is predicated on the sole ground that the notary's certificate does not show of what county he is a notary, has no venue of county, and does not show that the oath was administered in his county. Why this objection? The letter of section 25 says that no defect in the affidavit will avail. But, without regard to the statute, it is doubtful whether the affidavit is bad. Want of venue does not destroy an affidavit, if it appear of what county the notary is an officer. Kesler v. Lapham, 46 W. Va. 293, 33 S. E. 289. The list is a sale list for Fayette county, and the affidavit recites that McVey is sheriff of that county, and we can look to other parts of the paper than the jurat to collect of what county Tansill was notary. Carpenter v. Dexter, 8 Wall. 513, 529, 19 L. Ed. 426. But very plainly this error is cured by the statute.

We will affirm the decree.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

AMMONS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 17, 1904.) Action by one Ammons against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Motion to dismiss denied.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss on same grounds as in Curtis' Case (at this term) 49 S. E. 213, and is denied on the same grounds as stated in that case and in Benedict v. Jones, 131 N. C. 474, 42 S. E. 909. Motion denied.

MCNEILL v. DURHAM & C. R. CO. (Supreme Court of North Carolina.) Action by W. H. McNeill against the Durham & Charlotte Railroad Company. For former opinion, see 47 S. E. 765. See, also, 44 S. E. 34.

PER CURIAM. No new principle being presented, the petition to rehear is dismissed, on the authority of Weisel v. Cobb, 122 N. C. 67, 30 S. E. 312.

TURNER v. WILSON. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 17, 1904.) Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Bryan, Judge. Action by C. D. Turner against Thomas Wilson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed. C. D. Turner, in pro. per. Graham & Graham and S. M. Gattis, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Reversed, on the authority of Turner v. McKee (at this term) 49 S. E. 330.

EQUITABLE FIRE INS. CO. v. FISHBURN. (Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 3, 1904.) Action by the Equitable Fire Insurance Company against Sophia H. M. Fishburne. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Motion to require appellant to amend return. Granted. Smythe, Lee & Frost, for the motion. Julian Fishburne, opposed.

PER CURIAM. The respondent on due notice moved this court to require the defendant to amend her return by inserting certain papers named in the notice. After consideration, this court orders that the defendant, appellant, do forthwith add to her return already on file a copy of the decree of Judge Gage in this cause, also a copy of the defendant's notice of appeal from said decree, and also the defendant's ground of appeal or exceptions. This court reserves its right to further order any other papers added to defendant's return that may appear necessary for the proper consideration of the appeal herein.

CRALL v. COMMONWEALTH. (Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 28, 1905.) Error to Circuit Court, Chesterfield County. One Crall was convicted of peddling, and brings error. Affirmed.

WHITTLE, J. In this case, as in another under the same style, in which an opinion has been handed down at the present term (49 S. E. 638), the plaintiff in error was convicted and fined in a prosecution under section 50 of an act approved May 13, 1903 (Acts 1902-04 [Va. Code 1904, p. 2223]), for peddling goods, wares, and merchandise without a license. It appears in this, as in the former, case that the actual sale of the goods was made through one Joseph Freeman, an agent of the L. B. Price Mercantile Company, a corporation domiciled at Kansas City, in the state of Missouri; that the company had two depositories, or storehouses, in this state, the one located in the city of Norfolk, and the other in the city of Richmond. Crall was the vice president of the company, and its general manager for the state of Virginia, with headquarters at Norfolk. Ostrander, under Crall's supervision, was in charge of the branch storehouse in the city of Richmond. Freeman, who was employed by Ostrander for the L. B. Price Company, was equipped with a wagon, goods, and printed contracts of sale, and conducted a regular peddling business on behalf of the company. He was sent out to peddle goods, and reported his sales to Ostrander, who made his reports to Norfolk. Upon the foregoing facts Crall was convicted of peddling, and a fine of $100 imposed upon him, by the circuit court of Chesterfield county, to which court the case was carried by appeal from the judgment of a justice of that county. For reasons stated in the opinion in the former case, the judgment complained of is without error, and must be affirmed.
